CHRISTIAN OR NOT CHRISTIAN.

WHY NOT CHRISTIAN?

Dr. A. S. Hudson Urges Many Serious Objections

In Reply to Ida C. Hawkins' Defiant Challenge.

To the Editor:—There is a bulky bundle of reasons why Spiritualists should revolt against any relationship to Christianity. Christianity is fed by superstition and bounded by faith. Spiritualism is a science, a philosophy. What is a science? Mr. Henry Thomas Buckle, a historian of England, said: "That sum of knowledge which can predict, can foretell or prophesy, is a science." This is essentially and eminently what Spiritualism can do. It is a part of its life. Without Mr. Buckle's support, Spiritualism propounds its own status.

It, like every science, is based upon three predicates. They are, first, fact; second, observation; third, reason.

Science gathers and evolves knowledge. It confers new truths. What truth, what knowledge did religion ever bestow upon the race of man? None.

It has always been clothed in assumptive nothing. It abounds in faith.

Spiritualism is as free from faith as as mathematics. While Spiritualism is not a religion, it may be held and adopted as such. Mediums need Spiritualism as a religion to protect them before the law and against prosecution in the exercise of their gifts.

To attach a prefix to Spiritualism as Christian, Mohammedan or Talmudic is to belittle it and diminish the grand proportions of its dignified figure.

Astronomy was preceded by astrology; chemistry was preceded by alchemy; surgery was preceded by sow-gelding; Spiritualism was preceded by Christianity; therefore astrologic astronomy, alchemic chemistry and sow-gelding surgery are all as consistent, proper and euphonious as Christian Spiritualism.

No prefix or handle to Spiritualism. It is naturally large, bold, puissant and of towering majority. There is no more profound, dignified, self-denoting term than that of Spiritualism.

The defiant Ida C. Hawkins says: "We have added a steeple to our former belief."

Here we plant our feet and oppose an objection. We deny her right or liberty to call Spiritualism "a belief." That is an insufferable impertinence. Spiritualism is in no sense a belief. It is in sum and substance, knowledge—sound, broad, scientific knowledge of the living, growing, experimental order. It came without a shadow of superstition faith, or weak-kneed belief. Every votary of Spiritualism was in the outset a skeptic, and it took proof direct and the most obdurate to convince such a mind.

Our friend says: We want it distinctly understood that we are followers of the teachings of Christ."

Madame, not so fast! Go slow! Are you sure of your footing.

You think you here tell the truth.

But over-righteous and over-confident people are sometimes mistaken. Let us see. Turning to the record we find this:

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance, against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law."

These are the teachings of Jesus Christ, your fetich. Do you follow them? Now be honest and own up to to the truth of this exact matter in hand. Have you ever followed this "Christ" teaching? If you have not, then have you told the truth when you said: "We are followers of the teachings of Christ"?

You ask: "What true Spiritualist could object to the sermon on the mount"?

I must answer and say, any and every honest man, Spiritualist or not, should object to it, because of its numerous errors, short-comings and its supreme grossness. Not to mention others, there are seven defects in it. It is superstitious, absurd, illogical, irrelevant, tautological, immoral, false! We will not stop to prove these items in detail. But proofs of some of them will appear as we go on. Jesus enjoins this:

"Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, what ye shall drink, nor yet for your bodies what ye shall put on."

Observe: this is three times repeated. "Take no thought for the morow. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Pray, where is the evil of having enough? Madame, do you follow, have you followed, these corrupting teachings of your dear Jesus Christ?

You must know they constitute the logic of the tramp, the code of the vagabond, the passport of the bummer.

They inculcate idleness, which is immoral.

Another false and foolish rule of action of this pseudo God is, is to love your enemies, to give your cloak to the one who takes your coat. No one ever did this, nor ever will. The rules are impractical. We love our friends. We love what is lovable; we hate what is hateful; we admire that which is admireable. To attempt to reverse these ingrained rules of action, is to reverse the rules of one's physical organism. They show how little real practical knowledge the author of them possessed.

Every truth found in "the sermon on the mount" and in the New Testament was in existence long before the Christian era, and was borrowed or filched from the wisdom of the sages of earlier periods. The golden rule uttered by Confucius, if he was not the author of it. Early in her script, the madame asks: Why so much bigotry among Spiritualists? Here the reader is made aware of a much savage thrust direct from the feminine shoulder. She says: "The Spiritualist who objects to the teachings of Christ to the extent that he desires to expunge the title Christian as a distinguishing mark is no true, honest, honorable member of that body." Oh, how small! Any bigotry here? Was ever seen another Christian so illiberal? Some few years ago the writer felt the need of a new word, and had the hardihood to coin one suiting the emergency. That word was "Idiocrat." It was from the Greek idiotes, a private uneducated, ignorant person, from idios, a private person, and from kratein to be strong, to rule, from kratos strong It is not a word of opprobrium, though it signifies defect. Not only a lack of knowledge, but one-kratos-strong in that lack. Not to my view, Ida C. Hawkins is a living, striking representative idiocrat. Christolatory and idiocrat alike feed on superstition, rest in belief, and abide in faith. What but a high-grade idiocrat could or would have the termerity to charge mature Spirittualists with dishonesty in their life convictions?

Does not that squint toward a mountain of bigotry?

We have heard of Iron mountain, an innocent mountain of iron in the state of Missouri, useful and modest. But who, until he saw No. 360 of Progressive Thinker, would believe there could be a mountain of bigotry? Here we meet a mountain of bigotry in skirts, both aggressive and defiant. So, in the face of our friend's dynamite challenge, we do hereby protest to having the grand proportions of majestic Spiritualism debased by being baptized with the prefixed nomenclature of "Christian." It is perhaps thought Christian comes from Jesus Christ. It is not so. It is astronomical, and very ancient. As to Jesus, he is a myth, his genesis a deception, his religion a delusion., his messiahship a falsehood The "fall of man" is a falsehood. No! No! We must tolerate no prefix to Spiritualism. This effort to christianize it is a serious matter.

1. Spiritualism needs no cultic relationship with Christianity.

2. Jesus and Spiritualism are at enmity. They are antagonistic and antipodal. They disagree and must always conflict.

3. The so-called Nazarene is the type of a savior. Yet the friends thereof say: Whatsoever ye sow, that shall ye also reap." Siritualism quotes and acts on a like statement, as this: "A wrong act stings till retribution heals.

4. Jesus appears as a figure of atonement; while almost the second message from the Spirit-world said: There is no atonement for man." The first message was: We are your friends, spirits of people once inhabiting earth."

5. Christianity is a cult, a religion. Spiritualism is a science, a philosophy.

6. Christianity never conferred a new truth upon the intellectual world, while Spiritualism teems with volumes of newly mined knowledge. It first discovered the planet Neptune.

7. Christianity has opposed every new truth and every discovery. Spiritualism is a trusty friend in all learning. Wisdom is a pioneer in original inquiry.

8. Christianity is clothed in filthy garments of superstition and the supernatural. Spiritualism scorns all these and is concordant only with the normal and natural.

9. Christianity is blackened with the bloody history of meanness and perfidy of the past. Spiritualism has a clean record and scintillates with ancient and modern beneficent work.

10. Christianity is a dotard; it is palsied with senility and sterility. Spiritualism is juvenile, fresh, virile, and of abounding fertility.

11. Let us have no fossilized nor petrified prefix to Spiritualism. It is itself a potentate and sovereign.

WHY CHRISTIAN?

Moses Created His God in His Own Image.

The Religion of Spiritualism Is the Religion of Jesus.

To the Editor:—First of all, to become a Christian we must believe the Bible to be God's holy word. We must accept it literally and without comment.

The God that Moses created was in his own image, and partook mostly of his character. Moses made the plans of creation, and his God executed them. When every thing did not work to suit Moses, he would call his God to an account and demand an explanation. They would sometimes disagree, and then they would both go on a war path. Moses gave his God only six days to make this world and all the others that float in space. The first man that God made was constructed in his own image and that image partook of Moses. The woman was a model of beauty as she stood naked before Adam, and God admired his own handiwork, but went off home, to heaven, and left them both in a nude condition.

The Garden was filled with trees, all laden with beautiful fruit. The happy couple were informed of the kind of fruit of which they should partake, and then he left them to help themselves. In the meantime the Devil—who by the way, was never created, stood by unobserved, a silent listener, and when God left the Garden, he modestly informed the lady that she would become a Goddess and her husband a God if they would take his advice and partake of the forbiden fruit, which they did.

When God discovered that he had been thwarted in his plans, he was mad and swore eternal vengeance on Adam and all his posterity.

After this the gods came down from heaven and took to themselves wives from among the daughters of men, and raised up giants who became men of great valor; but this would not do, and a plan was made to drown them all with the exception of one family.

At the command of God a huge boat was built and a pleasure excursion arranged, and two of all animals invited to take a voyage around the world.

This voyage was a complete success, and when the waters cleared away, new life of all kinds sprang up spontaneously, and soon the world was peopled again.

When worlds are made to order, and human beings spring into existence as by magic, what wonder is it that their religion should partake of gods and devils? When gods are born of maidens, and devils kicked out of heaven, where will humanity find a place to rest in security?

As long as blood atones for sins, and devils roam the earth at leisure, and Gods three judge of man's destiny, what hope has humanity of any happiness in the hereafter?

If life is progressive and man lives forever, what right has one to tolerate gods and devils any longer?

If our loved ones return to earth and greet us with their blessings, who has the right to deny it and proclaim it untrue? If the religion of Christianity is founded on a myth, and we can show conclusively that we have something better in form of the religion of Spiritualism to take its place, who, I ask has the authority to proclaim it is false, and comes from the Devil?

If the religion of Spiritualism conforms with that which Jesus taught, and our mediums do even more wonderful things than he did, who dare proclaim that Jesus and the angels are not at the back of it all? If God in his infinite wisdom has permited us angels to proclaim to the people of earth that life is immortal, as well as progressive, who gave Christians the authority to proclaim that Spiritualism is untrue, and that we are transcending God's laws in persisting that we are in daily converse with the higher angels?

If it is true—as we assert it is—that the soul of man is a part of God, what right have Christians to ignore it, inasmuch as Jesus proclaimed that it was even true

If human existence is in touch with the angel world, is it not about time that Christians understood it, come forward, and with us, call for more evidence from those on the other shore of eternity?

We are constantly sending our loved ones to the other shore of eternity, and what more natural than that some of them would be pleased to inform us that they still live and will congratulate us with their presence if we will give them the opportunity?

Out of love comes perfection, and out of truth comes holiness, and great is he whose soul is large enough to love all humanity. Mothers are prone to love their children, and Jesus taught us to love one another.

The religion of Spiritualism is the religion of Jesus, and blessed is he that devotes a good portion of his time in doing good to others. Blessed is he that seeks the holy spirit, and through that comes in rapport with the higher life. Come up to the altar of truth, and learn more of what there is in the great hereafter.

WHY CHRISTIAN?

No Fault to Find with the Teachings of Jesus,

But Spiritualism Does Not Depend Thereon.

To the Editor:—In answer to "Why Not Christian," I have no fault to find with the teachings of Jesus; they are good, though simply the revolcings of the teachers long gone before him, the sentiments so old that their origin is lost in the dim mists of the past. Spiritualism does not depend on the teachings of Jesus, for spirit return and its phenomena form the basis and foundation for every great religion the world has ever known.

So-called Christians are the greatest enemies that Spiritualism, as a movement, has had to fight, and to-day from almost every Christian pulpit in this broad land of religious liberty, Spiritualism is denounced as a farce and a delusion, and its believers as fools, knaves and lunatics; and then we are to take the name adopted by our greatest enemies as an honor to us; and you tell us: "Let me warn the Spiritualist who repudiates the title 'Christian,' that if he build not upon the rock of ages, he will find that he has built upon shifting sand, and that sooner or later his house will fall."

There is no religion higher than truth; truth is the rock of ages which endureth through all time, and Spiritualism is a living demonstration of that truth—the only religion—Christianity not excepted, that has thousands of living, demonstrating teachers on every side to-day—not two thousand years ago.

No! Spiritualism, because its teachings happen to agree with the sentiments voiced by Jesus, two thousand years ago, does not have to depend on the name Christian for its success; for from it. We come to conquer the world with love and kindness, while Christianity has been a trail of bloodshed and horror. I have not one word to say against any person, but as a coworker in the cause I feel it my duty to jealously watch any encroachment upon the hard-fought-for ground that this glorious movement occupies to-day, and you, my sister, have fallen into the the name of Christian to Spiritualism; and you, my sister, have fallen nito the very pit I am warning our friends against. I quote: "We wish it distinctly understood that we are followers of the teachings of the Christ, and that in embracing the truths of Spiritualism we have simply added a steeple to our former belief."

In my former article I said: "They will simply incorporate spirit return into their creeds, and go on with their forms and dogmas, leaving the uplifting teachings of Spiritualism to die."

It is not any of the grand truths that come down to us from the past, that I condemn; but it is an encroachment that may be made on Spiritualism as an independent movement that I would call attention to. As a movement, Spiritualism has a well-defined object in view, and that is the promulgation of truth.

"Truth shall make you free," and it is to make free, self-reliant, noble men and women who will recognize truth and truth only for authority.

Any man or woman who is living a pure, honest life does not have to depend on outward teachers for a guide in life. Let them turn their thoughts within and listen to the still small voice of love. If, as we are told, our bodies are the temples of the living God, where can we look for higher guidance than within our own souls, where the still small voice speaks to all who still the passions and outward sense long enough to hear it speak.

When I signed a covenant with the teachers of light to devote my life as a coworker in this work, I did it after due consideration, knowing well the trials ahead; and I wish to say now that we are on the eve of a great crisis for the human race, and we as teachers and workers must stand firm and work together, or we will see our glorious movement go down amidst darkness. Spirit return, as a fact, will always live, but dangers beset Spiritualism as an independent movement on every side, from enemies within and lukewarm friends without.

WHY CHRISTIAN?

A Plea for Spiritualism, Pure and Non-Christian,

But Possessing the True Christ Principle.

Ida Hawkins in a late issue of The Progressive Thinker, puts in a plea for the title of "Christian Spiritualism," to be attached to the pure article of our Spiritualism. Not any for me, I thank you, but while I do not object to all the good principle or Christ-principle, that we can have within our souls, I do object to the title of Christian" as it is meant in these degenerate days of the Christian Church.

I wish Ida was a man, so that I could write right out plain and tell her why we do not need to be "Mongrel Spiritualists," instead of just true and good Spiritualists, and nothing else.

You Mr. Editor, as well as your contributor Ida, must know that there never was such a man as is commonly called Jesus Christ; because the Jesus of Nazareth was or is a historical man, and "Christ" is good or the good principle; therefore we must keep them separate, for they do not belong together at all, unless you choose to call Jesus the Christ or man of good principle.

I do not wish to mix my Spiritualism with the Christian Church religion, for the following reasons:

First, I do not wish to follow in the footsteps of the old Church, because they are the only religious people that force their religion upon people. For instance, take the trouble in Turkey today, it is caused by the Christian Church forcing the vagaries of the Christian religion upon a people who have a good religion of their own, and do not wish to accept the religion of the Christian, but it has been forced upon the Mohammedan until he has rebelled against the encroachment, and then the Christian has called upon all the powers of the known world to aid and protect him and his usurping and plundering missionaries, and the whole world is in a turmoil over this Christian religion, when it is a well known fact, that his religion is the grandest humbug of the nineteenth century.

No other man but the Christian forces his religion and his Bible at the point of the bayonet, or at the mouth of the cannon. A trail of blood has marked the path of the Christian and his Church, all along the ages behind us, and history proclaims the fact that over 50,000,000 of people have gone down to their graves and yielded up earthly life, all in the name of the meek and lowly Jesus; and through the persecutions of the Christian as against his fellow man. 100,000,000 have been put to death directly and indirectly in the name of Christianity. The shrieks and groans of dying millions have cursed the name of Christianity so that we do not want it attached to our Spiritualism. 60,000 Christians were slaughtered at the St. Bartholomew massacre in one night, by brother Christians. I don't wish for any modern Christianity, nor the name added to my Spiritualism.

The Christian religion says "believe or be damned;" pure Spiritualism says, do good, live pure lives, and you shall reap your reward over in the kingdom of soul life.

Christianity pictures to us a hell unbounded and free, and a heaven with a doubt, and circumscribed and limited; Spiritualism pure and simple, pictures to us a religion in soul life where father and mother, brother and sister, wife and children, shall live in one harmonious family, and joy shall be to that household when they are joined together over in the land of spirit-life.

The Christian says that we must be separated, and joy will be only to those that are saved through a belief in Jesus; so that if I am a Spiritualist and my mother, wife, and my children are Christians, my portion will be hell, and theirs only will be heavenly. Not any for me, I thank you.

Spiritualism says that the next life is a natural one and that we abide over there in a natural condition, and that the condition of man's soul will decide how much heaven he will have and enjoy.

While we know that Spiritualism includes all mankind, the Christian religion says that only the Christian can be included in the heaven business, and as there is only about one-thirteenth of the whole world Protestant Christians—counting the 70 millions of the United States and Canada as "all" Christians—which they are not, for the Protestants only claim twelve to fifteen millions out of this 70 millions in both dominions—so I cannot see where the wonderful power of the word Christian comes in; for while a full one-third of the population of the world are followers of Buddha, only about one out of one-hundred of the world's population are called Protestant Christians.

The statistics of our churches show this, for out of a population of over 70 millions, the Catholics only claim 9 millions of adherents.

Ida does not say which she wants to be called, a Catholic or a Protestant Christian Spiritualist, but I rather think that she is willing to be called just a Christian Spiritualist, or that is, she wants to be one half a Christian, and one half a Spiritualist. Give me the pure article, every time, and don't mix my Spiritualism up with either Christian, Mohammedan, Mormon, Buddhist, Taoist, Greek, or Catholic religion, and I will get along on that basis; for I know that while Ida claims a good deal for the Rock-of-Ages clause in the Christian religion, the Rock-of-Ages that she refers too is older than Jesus' time, and older than all religions that have ever existed on earth. The true Rock-of-Ages is Spiritualism without the dogmas, creeds, hells, heavens, Jesuses, infant damnations, elections, predestinations, immaculate conceptions, Mother Marys, Holy Ghosts, three-in-one gods, or any of the vagaries and fallacies of that old worm-eaten, crumbling, benighted paganism called the Christian Church.

Therefore, set me down as a Spiritualist, true blue, without one drop of any other ism, or religion in my soul, hoping that upon my advent into spirit-life I may retain enough of the Christ principle within my own soul to make a heaven within that soul; but don't attach modern Christianity, or anything pertaining to it with my Spiritualism.

Buffalo, N. Y. J. W. Dennis.

WHY CHRISTIAN?

Christianity Has Stood as a Wall Against Science and Progress.

Fear of the Devil Makes People Build Churches.

To the Editor:—I was very much amused in reading, "Why not Christian?" the very enthusiastic article by Sister Hawkins, demanding the prefix Christian to Spiritualism.

It is very apparent to the reader that her inherited zeal for the Church and Christians so-called, has not been eradicated by her knowledge of Spiritualism, otherwise she would see the impossibility of trusting midnight darkness with a noonday sun.

The record of the Christians during 1,800 years is the most damnable and bloodthirsty history of any people in existence. All history is full of their persecution and tortures to make people say they believed in the most improbable and impossible lies?

What has Christianity done for humanity, that we should adore and adopt the word as a prefix to our beloved Spiritualism? We have no opponents to-day so bitter and bigoted as our so-called Christians. They and their blind and selfish theological fakers have ever stood as a wall against science and progress, knowing they would be proven false if science was encouraged.

Sister Hawkins claims to be a follower of the lowly socialistic Jesus; will she permit me to enquire how many of her Christian friends are in accord with the socialistic movement of to-day? She must be aware he preached and practiced naught but what the socialists claim, and by every right taught by Jesus it is the ideal government of to-day. Let me add that if Jesus, who is much worshiped by millions to-day, could come and preach as they say he did in the past, the Christians could not have him crucified too soon.

All the fat salaried fakirs in our churches to-day are denouncing the socialists, simply because they want practical deeds as taught by Jesus, in place of the hungry faith as taught by themselves.

Yes, we would probably adore the word Christian, if we knew naught but what Jesus taught. If the churches taught the people to worship the Devil, they would do so as readily as they do the God they have manufactured; and it would be really more logical to do so, as he is much the greater man. It is the fear of the Devil that makes people build churches and add steeples to them, as our sister says she did about Spiritualism—not the love of God or humanity; or the money thus spent would be used for the sick, the blind, the lame and the needy in place of a palace to worship a man like themselves and just as helpless to forgive sins; they would build a hospital to shelter those who needed care and attendance.

In time of distress and woe, what consolation does it give when you have lost your most loved one, when the fakir who is called tells you all flesh is not one flesh? Your cook or butcher can tell you the same, if you do not know it yourself. He will say they cannot come to you, but if you do as he says and have the necessary quantity of faith, you can go to them. How comforting.

From Sister Hawkins article, I fancy she thinks Christ was the means of bringing Spiritualism to the world. If such is the case, her "thinker" is out of order and her reasoning faculties want brightening—Spiritualism is as old as God—if God is spirit and created all things, we having a spark of the divine within ourselves must be as old as God is. I love the word Spiritualism, and if we must have a prefix let us add, "Divine."

WHY NOT CHRISTIAN?

As Viewed by Henry C. Colby.

To the Editor:—I saw in your paper of Oct. 17th an article, the title of which was: "Why not Christian?"

The writer said she defied and challenged contradiction. I will give you a few reasons why I do not believe that Spiritualists should accept the name or title of "Christian," or follow the teachings of Christ. She said that Spiritualists can find no fault with the inculations. "Love thy neighbor as thyself, and a few other quotations she named. Those things were taught more than six hundred years before Jesus was born.

Those were not original with him. I will give you a few quotations of his teachings as recorded in the Bible:

"Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall shall put on."

"If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out.

"If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off."

"If a man sue thee at law and take away your coat, give him your cloak also."

"Think not I am come to send peace on earth. I come not to send peace but a sword." For I come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother."

"And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred fold, and shall inherit everlasting life."

Such teachings as those are an inducement for us to desert our friends in this world, to gain eternal joy in the next. "He that provideth not for his own is worse than an infidel."

Paul was a follower of Jesus Christ, and he taught after this style:

"For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast."

According to those teachings it doesn't make any difference what a man does, if he has faith to believe he is all right. I will quote one more passage from your Jesus or his followers: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

"You take the goody-goody Christians and they endorse the teachings of Jesus as they are in the Bible where he says: "Forgive not only seven times, but seventy times seven." So they think they can keep right on and do deeds that are not lawful for them to do. "Oh!" they say, "we shall be forgiven."

One more passage comes to my mind; it is this: "And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny." It is no matter what sins a man commits, if he only repents at the eleventh hour he is all right, his sins will be washed away by the blood of Jesus.

Does modern Spiritualism teach such stuff as that, or is there a true Spiritualist in this land who would want his name coupled with such teachings?

What has Christianity ever done for this country? I will answer, nothing. It has not done as much in eighteen hundred years as Thos. Edison has in his life time.

I thank my God that I am not a Christian, and I don't want my name coupled with Christianity. If you see a notice in the paper of some bank defaulter, before you get through reading that notice, it will say he was supposed to be a good Christian. Christianity is a cloak to hide behind, and I don't believe Spiritualists want that cloak.

If the people of this world had followed the teachings of Jesus Christ and his followers as put down in the Bible, this world would be a howling wilderness. There wouldn't be a person upon the face of it to tell the tale of misery and woe. Yours for Spiritualism and not for Christianity.

Henry C. Colby.

MILK AND WATER GOSPEL.

Bangor Isn't the Only Place Where an Evangelist Has Said Strong Things.

Friday night Evangelist Sanford spoke to a packed house at the Wayside Mission in Auburn and expressed his opinion of the prevailing church methods for interesting the unsaved. He mentioned fairs, suppers and socials as the usual means employed and then exclaimed: "I'll tell you what it's like. Go down to hell and bring all the devils up; go up to heaven and drive all the angels out, then put the devils in there and place the sinners among them for the influence that the church members have on sinners!"

He added: "When I think of it I feel like kicking a hole through the table here. If such things were done in a church of mine I'd kick a hole through the church. There's a namby-pamby milk and water and molasses gospel preached, while people are hungry for the truth; and then the churches don't look to God for help. They get down on their knees begging rum sellers to help them to pay their bills, begging the Devil to assist. I won't have the Devil's money about my work!"

He declared his belief that only one in ten of the church members were saved or really wanted to see others saved. The stronger his language, the more enthusiastic his audience, groans and cries of "that's so" mingled with his words. He finally announced that if any there didn't enjoy his preaching he did himself thoroughly.—Bangor (Me.) Paper.

BIRTHDAY THOUGHTS.

Methought I stood upon a height;
And, like a panorama grand,
I viewed the Long Ago in light
With years close-ranged on either hand.
Tears lost in smiles, smiles lost in tears,
Were interwoven through the years.

Sore pains of body and of mind
Filled many a year with cold and gloom;
But, even then, oft did I find
A far-off summer radiance loom;
And through my doubts, dull griefs and fears,
Rose angel-thoughts from Heaven's spheres.

And every year seemed like a book
With some leaves blotted, others clean,
Recording every thought and look,
And every motive which had been;
But still Hope's voice, which ever cheers,
Inspired me through those checkered years.

So, every year we soil or gild,
With selfishness or acts divine,
Until Earth's volume is fulfilled
And closed, and sealed with Death's sure sign.
But Death-day is the Birthday bright
Of Earth-souls into realms of Light.

CAREER, CHARACTER AND TEACHINGS OF JESUS.

A JEW ON JESUS.

Treated as a Political Martyr and Jewish Patriot.

What Is Good in His Teachings Not New.

A VIEW OF THE FOUNDER OF CHRISTIANITY TO WHICH CHRISTIANS HAVE NOT BEEN ACCUSTOMED, AND WHICH MAY SEEM STARTLING IF NOT ALMOST PROFANE—THE IDEAS OF A JEWISH SCHOLAR.

[We reprint to-day from that able Jewish magazine, the Menorah, a striking article by Dr. E. Schreiber on the life, career, character, and teachings of Jesus Christ. The attitude assumed towards the subject may seem almost profane to sincere Christians; but Dr. Schreiber writes so temperately, so philosophically, and with so manifest a desire to adhere to historical truth that his argument will be respectfully regarded by them. It is a view of the founder of Christianity to which they are not accustomed, and for that reason they will give all the more attentive consideration to it, especially as it is not presented in a controversial spirit and in tone that is offensive.—New York Sun.]

The following is the article referred to giving a Jewish view of Christ:

The expectation of the Messiah had long been rife among the Jews. The prophets had repeatedly promised the supremacy of Israel, but events had turned out differently. Persia, Egypt, Syria had successively held Palestine in subjection. The existence of their religion was threatened. At the end of the first century before Christ the messianic expectation had created a wild ferment among the population of Palestine. The need was at its highest, help then must be highest, for matters had indeed grown from bad to worse. The political situation was intolerable. The Roman yoke had been fastened upon the neck of the people, and the weight of oppression became tenfold more difficult to support from the sweet taste of liberty that had preceded it after the brief spell of independence in the days of the Maccabees. The rapacity of the Roman governors knew no bounds. A land impoverished by incessant wars and the frequent failure of the crops was drained of its last resources to satisfy the enormous exactions of a foreign despot, and, most humiliating of all, it was Rome, a nation of idolators, which was thus permitted to grind the chosen people.

To this must be added that Pontius Pilate began his administration with an attempt to abolish the Jewish law, exactly as Tiberius did in Rome. The influence of Judaism upon decaying heathenism became so potent and great that the Romans were frightened. Thousands of proselytes from paganism publicly and privately professed Judaism. The Jews in Rome made use of the privileges granted them by Julius Caesar not only in adhering to their religion, but also in making proselytes from all classes of Romans. Indeed, Horace speaks of proselytizing Jews and their Sabbath, which his friend Fuscus would not violate, as he was "one of the many" who observed it. Ovid speaks in his "Art of Love" of the Jewish Sabbath as being observed by the Roman women. Seneca censures the observance of the Sabbath by the Romans, and complains that the Hebrews, the conquered, have given laws to the conquerors. Roman women of high rank sent gifts to the temple of Jerusalem. In consequence of this rapid spread of Judaism in Rome the senate enacted a decree expelling the Hebrews from Rome and Italy, thus setting at naught the decrees of Julius Caesar. But Pontius Pilate went so far as to abolish the Jewish law in Judea itself. He entered Jerusalem, and the army displayed all its ensigns with the effigies of the deified Caesars and other symbols of idolatry, which naturally exasperated the Jews. Pilate missed no opportunity for confiscations, and, private estates being insufficient to gratify his rapacity, he seized upon the temple treasures under a ridiculous pretext. Great despair seized upon the minds of the people. In such times moderation is no virtue, and people choose men for their favorites who will come forward with burning zeal, with a fervor of patriotism bordering upon raving madness. Such men were found and called "Kanneem" or "Zealots," who nurtured an implacable hatred against tyrannical rule. Such unrelenting leaders were Juda Gaulonitis and Thendos, both of Galilee, both proclaiming it a crime against religion to obey the earthly empire of Rome, and both were crucified by the Romans for treason against the senate, as crucifixion was the Roman fashion of public execution of criminals.

There was still another Galilean, charged as guilty of the crime of inciting the populace to rebellion against Rome; he, too, was crucified, and his name was Jesus of Nazareth.

Jesus of Nazareth was nothing less than a political martyr. He, too like Juda of Gaulonitis, had the motto, "There is but one kingdom; it is the havenly kingdom, the kingdom of God." Galilee was always the hotbed of revolutions. The people there were inflamed by the idea that this world was breaking down, and a new one, the future world, would soon appear. While others merely counseled preparation for the heavenly kingdom, promising that a complete reformation of the world would take place, Jesus had the courage and self-confidence to proclaim: The time is fulfilled, the heavenly kingdom has come, and I am this King or Messiah, the Savior of my oppressed people. He was a Jew, a Pharisean Jew, with Galilean coloring; a man who joined in the hopes of his time, and believed these hopes were fulfilled in him. He was brought before a court and it seems that not a large number of followers were with him, otherwise it would have been dangerous to pronounce judgment against him. Pilate, the Roman procurator, asked him: "Art thou the king of the Jews?" He answered: Thou sayest it." Now, as the Jews were Roman subjects, is it a wonder that he was not treated better than any other rebel, but shared the fate of Juda of Gaulonitis, and was crucified? Why, he wouldn't fare better to-day under similar circumstances in any land in Europe. He had boldly attacked all political conditions and the whole civil, social, and religious society of his time, and paid the penalty of all political martyrs.

And now a few words as to the vexed question of the part the Jews have played in this tragedy. The gospels are in themselves not agreed when the trial scene took place. But no matter which of them we follow, the whole account of the trial and execution is flagrantly out of keeping with the well known principles of the Jewish criminal law. Jesus' trial takes place at night, which is an infraction of the Jewish penal code, which orders capital trials to take place in the daytime. It takes place in the private house of the high priest, but the Jewish law lays down the principle that the trials must take place in the chamber appointed for that purpose in the Temple. The execution takes place on a holiday, or, as another account has it a day previous, but the Jewish law does not permit executions to take place on a holiday or the eve of a holiday. Jesus is condemned on his own confession, but according to Jewish law this cannot be done. Two witnesses had to testify to the truth of the charge, and it had also to be shown that the defendant had been warned. The charge seems to have been blasphemy, because Jesus said: "I am the son of God," but every one familiar with the prophets must know that they frequently speak of Israel as sons of God, so that it is hardly probable for a Jewish tribunal to sentence a man to death for merely repeating a biblical phrase. That crucifixion is not a Jewish mode of punishment is well known; the Jewish law knows only death by the sword (harag), by the rope (chenekh), by stone (szekeelah), and by fire (szeripha).

The discrepancies, divergences, and glaring mistakes are so little in harmony with the well established rules of procedure in a Jewish tribunal, that the account of the trial scene, from whatever point we may study it, cannot pass as historical.

Now the question arises: Where is the novelty of Jesus' work? It has been said, for instance, to consist in the overthrow of Phariseeism. But while he now and then rebukes severely some extravagant and unworthy members of the Pharisees he never reproached the party as such. On the contrary, he said: "The Pharisees sit in Moses' seat, and whatsoever they bid you observe that observe and do." The Pharisees were certainly not a "race of hypocrites" and a "generation of vipers." A writer living before the destruction of the temple could not have called the Pharisees a band of hypocrites. The Sadducees were more hypocritical slaves of the letter than the Pharisees, who were the party of the people, the progressive friends of the national cause. Let us not forget that in the main Jesus himself adhered to their principles; that what is called "the sermon on the mount" has been time and again proved to be contained in the prophets and contemporaneous Jewish writings, whose authors were Pharisees. The so-called golden rule had been proclaimed by the Pharisee Hillel thirty years before Christ, and Hillel must have learned it from the Greek Isocrates.

If we read the gospel of Matthew carefully we will find that Jesus does not attempt to abrogate the Pharisaic laws, but only insists upon the great importance of the commandments of the heart. "Woe," he cries, "for ye pay tithe of mint, of anise, of cummin, but ye have omitted the weightier matters of the law; judgment, mercy, and faith; these ought ye to have done, and not leave the other undone." But such doubtless recommendable sayings we find in the first chapter of Isaiah, in the sixth chapter of Micah, in the Psalms and Jeremiah much more emphatically expressed. He also said that "not one jot or tittle shall pass from the law." He only denounces the ceremonies of the age when they interfere with the superior claims of the moral law. But there is nothing new in this. He did not abolish the Sabbath. "The Sabbath was made for man, but man is not made for the Sabbath," is a Jewish saying, and the Talmudic Halakah teaches that danger to life sets aside Sabbatical prohibitions of any character.

Did he preach a new prayer, as is so often claimed? No, the prayer with the chaste introduction, "Our Father who art in heaven," is a combination of Jewish prayers, not a sentiment in it is foreign to the Judaism of his day. Nor is the novelty of Jesus' work to be found in the extension of the gospel to the heathen world. This was the work of the Apostle Paul. Jesus on the contrary, most emphatically said: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and he charges his apostles: "Go ye not into the way of the Gentiles, and go into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not. Go rather to the lost sheep of the house Israel, and as ye go, preach, saying the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

There are, however, some new features in Jesus' teachings which are not contained in the Jewish writings before him. "Love your enemies," is such doctrine. But let us be candid; such a gushing love is not only impracticable but impossible. Our religion teaches: Do not revenge nor bear any grudge. Do not rejoice at the fall of thy enemy. If thy enemy is hungry, give him to eat; if thirsty, give him to drink; if his animal is going astray, bring it back to him. This is as far as humanity can go. What is beyond this is unnatural. Jesus also taught that his followers should renounce earthly treasures. This doctrine is neither new nor good.

The Jewish sect of the Essenes had practically carried out this system of poverty and communism nearly two centuries before Jesus. But it has never found favor among Christians. While certain Catholic orders did not and do not permit their monks to have a goodly share of the things of this world, the monasteries, the church, and its dignitaries have the more. The financial condition of christendom to-day is a flashing commentary on this communistic principle of Jesus. And while some envious, pious Christians never tire to accuse the Jew of being a money-getter they do not seem to care much about the eye of a needle and a camel, or to be particularly fond of another command of Jesus: "If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also." (Matt. V., 40-47). Moses knew and appreciated the value of earthly treasures, and did not command us to disregard them, while Jesus' doctrine in this respect is dangerous to society, to industrial progress, and civilization.

Another doctrine of Jesus, not to care for the morrow, or the carpe diem principle of Horace, is surely not one which has helped to make the United States of America what it is.

Now the principle: Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also; thou shalt not only suffer, but even divest thyself of all sense of honor, thou shalt be a coward in this respect—was not the one which has helped to build up true manhood, character, courage, fortitude.

Nor do we find the precepts attributed to Jesus limited to the Jews and Christians. Buddha, long before Hillel and Jesus, said: "Hatred is not conquered by hatred at any time; hatred is conquered by love." This is an old rule. Lucius, Seneca, and Epictetus, following the stoics, arrive at many of the doctrines taught in the "Beatitudes." In the writings of Plato and in the teachings of Socrates, as preserved by Plato and Xenophon, we come upon this higher spirit. The principle that we should rather suffer than do injustice, insisted on so often as Christian, is distinctly and beautifully taught not only in the Talmud but in the Gorgias of Plato by the grand old man of Greek philosophy; by Socrates, the same who, though he could have evaded the law, preferred to drink the poisoned chalice and to become a martyr of his convictions, saying: "I should gain nothing by delaying to take the draught for a few moments except to laugh at myself for having clung so eagerly to the remnant of a life that had already ran its course."

Strange are the ways of providence. There is a man, who for purity of motive, for courage of his opinions and loftiness of thought, and all the attributes which go to make the true man, has been surpassed by no man in history; this man died for his faith, and yet he remained simple Socrates. Had he lived in an age of religious superstition and moral decrepitude, and among people crushed under the heel of iron tyranny, we doubt not we should have had another Messiah in him.

True, Jesus died a martyr for his ideas, but he was only one of the endless galaxy of martyrs who suffered in the cause of humanity, enlightenment, progress, and science.

The Greeks sacrificed the revealer of human conscience, the Romans the tribune of social reform, the Florentines the precursor of modern revolutions, the Britons the prophet of religious tolerance, the French the Titan of democratic principles, the Spaniards the discoverer, almost the creator of a new world in the immensity of the ocean. They were all soldiers in the great army of mankind, battling in the cause of morality and righteousness; by their sufferings have they helped to draw onward and forward the car of progress.

WHAT NEXT?

Bible of the Past—Bibles of the Present—Bible of the Future.

To the Editor:—Prof. Jos. Rodes Buchanan's paper in the Arena for November, on "Jesus and the Apostles," is very forcibly written as far as language is concerned, but I cannot see what authority he has for the assertions he makes.

He talks about the dawn of Psychometry and telepathy, and he calls the book of Revelations "a wild effusion of meaningless mediumistic insanity." This is not very complimentary to mediumship; and yet every psychic manifestation from the tiny initiatory rap to the latest method of spiritual communication as well as all ancient revelations, prophetical and otherwise, are only different phases of mediumistic power and work.

When Jesus was called "the mediator of a better covenant" (see Heb. 8: 6), it meant the medium or revealer of the new and better dispensation as compared with the old of which Moses was the medium or mediator.

I am glad the Professor does not ignore Jesus as a myth as some others do, but I am sorry that, like others, he has so many hard and bitter things to say about the Bible. I submit if it would not be better to regard the Bible, consisting of the Old and the New Testaments, as simply the religious literature of former ages and liable to become obsolete as the forms of religion they represent have done and are still doing; and thus avoid a great deal of unpleasant and unprofitable (not to say injurious) discussion. Such a course would, in my opinion, better conserve the ends of truth, righteousness and human progress; and our successors, who will be as far above us as we claim to be above the most superstitious bibliolaters can give us credit for human sympathy.

The unprejudiced spiritually minded, who are willing to accept truth wherever they find it, will find many spiritual and beautiful truths in both parts of the Bible, which will give them help and comfort, while passages which are not so they can omit as things that belong to a cruder age and people and not to us.

The woman who aspires to preaching unscrupulously, disregards Paul's injuntion, yet she takes her text from his writings as well as from that of others when she thinks it is appropriate. And when the Bible is superseded, as it will be in a future age by one more suitable to advance humanity, the eternal truths contained in the old will remain.

The approximation of religion to science—a prominent sign of the times—points to the book of Nature written by the finger of God, as the Bible of the future.

I do not pretend to criticise Professor Buchanan. His prestige as a scholar and investigator will give his forthcoming book—which he has already advertised well by his contributions to other publications—a liberal patronage. We hope then to see the evidence on which his bold assertions are founded.

But I am like the Irishman who was arraigned at court for something in which he could see no harm, and when asked, "Are you guilty or not guilty?" he replies: "How can I tell, yer honor, whether I am guilty or not till I hear the evidence." So in this case it is with me a matter of evidence. In the meantime, let us hope that the bitter enemies and overzealous friends of a book which neither of them ever rightly understood, but made it an object of hatred on the one hand and blind belief on the other, will stop their wrangling and tearing of it to pieces to make it over again like an old garment; and turn their attention to personal spiritual culture, which will soon raise them to a position where no stumbling blocks of the kind can interfere with their progress.

Since writing the above I see by The Progressive Thinker that another Bible translation is being made. Already we have the Septuagint or Douay translation (Catholic); the King James (Protestant), and the late international translation, which has been in use, to some extent for several years. Then we have the Woman's Bible, which I know nothing about because I don't care to; and now we are to have another which we may call the Heresy Bible, as a noted heretic is working on it. Last of all Prof. Buchanan proposes to resurrect from the ruins of the biblical literature the genuine unadulterated "Primitive Christianity." What next?

This reminds me of a Chorister who asked a clergyman to have the hymn, "O let my heart in tune be found Like David's harp of solemn sound," changed to "O, let my heart be tuned within Like David's sacred violin."
The clergyman replied why not sing,
"O let my heart go diddle, diddle,
Like uncle David's sacred fiddle.

A STEP IN ADVANCE.

An Appeal to Spirits and Spiritualists.

To the Editor:—About fifty years ago A. J. Davis, an illiterate youth, under the stimulus of mesmeric operations leading to what he called the superior condition, gave to the world Nature's Divine Revelations and a VOICE TO MANKIND.

This Voice was an appeal to men and women to free themselves from the incubus of self and the many consequent evils which prevented them from being honest, just and happy.

I will quote one passage from it, which can be read now with peculiar significance.

"Our country, its interests, wealth and government, are fearfully involved in a peace-destroying war, the result of which will be a powerful reaction on every mind; and this will accelerate the insinuation of these principles and their practice. The era is nigh; the judgment-day, when wisdom shall predominate will soon arrive; and this will banish ignorance, error, prejudice and fanaticism from the earth. A genral revolution is at hand. It is already kindled."

On the heels of this voice came the Rochester knockings and the advent of what is called Modern Spiritualism, which in itself was and is a revolution, stimulating and involving new thoughts and ideas of a reformatory, philosophical and religious character, even in those who believed not in it and those who were its bitter opponents.

Its chief mission manifestly was to place man's immortality on a basis of demonstrated fact instead of faith and speculation, by the cheering evidence of actual communication with those who were supposed to have gone to "The undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns." While this was its leading mission, scarcely second to it was social reform, since the welfare and character of the Spirit-world itself depended upon the social conditions of this world from which originated all its supplies.

It was and is of the utmost importance that a sound foundation be given to the superstructure, eternal in the heavens, now revealed and awaiting us. That foundation was life-work and conditions on earth. Little wonder, then, that the early literature of Spiritualism was burdened with messages of social reform. Possibly later an earnestness in these matters lulled, and in its place we may have had too much useless or idle speculation in doctrinal details and in regarding spirit life, which so woefully beset and ruined that other spiritual movement which gave Christianity to the world. Nevertheless, though all was not done which could and should have been done, much has been done through the efforts of such veterans as J. R. Buchanan, James G. Clark, J. S. Loveland and others in California and all over the Union.

Since the close of the war in 1865 wonderful material changes have taken place. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, States and territories have sprung into existence, covered with a network of railroads, telegraphs and telephones. Wealth has accumulated beyond all precedent; opportunities have been presented to the shrewd and unscrupulous as well as to the thrifty and industrious, and as a consequence class distinction has come into being to a degree never dreamed of by the founders and maintainers of our Republic, in the form of multi-millionaires and the law protected monopolies, which by their insensate greed have produced another class, the involuntary idle and the ever present tramp, the two dangerous classes of society.

Spiritualism in its early gospel preached the prevention and remedy for these evils; but it seems as if Spiritualism itself has been swept into and drifted away with the devastating current; yet I know it is not so. I feel certain that very much of the discontent and unrest—the result of the leaven of reformatory ideas—which prevails among the proletariat, and brings fear and forebodings to the undue wealthy, is due largely to the influences of spiritualistic propaganda. Still I do not think that Spiritualism is occupying the place it should at this present crisis and which the importance of the crisis and the high position and character of Spiritualism demand.

An able article in the June Forum on "The Democratization of England," speaking of the Christian Socialists says:

"They recognize that it is only as an eternal being that man can rationally choose a moral life; that is, a life in which the well being of all men is essentially included. It is a pity that they recognize this only under a form which no longer meets the intellectual needs or commands the moral sympathies of earnest men. Hence it is that the Christian Socialists do not supply in available shape the religious element which the democratic movement so much needs."

While exceptions might be taken to the assertion that "only as an eternal being man can rationally choose a moral life," since there have been so many good, moral and philanthropic men and women who have worked for the well being of all men as far as it was possible for any to do, no matter as to what their belief might be, who had not the slightest belief in a future existence.

Still it must be admitted that there is in the spiritual faith an incentive and a reason for work in social-reform, which does not obtain in faith lacking the perception of immortality.

Spiritualism has a natural tendency in that direction. When Bro. J. S. Barbee introduced the Farmer's Alliance into California, it was in Summerland—that hot bed of Spiritualism—the first alliance had its birth. This Farmer's Alliance all over the Union has done much in educating and arousing the people, but it lacks something and fails just when and where its service are most needed.

There is a widespread consciousness among all classes of there being something wrong somewhere; and there is a vague (though in the main correct,) perception of what that wrong is, but all are woefully at sea as to how that wrong should be righted without inflicting other wrongs of equal magnitude.

Laying aside all reference to religious belief or unbelief and referring only to the religious instinct in man, which determines his aspiration to be more, better and higher, the workings of that evolution involved in our constitution, I make the assertion that no permanent reform has ever obtained that had not in it the enthusiasm of religious aspiration, and referred to in my quotation from the Forum.

Here I believe lies the mission of Spiritualism at the present time, seeing it possesses for such a mission all the necessary qualifications. It is the Spirit which shall speak to the dry bones. It has spoken. The dry bones have taken on flesh and life, and an exceeding great army is standing ready to act, but standing bewildered, staring every where and crying, who shall lead us and tell us what to do?

At this juncture I appeal to the powers behind Spiritualism to give the word. Those powers are largely responsible for the present upheaval and to them belongs the duty to give the marshalling word, the vitalizing, organizing idea which will in wisdom give orderly and victorious action to the vast masses now ready and waiting for it.

Something must be done to stay the hand of oppressive greed which is scooping in the wealth of labor and leaving the laborer so very poor indeed. To poverty is added consequent degradation of every one under its influence and the probable collapse of this promising republic, the fairest home freedom ever enjoyed.

Transfer St. Clare's description of slavery in Uncle Tom's Cabin to the condition of the working man, for Quashy reading working man, and see if it does not fit exactly: "This cursed business, accursed of God and man, what is it? Strip it of all its ornament, run it down to the root and nucleus of the whole, and what is it? Because my brother Quashy is ignorant and weak, and I am intelligent and strong—because I know how, and can do it,—therefore, I may steal all he has, keep it, and give him only such and so much as suits my fancy. Whatever is too hard, too dirty, too disagreeable for me, I may set Quashy to doing. Because I don't like work, Quashy shall work. Because the sun burns me, Quashy shall stay in the sun, Quashy shall earn money and I will spend it. Quashy shall lie down in every puddle, that I may walk over dry shod. Quashy shall do my will and not his, all the days of his mortal life, and have such chance of heaven at last as I find convenient."

Are such to be the conditions of the very nursery ground for the Spirit-world? A stand must be taken against this, and the time to take it is now.

Spiritualists with spiritual forces behind them, a spiritual force within them, spiritual lives as credentials, with every reason and incentive for the work, can step into the arena now and gain a conquest for which mankind will forever bless them and be blessed in so doing.

As to the nature of the work and its details, it is not necessary now to enter. What is wanted is a universal fraternal commonwealth, which the aforesaid Voice to mankind asserted was near at hand. It may imply nationalization of land including productive energy and a hundred other ideas of reform, but to the inspiration and wisdom of the hour must be left the details of the work. The need is an association of workers in whose hearts shines the unobstructed light which lights every man that cometh into the world.

I am aware of the feebleness of my appeal, but in the multitude who read The Progressive Thinker will be found heads, hearts and hands who can make an effective appeal and present it in a clearer manner.

DRINKS "HOLY" WATER

Priests Believe They Have Driven out an Evil Spirit.

YOUNG IGNACIUS KOSIOLAK, WHOSE CASE HAS LONG AMAZED THE MEMBERS OF THE HOLY TRINITY POLISH CATHOLIC CHURCH, ISFINALLY INDUCED TO SWALLOW HALF A PINT OF "CONSECRATED" WATER—HISTORY OF A STRANGE CASE.

Months of patient labor, the faith of devout believers in the church, prayers and penance without number, and lastly the exorcisms of priests yesterday are believed to have prevailed against Satan in the battle to reconcile young Ignacius Kosiolak to holy thoughts at the Holy Trinity Polish Catholic Church.

Kosiolak is a lad of 11 years, who is believed by his parents and priests of their own nationality to be possessed of devils. For nine months he has resisted all aggressions from friends or strangers seeking to advance religious matters with him—even barking like a dog in reply to such attention, and uttering execrations strong enough to put a regiment of pious folk to flight. The sight of a crucifix, beads, or such pictures as Catholics like to look upon was enough to drive the child into a frenzy in which it is said he became either furious or in calm talked wise beyond his years.

Medicine, hypnotism, and faith cure did not avail to change the boy's inexplicable conduct. The parents had come to think there was no hope of reclaiming him until yesterday new confidence seized them, when the Rev. Father Casimir Sztuczko, rector of the Holy Trinity Church, after a series of tests and much trouble of the spirit, succeeded in making the lad drink half a pint of holy water and make the sign of the cross.

Some have said the boy was subject to a peculiar form of insanity. Others thought he was shamming. A few offered the theory that his malady was a form of reaction from too much religious training in his early years. Those who know him best say evil spirits have taken possession of him, and this theory is generally accepted in the parish.

It is told that the boy's hatred of all things pertaining to the church and religion is made doubly mysterious by gifts of tongues and faculty of mind-reading. His feats in this line have made him a source of terror to some persons to whom he repeated chapters of their early lives, which they supposed no man knew—things which in several well authenticated instances happened and were forgotten years before the boy was born.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE CASE.

This incredible situation is the development of less than a year. Ignacius Kosiolak was like any smart, cheery lad up to his eleventh birthday. Last February his mind took on an anti-religous hysteria and he grew worse until thousands of people knew of the queer situation. The story was printed in The Tribune several months ago, and so many people went to the boy's home out of curiosity or pleading interviews in the interest of science that at length the family moved to the other end of the Holy Trinity Parish. Young Ignacius has been kept in seclusion most of the time since and intruders are not given any satisfaction at the humble home.

Upon repeated appeals of the parents Father Sztuczko undertook to drive out the evil spirit. He called into consultation many of his brother priests, and all sorts of experiments were made to locate the seat of the evil one. It was found to be true as the parents had represented that the child had a horror of holy water and would manifest a frenzy when by any deception he was brought in contact with it. He seemed to be able to detect holy water from the ordinary water by intuition. It is said that a single drop of consecrated water was put into his drinking cup and allowed to dry without his knowledge. He refused to drink out of it for three days until his mother washed it one day—again unknown to him—and he straightway took it off the shelf and drank from it. His parents say if a few drops of water which have been blessed be sprinkled upon his clothing while he sleeps, even though he cannot feel the moisture, he will tremble from head to foot, grit his teeth, remonstrate bitterly, and even weep without waking up.

Such stories find more witnesses than a notary could hear through in a week. Among the friends who have looked into the case and who believe these stories are some persons with a knowledge of medicine who would not be easily imposed upon. To one of these, Charles J. Machek, No. 844 Milwaukee avenue, an uncle of the boy, the youngster one day broke forth in a tirade in the Italian language, although it is not believed by his parents he ever heard a word of that language before. He is said to have dragged a few skeletons from the closets of individuals who attempted to influence him, with the effect of keeping the thereafter at a safe distance from him.

FOUGHT BEFORE THE SACRISTY.

When the priests first began their incantations it is said the boy was insolent and abusive. He railed at them, and assuming to be a power above and without the life of the lad of 11 years warned the holy men that they were powerless to move him and would come to grief if they attempted it. When his moods come upon him he always talks impersonally, as if he were the devil and was guarding young Ignacius from oppression. He never pronounces the name of divinity, the saints, or holy things, but drives his friends to terror and fear of avenging lightnings by referring to the Almighty as "the old dog." He fought and kicked and barked like a dog when they first carried him to the sacristy. Before the confessional he fought like a madman. Upon being removed to his home after one of these ordeals the child invariably weakened, sometimes went into a faint, from which he awoke as docile and gentle as a babe until his eyes again fell upon some religious symbol.

For sometime the priests have been working with him. Yesterday afternoon he was taken to the Holy Trinity Church and further incantations were tried upon him. He was seen to lose much of his fractiousness and at length he consented to drink a cup of holy water and make the sign of the cross, although he refused to pray or repeat the name of the divinity or saints. His parents were delighted at even so much progress. Father Sztuczko said last night he would like to take the child into the parish house and devote more time to the study of his case if his own religious duties were not so all-absorbing.

The above is simply a case of obsession that can be easily cured without the aid of the "crucifix" or "holy" water. Spiritualists understand it thoroughly.

THE CAR OF PROGRESS.

Sometimes Progress moves like the snail,
Sometimes like the car on the rail,
But it ever goes toward the light,
Out of the "woods," out of the night.

The Car of Progress never "backs"
Or inverts its tracks,
On and on, with the flying years—
Carrying mind up to the rolling spheres—
And on, still on—thro' fields of space—
Sometimes slow, sometimes in haste.
Ah! who can prophesy or tell—
As the flying years the list doth swell—
What the grand outcome will be
From each new discovery?

"My stars!"
Only think what we know about Mars!
And we've only reached the outer border
In the planetary order.

What may we hope
To see with a bigger telescope?
And with full steam on the car,
Buzzing past each shining star;
Stopping now and then, as the case may be,
To look into some new mystery?

Ah! this is an era grand,
When open wide is the Father's hand,
And all Nature, smiling, waits
To gladly open wide her gates:

"Come in, nor ever fear to go
Where'er the God-Love doth its bright rays throw.
Come in—nor fear the highest steep
Or the lowest deep,
Where'er you see one God-mystery—
It is all yours to know—
Only in Truth's straight channels go."

—Ever go up to it,
Nor fear Superstition's dark edict.

THE COMING AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

BY BURTON AMES HUNTINGTON.

This excellent book is written in the interest of humanity, of liberty, and of patriotism—a book written for the purpose of calling attention to the deadly dangers that beset us on every side, and more especially to the hostile attitude and the insidious wiles of an ever-present, though secret, unscrupulous foe—the Catholics. Washington's words of warning, Lincoln's apprehension and the prophecy of General Grant are all included in the volume. Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, in a recent sermon said: "The church tolerates heretics where she is obliged to do so, but she hates them with a deadly hatred, and uses all her power to annihilate them. Our enemies know how she treated heretics in the Middle Ages, and how she treats them today where she has the power. We no more think of denying these historic facts than we do of blaming the Holy Ghost and the princes of the church for what they have thought fit to do." Every one should read this work. Paper, 300 pages. It will be sent, postpaid, for fifty cents. For sale at this office.

GLEANINGS.

EXTRACTS FROM "LIGHT," LONDON, ENGLAND.

In lately considering the possibility of spirit-life everyday, we very freely looked around to see how everywhere flesh and spirit were separate or even opposed, and how everywhere spirit was deeper and higher and finer and more real than flesh. One need not be a Spiritualist, in the ordinary sense of the word, in order to believe that. It is a very homely fact, it is even a fact with a decided market-value in it. It is, moreover, on the minutest and on the most extended scale, a great fact concerning Nature, whose secrets never lie on the surface and who everywhere say,—The things which I show you and the creations which I evolve before you, they are spirit and they are life.

Now, what we want to insist upon is that all this is intensely practical. There is not a word of mere sentiment in it. Every human creature upon this earth is "a living soul," and all he can say about the body is, that he has a body. The flesh is the instrument; the master is spirit. This is why it is a deplorable or a shameful thing for a human being to be in bondage to flesh, to be, as we say, "a slave to his appetites." We feel, we know, that this is somehow wrong; and so, as a rule, does the slave; or, if he does not, he does not only because he is so low down as not to know he is low down, and then the measure of his immunity from shame and remorse is the measure only of his degradation.

There is no more necessary act in life than this, that we should shake ourselves free from the delusion that God has yet made man. Man is not created; he is being created. It is probably the truth that there is not upon this planet a single perfect type of human being. But, God be praised, there is also probably not one human being who is not on the march and who may not contribute to the advance of the race; for even the obscene, by creating disgust and longing, may advance the race a trifle in purity, and dry unbelievers may deepen the longing for something better, and tyrants may help the peoples of the earth to pant for freedom, and teach them how to get it. So, by all processes and paths, the ideal may be approached—and possibly, ultimately, reached.

There is a sense in which it is true that every human being has an ideal—a most blessed and hopeful fact of human life! The desire may be very low, the ideal may be even contemptible, but the supreme fact is that it is there; and the immensely hopeful fact is that it can be used for anything. Caliban said that Prospero taught him language, and that the use of it was—he knew how to curse; but, in the end, we hear him say: "I will be wise hereafter, and seek for grace"—a wonderful parable, finely setting forth the march of man! One of the secrets of life is to recognize this profound significance of desire, in its great march upward to aspiration and adoration. It is only a question of degree The instinct is there; it only wants instructing and guiding. Low down, it is satisfied with savage tattooing of the skin; higher up it yields us the masterpieces of a Rembrandt or a Henry Moore. All the way may we trace this idealism from a cannibal to a Christ

But here and now, in relation to everything, we may truly say of ideals what we said of flesh and spirit—they vary enormously in relation to the same object or transaction. Take the common-place matter of running a business, whatever it is; there may be ideals as far apart as heaven and hell. One man may think of nothing but making money. He will do, for the people he employs, nothing that he can help doing; he will give them nothing he can withhold. Call him "slave driver," "sweater," what you will, it is all the same to him. His one object is to make money; and every human being he hires he hires as one might buy an orange, to suck it, and pitch the exhausted skin away. Another man may have a keen eye for his work-peoples's comfort. Their work rooms shall be made as bright, as airy, as cosy as possible; the conditions of their service shall shall be made as free as possible from degradation and from irritation: petty tyrants shall be watched and kept to their proper limits; he will be as much of a friend to his work-people as a master can possibly be. Is this mere sentimentalism? We are sorry for anyone who thinks so; for, in proportion as anyone does think so, he may know he is far away even from the average Realism of his day—poor and low as that is.

The time will come when men will run a bussiness on a far higher level than that of money-making only. Mr. Stopford Brooke never spoke more sensibly than when he said: "Men enter the industrial realm at present for profit, and the most successful are those who reap the largest profit. The nobler idea would be to enter the same realm for service, and the most successful would be those who rendered the largest service." Why not? There are many men now who enjoy business as a business. They take a pride in what they are doing. They know the feelings and ideals of a commander of forces. They want to excel: they want to win. That is a good stage higher than the mere desire to make money; for that must always be more or less tainted with something lower even than selfishness. Why, then, should not these "captains of industry" rise to higher stages still? Why not mount up to this fine ideal of conducting a business for the good of everyone connected with it? How this might glorify the old foundries, pits engines, sheds! What new light might shine in everywhere—ay! what new possibilities! It is even conceivable that the idealist might find himself on the track of a new, because untapped, source of wealth. We often ask for faithful servants. Suppose we talk about faithful masters—and mistresses. Let Stopford Brooke say it for us again:—

Whose mind is not lifted and moved to admiration, as he reads Orlando's words to Adam in "As you Like it'?—

"O good old man! how well in thee appears
The constant service of the antique world,
When service sweat for duty, not for meed!
Thou art not for the fashion of these times,
When none will sweat but for promotion."

If this is an ideal for servants, why is not one for masters? If we would have our workmen work for something else than hire, why should not we work for something different in principle, too? We blame working-men for demanding higher wages, when we are all the time striving and plotting for higher profits. We say they don't care for their work; it is their money they want. What do we want?

That is pretty plain speaking, but who can deny its truth?

Of course the difficulties in the way are very great. The ways of the world are hard to set aside, and competitors who stick at nothing are as hard to beat. But what we want to see is that these difficulties only measure the smallness of the world's standard and the poverty of its ideal. He would, indeed, be but a sorry help who tried to make out that the ways of the world were all wrong, and that, for instance, money-making might be left out of the question. That would be ridiculous. Money is necessary, and there is no reason why a man should not say grace after a profitable transaction as well as "after meat." But the true ideal brings in other considerations and finer motives and less sordid desires. It even promises to turn bookbinding and building and cotton-spinning and shoe-making into real "divine service," and to reckon honest work amongst the sacraments of life.

And all this is just as applicable to any other sphere of life. What is true of business is true of home, school, church, club; and everywhere the ideal must come from within, for it is purely spiritual. It ignores or gently puts aside much that the world "expects" of us; it is independent, self-poised, serene. It teaches the greatest of all lessons—Know thyself. It helps to the greatest of all victories—Be thyself. It makes possible the sublimest of all consecrations—Give thyself. And that will one day be the salvation of the world.

STUNNED BY THE NEWS.

We ought not to too narrowly scan what people say or write in the first moments of a great grief; but there are exceptions, and these relate to cases where grief is official or not nearest to the cause of it. Here is a case in point. The Queen, in telegraphing her sympathy to Mrs. Benson, said: "I am stunned by the awful news." Why "awful?" Surely it was almost the very worst word to use. Here is a good man, close upon threescore years and ten, with a splended record of work and life, passing on in an almost ideal way, "in harness," without the distresses of lingering desease; and that is called "awful." "Beautiful" would have been more exact, though it would have been less conventionally acceptable. But probably the kind lady who sent the message did not stop to weigh her words. Probably, however, no Spiritualist would have been in the slightest danger of choosing the grim word which first ocurred to her.

The explanation is that the view of death, bound up as it is with gloomy notions of judgment and the possible terrors of hell, naturally suggests the word "awful." Alas! for what untold agonies is that old view responsible! But the days of release are coming. Death will die. The great transition will be seen to be very beautiful. Order, Law, Harmony, Progress, will be the great words of the future; and perhaps the time will come when the word "congratulation" in some tender and well understood sense, will be used in place of "stunned by the awful news."

TAKE HIS BREATH AWAY.

American Spiritualists are about to hold their Annual Convention at Washington. Their programme is enough to take away one's breath, or, let us say, to make us faintly blush:—

First.—Protection for genuine mediums from unjust persecution on the part of enemies outside of our ranks, and from competition with the frauds and fakirs who have attached themselves, like barnacles to a ship, to our movement, and are Spiritualists in name only. Second.—To assist our magnetic physicians in obtaining their rights in the forty-two States whose law-making bodies have decided that they have no right to heal suffering humanity. Third.—To provide homes, through a pension fund, for our aged and indigent workers and laymen. Fourth.—To provide sanitariums and hospitals in which those afflicted by all kinds of diseases can be placed and cared for by the most advanced methods of medical science, referring now especially to mental disorders. Fifth.—To establish schools of science and philosophy in which the laws governing mediumship and everything pertaining to psychology can be thoroughly taught to all students of occult lore, more especially our embryo mediums. Sixth.—To assist local societies in erecting temples and other suitable places for holding their meetings, to the end that our people will not be ever obliged to ascend to the fourth floor of an uncomfortable building or to meet over a livery stable, a saloon, or a German soup-kitchen, as many of them are now doing. Seventh.—To provide for an active missionary service, by means of which the eager searchers for truth can be made acquainted with the fundumental principles of our religion. Eighth.—To provide suitable music for our gatherings of all kinds, in order that the dismal hymnology of two hundred years ago may hereafter be avoided by us. Ninth.—To establish a National Library in Washington, D. C., where every book, newspaper, and periodical ever published in the interest of Spiritualism can be found for reference by the students of this great science. Also, every book ever published against Spiritualism, that a fair comparison of the merits of the arguments on both sides can be obtained. Tenth.—To establish and maintain, in every city, town and hamlet, Children's Progressive Lyceums, through the instrumentality of which the rising generation may be led into the light of Spiritualism.

OCCULTISM—TAHITIANS.

"Occultism among the Tahitians" is the subject of a lively article in "The Metaphysical Magazine" for October,—useful as helping to drive home the fact which will ultimately have great weight,—that the stamp of something like universality as to time and place is on the leading phenomena of Spiritualism.

The writer of the article refers in the past tense to the Tahitians and their beliefs and practices, an indication, probably, of her opinion that the old religion is being swamped or undermined by western innovations, and made commonplace by Christian missionaries who are not at all likely to understand the beautiful old symbols and deep truths underlying "gross superstitions." The Tahitians were, in truth, a very religious people, best described, perhaps, as nature-worshipers, with a very considerable infusion of Spiritualism, pure and simple. They saw gods or spirits everywhere. Everywhere Nature was alive to them, and to put themselves en rapport with her was their one desire.

But the culmination of all was found in spirit-communion, always, however, barring out materialisations and the sight of spirits in any way. By the writer of this article, the consultation of oracles is very propery indentified with clairvoyance and trance-mediumship, and the uses of crystal-seeing are said to have been well known to the Tahitians, though water was used as a mirror. The following passage shows how near these "pagans" approached to some of the finest insights of modern times:—

Prophets were supposed to speak under the influence of departed spirits, and these were thought still to retain the human form. At death the soul was believed to be drawn out of the head, whence it was borne away to be slowly and gradually united to the god from whom it had emanated. It had to pass through nine conditions in order to reach the tenth—everlasting rest. It is most interesting to know that the Tahitians had concluded that a substance, taking human form, issued from the head of the corpse, because, among the privileged few who have the blessed gift of clairvoyance, some affirm that, shortly after a human body ceases to breathe, a vapor arises from the head, hovering a little way above it but attached by a vapory cord. The substance, it is said, gradually increases in bulk and assumes the form of the inert body. When this has become quite cold, the connecting cord disappears and the disentangled soul-form floats away as if borne by invisible carriers.

A VERY CURIOUS VISION.

In the early morning of Monday, October 5th, I had a vision—or perhaps dream would be a safer word—which may interest some of your readers. I write because I think that other people may have had at this time a similar experience, for as a student of the most ancient of the occult sciences, Astrology, I have reason to think that the influences at that hour may have been general and not peculiar to myself. For I found on referring to the ephemeris, that the psychic planet Neptune (now in Gemini), which is believed to especially rule clairvoyance, formed about 3 A. M. the trine aspect, one of perfect harmony with Mercury, the mental ruler in Libra. Both planets were retrograde, and thereby intensified in their influence; they will repeat the aspect direct on the 29th inst. I may observe that the experience is unique in my case, and that with the exception of a very vivid symbolic and prophetic dream on the morning of August 26th, 1893, which preceded by a fortnight my beginning the study of Astrology, I have never had any "phenomena" when alone, though greatly attracted towards mysticism like my mother (who was a Highlander) in the past. To return, however, to my subject, I was very sleepless that night, and at 2 A. M. by my clock I got up and had a meal, which I often find a partial remedy. On returning to bed, about an hour later I should say, I was suddenly conscious of a beautiful naked boy like the classic Eros, standing on my bed on the left side next to the wall. Very charming and debonair he looked as he stood there luminous in the dark room. I sat up to admire him, and fully conscious of the miraculous nature of the experience, I raised my hand and felt his fat little shoulders and arms, which were as firm and real as anything I ever touched in my life. I now became conscious of the presence of another boy, his counterpart in every way. Both my visitors talked to me with a flow of charming gaiety; but alas, I remember nothing they said, but a remark which preceded another manifestation. "Oh, there's that woman again!" cried the first boy; and I saw with the utmost clearness—for I am very shortsighted in my normal state—the face or death-mask of a pale, rather unpleasant-looking woman, unknown to me, with dark hair and a sad expression, floating near the bottom of the bed. It came quite close to me, receded again and disappeared. I am sorry to say that my little friends vanished at the same time, and in their place stood two earth gnomes or cobbolds in dark brown hoods and coats falling to their feet. One addressed me in a deep gruff voice, and then they too, vanished, and without the least sense of waking or transition, with the glow of surprise still on me, there was I in my bed pinching myself to be sure that I was wide awake.

Of course this had a meaning, an uncomplimentary one I imagine, but this can concern no one but myself—all I want to hear is of any similar experiences. I am inclined to think that the boys were the symbols of tutelary spirits of the sign Gemini, through which Neptune, the spiritual Venus, "last, loneliest, loveliest, exquisite, apart," the ruler of the Celtic race and temperament, moves slowly in his vast orbit on the borders of space. As a curious correspondence I would recall what Tacitus observes in his stately prose of the Celt: "Proximi oceano Cymri, parva nunc civitas, sed gloria ingens."

If it would interest any astrological reader I may state that I was born at Utacamund in Southern India, on July 9th, 1860, with the thirteenth degree of Virgo rising, the moon in the twenty-fifth degree of Pisces near the conjunction of Neptune, and Venus ruling the ninth house (dreams, visions,) in exact conjunction to the minute with Jupiter and thrine to Neptune. This ought to give me splendid dreams, but I regret to say that with one or two exceptions it has not done so hitherto. I am informed by crystal seers and others, that my mystical number is thirty-one, my spirit name Pansy(!) and my stone the opal, "because his thoughts are like flames," or perhaps "because there is fire in his belly," as Carlyle would say. I give these for what the are worth, but I have found Astrology solid ground; in fact, the adamant on which what we call time and date build the lives of men.

My "lunar direction" for this month is the Moon to the conjunction of the "progressed" Venus, in Cancer, an occult sign,—the other two being Scorpio and Pisces. Perhaps this may partly explain my vision, though I sincerely hope it may be the beginning of a new faculty. I can say in conclusion that I have not consciously exaggerated by a single hair's breath.

THE RELATION

That Exists Between the Astral and Earth-Bodies.

The Progressive Thinker for Oct. 31., in a communication signed Alcinous contains fifteen questions, all of which are worthy of careful consideration. The questions are too numerous and varied to admit of even approximately appropriate replies being given on the present occasion, but taking the first in order I will submit my own views on the subject, which your correspondents and others may examine, and accept or reject as to them may seem best.

The question reads: "What is the relation existing between the more etheral body, soul (called astral body by some), and the earth-body?"

By "ethereal body," "soul" or "astral-body" as here used I understand that envelope or covering of the individual spirit, in which that spirit remains enclosed after temporary or final separation from the earth-body. This ethereal body has form resembling that of its physical counterpart. During earth-life the two are united together by an exceedingly fine elastic cord, the snapping asunder of which frees the spirit and enables it to be reborn into a higher life, through the process which we call death. This is so far sufficiently clear and is generally understood by all who possess any knowledge of occult or spiritual philosophy. The origin, use, and ultimate end of the ethereal body, and how it affects or is affected by the earth-body, in short, its relation thereto, are less clear and more imperfectly understood, if understood at all, by many minds. It is with view to an explanation of these points that Alcinous propounds his first question.

Spirit, per se, is formless. It knows no limitation, until it places limitations upon itself by taking on clothing of matter. If that matter be in the form of a human germ it is because it has attained the condition of possible human development. The law of evolution compels all existing within nature to seek higher expression. This law is none the less universally binding because it universally acts in a spiral, not a perpendicular direction. In consequence of this there appear to be periods of retrogression, but these are essential to continual progress. The enclosure of the spirit within the human germ is one of these periods. Immediately on this enclosure it commences to build up the physical body. No sooner, however, has it entered upon this work than decay of that body also commences. Not the billionth part of a second elapses, without matter being taken on and other matter cast off. As soon as we live we commence to die. Not an instant but some part of our physical substance dies (so far at least as it is connected with our individual life), and is rejected by the living form as of no further value to it. What we call death is but the consummation of life's work, the end of the act of dying which commenced with the entrance into this life. But death is itself a rebirth into other conditions, and dying the preparation for that rebirth. The spirit never ceasing in its labors, employs itself while in the physical form in preparing another body fitted for the higher conditions to which in due time it must ascend.

This body, by whatever name it may be called, is the habitation of the spirit in the next stage of life. During each earth career it is usually bound to the physical frame without any power of escape from it, yet it is ever seeking to escape that it may accompany the spirit in flight to broader and fairer fields. Sometimes, however, a temporary excursion of the astral body may take place, either through weakness of the physical frame, the result of sickness, or its extremely negative condition in sleep or trance; or, on the other hand, in those whose psychic powers are highly developed, the strength of the astral body (to which those powers rightly belong) enables it at will to quit its tyrant for a season, the strong magnetic cord then drawing it back to its earth tenement.

The spirit in this life constructs the ethereal body by means of the physical. The use or abuse to which every organ, muscle, nerve and fibre of our present visible, frame is put, is portrayed in the astral. But as the material of which it is constructed is finer, it will more aeternal ascension, ever discarding the the condition of spiritual development to which we have attained. Like the physical body, the astral is mortal. It serves a temporary purpose in another sphere, as that does in this. The human spirit continues the same work of eternal ascension, ever discarding the grosser forms of matter and collecting to itself the less gross.

Spirit is eternal, without beginning or end, and is eternally unchangeable. Matter is also eternal, without beginning or end, but subject to endless changes of combination under the operation of spirit. The ego is spirit, therefore always did and always will exist. The material atoms which combine in forms are constantly disuniting and recombining in other forms. Physical bodies and astral bodies are constructed without end, and perish when no longer of service, but the immortal "I" knows no destruction.

The ethereal body while united to that of earth, is affected by its conditions and surroundings. Thus disease, ignorance and vice in this life darken and enfeeble it. Health, intelligence and virtue produce on it the contrary effects. The exercise of the mind upon corrupting objects causes the astral body, which is in the process of evolution, to possess the elements of corruption. Contemplation of purely spiritual things is its natural training for higher spiritual life.

The subject of the relation between the celestial and earth-bodies might be treated at much greater length, but enough has probably been said to suggest thought for the present

THE CLERGY.

As Viewed by Prof B. F. Underwood.

The old idea of the priest was that of an individual invested with supernatural authority and having secret communication with the divine power. He was believed to have means of communicating with Deity, unknown to ordinary men. He had power to inflict evil or to do good by virtue of his office, which none others possessed.

He belonged to the order favored by the multitude. He could by appeals to the supernatural control or modify even the operations of nature. It is not strange, therefore, that he was a man of the greatest consideration and importance among all other classes of the people, upon whom where conferred the highest honors and to whom were accorded the most valuable privilges.

The modern orders of the clergy are a natural, legitimate evolution from the priestly orders of antiquity. The clergyman of to-day is what he is by reason of the centuries of change that has taken place in religious belief and in the class which pre-eminently represents that belief. The difference between a clergyman of to-day and a priest of ancient Egypt or Judea is great, but it is not greater than the difference between the popular religious beliefs now and then.

As skepticism has developed and Freethought has modified all forms of faith, the importance of the clerical office has become less. It has been divested in a large measure of its sacredness and, while there is still a great deal of reverence for the order of the clergy because of the supposed sacred character of the office, there are multitudes among the masses who no longer believe that the minister is called of God or has any special commission to preach the gospel.

Cultivated minds generally, those at least that are not trammeled by authority, look upon the clerical as they do upon any other profession, that is as one chosen for the purpose of obtaining a living and securing the advantages which professions give over ordinary trades and arts of workmanship.

As the people have become liberal and free-thinking, so have the clergy, until to-day we have the anomaly presented in the fact that there are men whose office it is to teach in regard to things unknown, inaccessible to ordinary minds, who do not believe in any of the mysterious things for which their profession stands. There are in the pulpits Agnostics, hundreds and thousands of them, who are in doubt even as to the existence of a personal deity and who have no belief whatever in any special communication with divine power, who have outgrown entirely belief in the efficacy of prayer, who have discarded the doctrine of the sacrificial atonement and salvation through a redeemer, who have no belief in a local heaven or hell, and who strongly doubt whether there is any personal, conscious identity beyond the death of the body. It is not often that such persons avow and preach this extreme doubt and disbelief. Occasionally this is done, but to their cost, as in the case for instance of Rev. Rowland Connor and Rev. Mr. Milne, of the Unitarian denomination. On the other hand, extreme forms of skepticism, as represented by those who are called "infidel," have been modified by science, and outside of the pulpits and the churches are multitudes of skeptics and Freethinkers who are, in a deep sense of the word, really religious men and women.

Notwithstanding the radical change that is taking place in the position of the clergy, the class feeling persists strongly among them, whether they are orthodox or heterodox. The bond between a Presbyterian or an Episcopalian and a Universalist clergyman, notwithstanding the great difference in their religious belief, is stronger than that between the average liberal preacher and a teacher of rational religious thought who is unordained and outside of the pulpit. There is a feeling of caste among the clergy. When a man becomes a clergyman, unwittingly he feels a certain, perhaps undefined superiority over lay teachers, based, to some extent, upon the old conception by which he is influenced of sacredness of that office. The most liberal clergymen give but scant recognition to any religious teacher outside of their profession. To be of any consequence to them, to be entitled to recognition by them, to deserve notice in their papers for the work which he does, however valuable, he must be ordained; that is, he must receive the consecrated approval of the clerical fraternity of some denomination.

One who without the ministerial mark attemps to teach, will find himself, so far as the clergy are concerned, in a condition of isolation; will find himself ignored. There is an implication in the clerical attitude toward him that he is not authorized to teach on religious subjects. The result of this treatment is to induce lay teachers to seek affiliation with the clergy, to receive ordination, and to become professional preachers Every accession of this kind strengthens the clerical order and, of course, leaves the unordained, the unclerical, religious teacher, more and more upon his individual resources, without the aid or sympathy of those of the same belief, who might, but for their caste feeling, give him essential aid in his work.

It may be affirmed that every valuable reform in its inception, when extremely unpopular and when it has required courage to espouse it and to work for it, has been opposed by the clergy. It was so in Egypt; it has been so in all countries in which the clergy have had power and influence. They represent the conservatism of the times in which they live. Even the more liberal of them in this day yield to the temptation to remain silent in regard to glaring evils, to remain indifferent to needful reforms, to pander to wealth and power and influence, and thereby retain their large salaries and their popularity without sacrifice of ease and comfort. Of course there are exceptions to this rule, but they are comparatively few. Taken as a class, the clergy, it may safely be said, are opponents of every innovation and enemies of progress. This is less so, of course, where churches are not established and where there is a great variety of religious belief, as there is in this country. Under the establishment in England, there has never been a reform, not one, which originated with the clergy or inside the church, and there has never been a progressive movement started that has not received the opposition of the clergy of the Anglican church. It is not strange under the circumstances that reformers become impatient with the clergy and sometimes severely excoriate them, as Garrison, Pilsbury and Foster did in anti-slavery times.

THE CRIME OF SUICIDE.

Illustrated by a Story of Kindergarten Experience.

Two Wrongs Never Make One Right.

"Would it be worth the having or the giving?
The boon of endless breath?
When, for the weariness that comes of living,
There is no cure but death?"

"Unless a man would marry a gallows, and beget young gibbets. I never saw one so prone!"

The author of my first quotation is unknown to me. The second is from Shakespeare's "Cymbeline." The jailer has in charge Posthumous, a man who seems to be regardless of captivity, and careless as to his future doom. On the whole, he is more inclined to welcome death, even in a painful shape, and under circumstances in themselves degrading. He seems to think that the conclusion of his physical life may free him from mental tortures. The jailer thinks it would be hard to find another man as "prone," or ready to accept his fate, reconciled, relaxed, practically supine and prostrate as the poor animal before the officiating priest, the altar fires already lighted, the preparation made for stroke or stab.

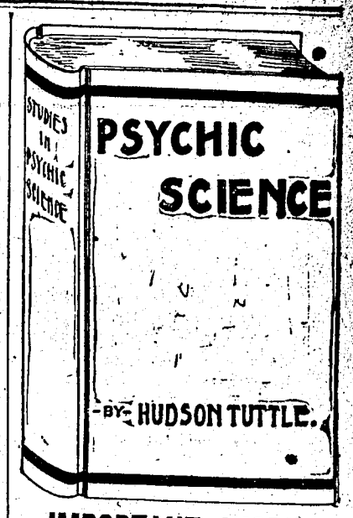
This "prone" or reconciled state, as to prospective death, the willing and cheerful casting away of the physical body is not always a healthy mental condition. It does not always imply courage; it may indicate a want of it. Let us look into this.

St. Paul held that "there is a natural body and there is a spiritual body." I believe that we organize our spiritual bodies for ourselves, out of our daily lives, or rather, out of our adjustment thereto. That life is a DUTY, a responsibility, a discipline, an obligation, from which we have no right to free ourselves by our own acts or at our own option. I believe our earth to be but one of the primary schools or grades of the universe. A. has not learned that "one plus one makes two." He says he has a perfect right to choose, himself, out of his individual understanding, he being all of four years of age, whether he shall learn this or not. He has come to the conclusion that he will not do so. It is not convenient, it involves too much application of his mental powers to a distasteful task. He was placed in the kindergarten by his parents. It was through no act of his. Has he not a right to leave the kindergarten of his own volition when and how he pleases?

Is not his own life, his indeed, to do with as he pleases? Is he not as wise as his parents? Doesn't he know more than his teacher?

Well, he will leave the baby class, where Susie Jones laughed at him! He will go over to the university, where the other young men are his equals. He leaves behind him a word of apology and regret, and half-glad, half-sorry, but on the whole, pretty determined, tolerably brave, like the Irishman who was frequently sober. He leaves the "baby" room, crosses the hall, opens the street door, waddles around the corner with his apron full of his most cherished belongings, and dragging his toy cart behind him with a string, and he enters the neighboring college of Law and actually makes his way to the principal class room. He presents himself before the dignified professor who doesn't like children, and the amazed class, with "Men, I'm one of you" The Janitor has followed close upon his track. The professor says coolly: "Throw that little devil out of the window, or stuff him into the furnace, and shut the door after you." A., kicking and screaming, is ignominiously thrown out into the street, playthings and all. A crowd of street urchins soon deprives him of his toys, and they "have no end of fun with him." A "tramp" from the alley appropriates to his own uses A's copper cents from apron pockets, the little gold chain and locket from that manly neck, the ring from the chubby hand, the ring that "mamma" ties on with pink ribbons that pass around the dimpled wrist. The shoes and stockings, too, are worth something, at least a glass of whiskey. Ultimately A. finds himself once more in the kindergarten, under changed conditions. He is henceforth closely watched. He has learned that asserting himself to be a man has not made him one. That there were more dangers and trials for him, outside the kindergarten than he ever met within it. He begins to realize that after all, is his proper place.

What do those in spirit life (as far beyond this plane of existence as the College of Law, with its bearded students, is beyond the kindergarten)—think of the suicide, the utter fool, who asserts that he did not enter earth-life of his own volition; that his parents brought him into this world club-footed, or hump-backed, afflicted with scrofula or leprosy? Has he therefore a right to further deform himself? Because they, his forerunners, inflicted upon him an ailing or diseased physical body, has he a right to mutilate his spiritual body? To enter another plane of life, with a disease upon him far worse than leprosy itself? With a taint permeating his being far worse, infinitely more objectionable than the taint of scrofula or even syphilis?



When, in any plane of existence, did two wrongs ever make one right? Suppose the afflicted through hereditary causes, could know that living out his natural life here, "taking it as it comes," and bearing all with heroic patience, he could enter a new plane of life through the natural death of the physical body, there to realize the possession of a spiritual body of health, beauty, perfection? Would it not be worth his while to "suffer and be strong?" There is no language sufficiently strong for the proper denunciation of the shameful crime of suicide.

The College of Fine Forces.

Dr. Babbitt has moved his College of Fine Forces from East Orange, N. J., to 253 South Broadway, Los Angeles, California, as he considers the brilliant sun of that State especially adapted to experimentation in his grand science. The New Jersey Board of Trustees are still in operation, and those who prefer the diploma under the New Jersey charter to that under California can have it by submitting their final examination answers to Prof. Alexander Wilder, who is president of that board. Further information may be received by sending a stamp to Dr. Babbitt, for his new catalogue.

"The Woman's Bible. Part I. The Pentateuch. Comments on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy." The contrast between the thoughts of these brave women and the thoughts of the orthodox world during all time past, is very striking. Keen analysis, ripe scholarship and fearless adherence to the right, characterize this very interesting effort of some of the brightest minds of to-day. For sale at this office. Price 50 cents.

IMPORTANT WORK.

Studies in the Outlying Fields of Psychic Science.

A WORK BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

WITH FULL DIRECTIONS HOW TO INVESTIGATE SPIRITUALISM, DEVELOP MEDIUMSHIP, AND FOR THE FORMATION OF HOME CIRCLES.

This second edition, with important additions, is the second effort in the New Departure of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. It is a book which marked an era in the methods of thought on psychic subjects. It was first to take this hitherto unexplored realm, and its treatment is entirely original. It outlined a plan of study and investigation, which, new as the subject was, appears to be the only one the student can pursue, to arrive at satisfactory results.

A great many psychic clubs and reading circles have adopted it as a guide, and one college has taken it as a text book. In its field it stands alone, and is the student's only helpful manual.

Since the author wrote the "Arcana of Nature," by almost purely automatic controls, his inspiration has made no higher flight than in "Psychic Science."

Price Reduced About One-Half.

In our New Departure, determined to give Spiritualists—instead of the dearest, as hitherto—the cheapest literature of any denomination, sect or organization, we have not only enlarged the book by twenty pages, but reduced the price from $1.25 to 75 cents.

A wealthy Spiritualist purchased copies at full price and presented one to every college and academy in the New England States. We have reduced the price until no one will be prevented from possessing it, or deterred, for want of means, from sending it forth on missionary duty.

Woman, Church and State.

A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages, with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate.

BY MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE.

THE AMOUNT OF VALUABLE INformation succingly and clearly stated in this volume of 554 pages is amazing. The title, as above given, fails to convey an idea of the fulness and completeness with which the subjects are treated. The Matriarchate, or Mother-rule, is the theme of the first chapter, in which much lore, quaint, queer and curious, is brought to view in elucidation of the subject. This is followed by chapters on Celibacy, Canon Law, Marquette, Witchcraft, Wives, Polygamy, Woman and Work, The Church of To-day, Past, Present, Future; and there is not a chapter in the book that is not handled in a masterly manner, and that for quantity and quality of information, is not worth the full price of the volume. It is packed with knowledge well-arranged, and intensely interesting from beginning to end. No one can possibly regret buying it; it is a valuable addition to the library of any free and truth-loving mind.

ROMANISM AND THE REPUBLIC.

A WORK THAT EVERY LOVER OF his country should have at hand for consultation. By Rev. Isaac J. Lansing, M. A. This is a most able work, consisting of a Discussion of the Purposes, Assumptions, Principles and Methods of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy. The work contains 447 pages, and may be considered a mine of valuable information for every patriot in the land. Price $1. For sale at this office.

The Progressive Thinker.

Published every Saturday at 40 Loomis Street

J. R. FRANCIS, Editor and Publisher.

Entered at Chicago Postoffice as second-class matter.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will be furnished until further notice, at the following terms, invariably in advance:

One year	$1.00
Clubs of ten (a copy to the one getting up the club)	7.50
Thirteen weeks	25 cts
Single copy	5 cts

REMITTANCES.

Remit by Postoffice Money Order, Registered Letter, or draft on Chicago or New York. It costs from 10 to 15 cents to get checks cashed on local banks, so don't send them unless you wish that amount deducted from the amount sent. Direct all letters to J. R. Francis, No. 40 Loomis Street, Chicago, Ill.

CLUBS! IMPORTANT SUGGESTION!

As there are thousands who will at first venture only twenty-five cents for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER thirteen weeks, we would suggest to those who receive a sample copy, to solicit several others to unite with them, and thus be able to remit from $1 to $10, or even more than the latter sum. A large number of little amounts will make a large sum total, and thus extend the field of our labor and usefulness. The same suggestion will apply in all cases of renewal of subscriptions—solicit others to aid in the good work. You will experience no difficulty whatever in inducing Spiritualists to subscribe for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, for not one of them can afford to be without the valuable information imparted therein each week, and at the price of only about two cents per week.

A Bountiful Harvest for 25 Cents.

Do you want a more bountiful harvest than we can give you for 25 cents? Just pause and think for a moment what an intellectual feast that small investment will furnish you. The subscription price of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER thirteen weeks is only twenty-five cents! For that amount you obtain one hundred and four pages of solid, substantial, soul-elevating and mind-refreshing reading matter, equivalent to a medium-sized book!

TAKE NOTICE!

☞ At expiration of subscription, if not renewed, the paper is discontinued. No bills will be sent for extra numbers.

☞ If you do not receive your paper promptly, write to us, and errors in address will be promptly corrected, and missing numbers supplied gratis.

☞ Whenever you desire the address of your paper changed, always give the address of the place to which it is then sent, or the change cannot be made.

A Gross Misrepresentation.

How strange that the average pulpiteer is always prating about the good government God has given us, and the means he has provided for its preservation. Rev. E. A. Orr, of this city, in his discourse on the eve of the late election, is reported in the Chronicle to have said:

"God has given the people a peaceful weapon, the ballot, and has, by education and agitation, awakened them to the consciousness of their power and their duty."

Nothing can be more false. For ages the church taught God gave nations kings. They were anointed, or, in Christian language, were christened kings by the priests, under the absurd pretense of being agents of God. The two powers—priest and king—ruled the people, whose province it was to obey. Republics and self-government disappeared with the rise of Christianity, and monarchial governments reigned supreme. The American revolution was commenced with no expectation of arraying itself against the throne. It was the pen of Thomas Paine, the author-hero of that revolution, who insisted that the people should cease to rely upon heaven's aristocracy for a government, and set up one of their own wherein the ballot should be king. His "Common Sense," written on drumheads, by camp-fires, between long marches, was published in January, 1776, and was the first open assault in America, or in the Christian world, upon a monarchial government. Edition after edition followed in rapid succession. It was read, by order of Washington, to the soldiers in the field; it was discussed by them at the mess table; it entered nearly every mansion, farm house and log cabin in all the land, and paved the way for the immortal declaration of July 4th, following, which, though credited to the masterly mind of Thomas Jefferson, was unquestionably drafted by the more brilliant Paine.

God's representatives, the clergy, opposed Paine's positions. They taught that all governments were from God. "The powers that be are ordained of God." They resisted the contemplated new government at every step, and the more prominent clergy fled the country, among whom was John Wesley, founder of Methodism, and Rev. Samuel A. Peters, of the Church of England, both of them misrepresenting and falsifying the condition of the country. The priestly hatred of Paine then took root, whose work, says Botta, the Frenchman, in his History of the War of the Revolution, Vol. I, page 343, "was one of the most powerful instruments of American independence." It culminated when his Age of Reason, the legitimate outgrowth of his political writings, was given to the world some two decades later.

No, it was not God who gave freemen the ballot. It was wrested from kings, sustained by priests, on many a gory battlefield by the strong arms of the people, and it is a gross libel to credit it to any other source.

From the very inception of our government, with the ballot at its base, priestcraft has been struggling to crowd God into our fundamental law. Unwilling to concede to the fathers of the Republic the credit their due, they have been trying to make real what Rev. Mr. Orr claims; but we trust that period is very distant when a hierarchy shall succeed "a government of the people, by the people and for the people."

A Paleontological Relic.

"The fossil remains of a hog have been recently discovered in the 'Bad Lands' by an expedition led by Professor J. E. Todd, State Geologist of South Dakota, and are said to prove that the animal must have been as large as a medium-sized elephant."—News item.

Those "Bad Lands" of the Northwest, through their fossil remains, have thrown a world of light on primeval history. Some few species, as the horse, seem to have been dwarfs compared with their present size, but the great mass of animals have deteriorated in stature.

Does the general reader comprehend the significance of those fossils, bones metamorphosed into stone? They tell of a long distant age when those Bad Lands were covered with a dense flora and fauna, drawing their nourishment from a rich alluvial soil. They tell of a submergence, when all those now elevated plateaus were depressed, and became the bed of a mighty ocean, over which it rolled its flood, while the monsters of the deep sported on its waves, or crawled along its slimy bed. They tell of an upheaval, after perhaps millions of years; of a receding of the waters; of the adaptation of the country to the support of a new form of life; of man delving in the rocks, finding fossilized forests buried in the sand, or encased in stone, and the bones of animals who lived in those forests, and roamed at will undisturbed by man, changed into stone, and those stones sought for with much labor and expense, filling the great museums of the world with a revised and corrected history of creation.

Multitudinous Myths.

The myths of the past were not limited to the false in history, the deceptive in biography, or the errors in philosophy. They were equally misleading in the physical world. Those errors gave rise to false systems of theology. Though myths fade away under the light of true knowledge, the deductions founded on a misconception of facts remain for ages after. The origin of evil, as taught by the church, was built on the conception of an almost infinite Devil. Though belief in the latter has mostly disappeared, as has the empire over which he presided, yet portions of the old faith built on the fictions of ignorance and superstition still survive. The geographical student of two to three generations ago read:

"Norway is remarkable for the maelstrom, a dreadful whirlpool which draws in ships and even whales, from a distance of several miles."

This gigantic whirlstream is illustrated in the school book from which the extract is made, and represents the revolving waters, tunnel-shaped, into which a ship had been drawn, its stern about disappearing in the awful vortex. Long years have passed since the impressions were made on the writer's youthful mind of that depression in the sea. It was recalled by the reading of a recent very interesting pamphlet, wherein this whirlpool was presented to illustrate a point. The author says:

"It is caused by an opening in the floor of the ocean, through which the water rushes, and as it runs towards the outlet from all directions, approaching and crowding toward the center, it impinges on itself, and this impingement forces it into a revolving motion in the direction given by the strongest inflow."

We beg to assure our friend, the author, that he was misled by his early teaching regarding this "opening in the floor of the ocean." It was a fiction of the early navigators who visited the Loffodon Islands, a misrepresentation which science has long since disproved. Says the American Cyclopedia:

"This whirlpool is produced by the current that rushes in and out of the Great Fiord, which lies between the Loffodon Isles and the west coast of Norway."

The facts are: The channels between two islands and the main land are narrow and tortuous, and generally of great depth, giving immense force to the tidal currents, ebbing and flowing every six hours, which the uncultured seamen who ventured to enter these northern seas mistook for a whirlpool. They supposed there was a hole in the flat earth through which the waters of the ocean were discharged to the unknown regions below, a mighty sewer, if the reader pleases, where the excess of water let down from the "windows of heaven" and borne away by the rivers to the ocean, was carried off, preventing the continents from being overflowed. When the earth was proved a globe, and the "windows of heaven" were proved a myth, and the interior of the earth was demonstrated to be a solid mass, the drainage of the ocean, other than is carried on by evaporation, was relegated to the myth-makers, who constructed a flat earth resting on pillars, as the Bible tells it, and as ignorant churchmen still insist is the way it is supported.

In every domain of knowledge he who builds a belief on the teachings of the Bible, or deductions therefrom, finds himself at fault.

Celestial Visitors.

Three comets are reported in the heavens, which are advancing on the earth at an enormous speed, estimated at one million miles an hour. Two of these erratic visitors are well known, but the third is a stranger. What deviltry he may be up to we can't know till his nearer approach.

Our elderly readers will remember the comet which put in an appearance in the spring of 1843, with a fiery tail of 108,000,000 miles in length, stretching nearly across the visible heavens. Wm. Miller, the inventor of the Millerites, had predicted several years before a general wind-up of all things terrestrial in April of that year. About the first of March the tail of the dread messenger of heavenly vengeance absolutely entered the earth's orbit. Miller's interpretation of the prophecies was at a premium, but before the day of the grand wind-up Mr. Comet, with his elongated tail probably between his teeth, took his departure, and soon after was lost to our solar system.

The new visitors come unheralded, and their mission is unknown. Now for another bull from the Pope bidding the comet to keep outside of his dominions, and the Adventists may as well revise their predictions and fix another time in the near future for the general conflagration.

Merited Compliments.

Samuel P. Putnam, Esq., President of the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation, tells in the New York "Truthseeker" of his having addressed the National Convention of Spiritualists, at Washington. He says:

"I enunciated in brief order the 'Demands of Liberalism,' and they were in harmony with the spirit of the meeting. The Spiritualists are our allies in the great battle for human freedom. The question of the length of life is a minor one compared to the question as to the quality of life. Immortal or not, we desire to be free. Modern Spiritualism has been a powerful opponent of priestcraft, and has given hope to man instead of fear. On this side the grave our ranks are together for liberty, for justice, for humanity. I find staunch supporters of secular government in President Harrison D. Barrett, Secretary Francis B. Woodbury, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Moses Hull, and many others on the roll of this Association. In our future contests with ecclesiastical bigotry I feel sure these friends will be our co-workers, faithfully to the end, as they were last winter in the halls of Congress."

Coming to Their Senses.

The courts are clearly partaking of the spirit of the age, and are slowly coming to their senses. Charles Benning was prosecuted at Fond du Lac, Wis., for Sabbath-breaking, by threshing grain on Sunday. The defendant claimed it was an absolute necessity, as the grain was over-ripe, and rain was threatened. Both district attorney and court agreed no offence was committed and the case was dismissed. Churchmen want God, Jesus Christ and the Bible in the Constitution to cure all such defects in legislation.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

A Review of the Situation Present and Past.

Election now is over, and people generally can commence thinking about something besides the various vexed questions connected with politics, and the election of a presidential candidate. During this year of intense excitement and hard times, many people have forgotten that THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER has an existence, and that it is the largest paper published to-day in the interests of Spiritualism. Any one who carefully and critically examines its pages can see at once its cosmopolitan character, and the important part it is playing in the great reformatory movements of the day.

In order to fully realize the full extent of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER'S claims to recognition on the part of Spiritualists, place it by the side of any other dollar Spiritualist paper, and then you will see the merit of its claims to being the leading Spiritualist journal in the United States. Without any intention or desire to disparage the work that other papers are doing, THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER has stood forth from the start as the one unique representative of sterling, unflinching honesty and integrity in business transactions, built up through untiring industry, without the aid of a "syndicate" or "backer," and without squandering the hard-earned money of stockholders.

THE FALL AND WINTER CAMPAIGN.

The fall and winter campaign of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will be especially brilliant; its pages will be chock full of matter that every Spiritualist should be familiar with.

A MOST LAMENTABLE FACT.

It is a lamentable fact that not one Spiritualist in three hundred takes a Spiritualist paper of any kind. The prepaid circulation of all the Spiritualist papers combined, outside of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER does not exceed probably 15,000—a fact to be deeply regretted. Just think of the great mass of ignorance in our ranks in reference to this great movement. Not one out of twenty-five of those who usually attend Spiritualist meetings ever patronize the Spiritualist papers. Ask one of them if he saw the magnificent address of President Barrett to the National Convention, and he will open his mouth, stare around, and will not know what you mean. Ask a few more questions and you will learn his superlative ignorance of what was done at the National Convention at Washington. This is the actual condition of the great majority of Spiritualists, who will patronize no Spiritualist paper, to the extent even of two cents per week.

IS THE STATUS OF SPIRITUALISM CHANGING?

The fact that the Spiritualist dollar press is languishing like sick kittens, outside of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER (and it has nothing especially to brag of), does not strike a "heathen," (one who rejects Spiritualism) as a very favorable omen, nor does it look well for Spiritualists generally. The old Better Way, of Cincinnati, flourished along with "bright prospects" continually before it, but never reached. With one magnificent swoop it changed its name to Light of Truth, repudiated the stockholders who aided in building up the subscription list, and with glaring headlines, announced its "bright prospects," which, too, have never been attained, and it went right along losing money, until in order to get other "bright prospects," it moved to Columbus, Ohio, having discharged C. C. Stowell, as unworthy of the position of editor, thus sustaining in all respects the opinion of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER in regard to that individual. The paper has never been self-sustaining.

ANOTHER DEPLORABLE EXAMPLE.

The grand old Religio Philosophical Journal, which had a circulation under S. S. Jones, of 25,000, dwindled down to a circulation of about 1,500, and eventually fell into the hands of an excellent man, Mr. Newman, and finally drifted to California for recuperation, where its proprietor did not have money enough to move it from San Diego to San Francisco. There are several other little Spiritualists papers, as diminutive in circulation as they are in size.

ANOTHER SPECTACLE—INDEED.

It is sad to think of the pauper-like condition of the patronage of some of the Spiritualist papers—"fair prospects" before each one constantly, but which do not seem to be ever realized. Who is to blame for this sad, deplorable condition of one feature of Spiritualism but Spiritualists themselves? In the case of Light of Truth, however, its loss would have been lighter if it had not been for the grossest mismanagement and incompetency. Each Spiritualist paper should have a circulation of 15,000, and thus strengthened, it could do the work of the angel-world. But as there is only one Spiritualist in three hundred who will subscribe for a Spiritualist paper, it is amusing to see the competitors of each paper trying to get that subscriber.

THE IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Why has THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER prospered somewhat ever since its first issue? If you will visit 40 Loomis street, you can readily understand that there is a combination of circumstances surrounding it, and which attended its birth, that cannot be found elsewhere in the United States. In the first place, you will see a plant worth $30,000, all paid for, and all tributary to THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. But that is not all. There are other circumstances possessed by no others that combine to make the paper what it is. This paper will receive no gifts or donations, and in that respect it is unique, and is the one paper that Spiritualists should take special pride in sustaining.

ANOTHER IMPORTANT FACT.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER has always adhered to the prepaying system. The plan of sending out a paper after the time paid for has expired is, in every respect, unbusiness like, and no Spiritualist paper has ever permanently prospered that has adopted that method. Sooner or later it dies. It may have "fine prospects" before it, but never attained. It may print a picture of a rented building, of a Mergenthaler Linotype Machine which it does not own, and in soft, winsome words speak again, for the twentieth time, of "fine prospects," which in the end will probably crumble to the dust, as they have heretofore.

A DUTY YOU OWE THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

The status, past and present, of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, commends itself to every Spiritualist. They should go to work at once to increase its list, and thereby extend its influence for good. Get your neighbor to subscribe for it. See to it that those who do not already take THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER subscribe for it, and thus sustain it on its present prosperous basis.

It is the only dollar paper published in the United States that has been self-sustaining. See to it, Spiritualists, that it remains in that fortunate condition.

AN ENTIRELY NEW PROGRAMME.

One of Great Importance to Spiritualists—It Will Be Announced at an Early Date.

The American Secular Union and Freethought Federation.

This body of earnest workers, with Samuel P. Putnam as president, has been in session in Chicago, closing its labors with a reception and meeting on Sunday. Mr. Woodbury, the able secretary of the National Spiritualists' Association, and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond took an active part in the proceedings. If they could attend its sessions each year they would convert it to Spiritualism.

Thirsting for Blood.

"Dr. Joseph Parker, of the City Temple, London, told his congregation the other day that the country would only attain a healthy religious and moral condition through plenty of bloodshed."—News item.

If blood must flow for the advancement of civilization, let it be drawn from the veins of those who have deluged the earth with gore in the propagation of their creeds.

A Thus Saith the Lord.

The Bloomington Pantagraph represents there is an immense quail crop this year, and says the roar of guns is heard in all directions. Then it says: "The farmers are adverse to the hunting of quails on their farms because the birds are great cut-worm destroyers." And then:

"A few of our Christian people here are the worst for slaughtering quails."

Can the reader guess why Christians are the most inclined to murder these innocent wild-fowl, the best friend of the agriculturist of all the feathered tribe? It is because they give trust to that "Thus saith the Lord," Gen., ix, 3:

"Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things."

The Premium Encyclopædia.

Several weeks ago we withdrew our offer to send the Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World to new three months' subscribers. We have been at great expense in sending out this premium, knowing that thousands of Spiritualists would want it without any intention whatever of becoming permanent subscribers to THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, for, as a rule, they take no Spiritualist paper. But the inducement of getting a 400-page book, worth fifty cents, and the paper also for three months, all for twenty-five cents, brought them temporarily to the front. The great good that the thousands of copies distributed will do, compensates us for the great expense we have been to in this direction, in endeavoring to illuminate the minds of those who do not choose to patronize the Spiritualist papers.

We still have a few hundred volumes on hand of this "Vol. I" of the Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, in paper cover, which we will send to all new six months' subscribers, and also to each of our present subscribers who renews for not less than six months, and who sends us at the same time one new six months' subscriber.

It is far better for the new subscriber to take the paper for six months, for, during that time he will begin to see the necessity of continuing it.

INVEST $1,200 IN STAMPS.

Reformers Send Out 200 Mail Sacks Full of Letters.

Beaver Falls, Pa., Nov. 8.—Special Telegram.—One of the largest petitions ever seen in this or any other country will result from an appeal that will go out through the mails to-morrow from the National Reform Association of the Covenant Church. Last evening 60,000 memorials and blank petitions were placed in the Beaver Falls Postoffice with special instruction to the postmaster that they must not be mailed on Sunday. They were addressed to people all over the country, who were requested to secure signatures to the petitions. The latter were addressed to Congress and urged that the joint resolution asking for the recognition of God in the constitution be adopted. It required 200 mail sacks to hold the 60,000 large envelopes, and the mail bill was $1,200. The petition will be sent to Congress, and is expected to attract much attention.—Inter Ocean.

Thus it will be seen, the fanatical pseudo-reformers are at work determined to destroy true fredom and liberty of thought in our country. The friends of liberty unshackled by so-called Christian dogmas, must be alert to defeat the nefarious project.

A Strong Endorsement.

LAWS GOVERNING SPIRIT MANIFESTATIONS.

INTERCOMMUNION BETWEEN THE FIRST AND SECOND SPHERES,

By Mrs. C. E. Stevens, of San Francisco, Cal.

CHAPTER IV.

Masquerading to represent spirits has been at the bottom of nearly all the criticism of what have been supposed by Spiritualists to be materializations.

By no means certain that fraud has never been used by money-making mediums, who have learned that conditions are not always to be relied on to procure results, and feeling their business likely to suffer if some method could not be found to supply deficiencies, we must now try to prove that materializations sure and simple can take place, and that they are governed by the same law as other manifestations, and can be as to their operation as easily accounted for.

The cabinet being used, the light of earth otherwise in the public seances having been too strong to contend with, attempts have been made to prove the whole thing fraudulent, the medium accused of using the cabinet to serve as a dressing-room in which to change their attire and trap-doors arranged to allow of escape. With this end in view, it has been comparatively easy for dishonest mediums to resort to trickery, which has been declared to have been discovered so often, it is almost compulsory for the protection of the honest that the law be explained, so that protection may be given and the truth understood.

As we have before stated, mediums having a large amount of vital electricity, can gather about them such spirits as have left the world, and are yet interested sufficiently to desire to establish truth on earth in regard to spiritual material things, so to speak; to reinforce with magnetism, so that they can conjointly develop the fact of a possibility of spirits rehabilitating themselves with their own physical, at least momentarily.

For this purpose, the forces are brought together, and the form prepared by laying on, as it were, that of both in such a way as to bring out the medium's own life-force, which assumes the materializing body only so far as to show its natural covering. This covering has been prepared from the life forces of the medium on earth, aided by force of will of the spirit of the medium, whose own magnetism is so blended with that of the spirit to be represented, that it actually takes the spirit forces of three individualities to represent one, or more, should it be desired. The medium in the cabinet is still there spellbound, as it were, and as unconscious of what is going on outside of the cabinet as it is possible for an entranced person to be. If suddenly awakened, such is the shock given by the disturbance or dissolution of the whole body, death to the force which holds the body to earth might easily be the result, as it is, protection is afforded by the upper spirits, who have thus far been able to hold in control the spirits on this side, who surround them and are endeavoring, after their own fashion to destroy manifestations by exposure of the medium, as they believe, and no harm has been done. Exposure after exposure it is claimed has taken place, but not so effectually that there is no reappearance of the fraudulent medium, who evidently takes up the thread of the experiment before the interruption, whether with less effect or none at all, it can hardly fairly be stated.

True it is, a medium knowing anything of the laws that govern manifestation, could hardly dare to trifle with the manifesting of spirits, as the result of the attraction of evil, by desire to accumulate wealth through deception or any wrong thought, would scatter and drive away the protecting spirits who are their only safeguard; and should the trickery be very long continued, a practical proof of personal danger would undoubtedly be the result.

In all demonstrations of spirit manifestation, different combinations of the magnetic and electric fluids produce different results. Experiment brings facts to the surface, till from time to time new phenomena are manifest and the law acts on.

Spirit voices not unfrequently heard in rooms where there is a medium adapted to the purpose, are based upon the same laws the laws of sound being substituted for laws in other phenomena. The fluctuations in the waves of air, which is the cause of sound being acted upon by the electric current of the will power of the medium, added to the magnetic force of the spirit in control in the second sphere supply the magnetic brain power which combines itself with that of the human medium, till the effect is produced. This being the result, nothing else than clairaudience is the result, though there are independent clairaudients as well as clairvoyant, as voices as well as sweet strains of music have been claimed often to have been heard by those in the world, especially around death-beds, not only by the dying, but by those in the vicinity.

The Scriptures record its possibility, especially by the voice from heaven, when it said: "This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased." These voices have been in the past admitted, qualified by the term religious miracles, but would hardly be admitted in in these days, even though one arose from the dead to prove them, not only as manifestations of truth, but taught as to how conducted.

The very simplicity of these explanations as to the action of the laws which direct them, we are aware is likely to be against us, as at an early sitting, a table tipping when the alphabet was called, the response came purporting to be from Swedenborg: "God finds his children emulous of wisdom awfully mysterious." So to-day the human mind cannot conceive the vastness of the universe, nor the wonders therein contained, yet law after law is open to our view so simple in its action, one almost wonders there was ever any doubt about it, or why an explanation should ever have been needed. But, step by step, life has unfolded and is unfolding, and the time will come when the question of the intercommunication of the spheres will no longer be doubted, but the surprise will be that it has ever been.

New light dawning upon the world has now brought us to that point of inquiry which will show how much of the truly spiritual has been brought into the world through this new knowledge of spirit manifestations. It is not all new, for the Scriptures have long since proclaimed its possibility. The churches, ignoring this, have declared it of evil, claiming its use, moreover, as delegated to them. Even the reading of Holy Writ is not for the laity, is one of the teachings of the Romish Church, and when the laity are permitted to receive it, it is under the dispensation of the church explanations, till what they think is as much of a mystery to the common mind as whether there is any hereafter is to the grossest materialist, who neither knows whether there is a hereafter nor cares for one. Quite satisfied with the world as it is, to those who have health and means enough to enjoy it, "how long shall I live?" seems to be only the real question.

Life hereafter, as heaven and hell are by no means desirable—to keep out of them as long as possible, the dearest wish of so-called Christians even—why should any have desire, but take life as it comes, and leave the rest? And so it is that spirit-manifestation is thrust to one side, or taken as a means to an end, to gather wealth for the mediums, who are often used as treasure-seekers, for the worldly-minded who have just enough faith in it for worldly purposes, not realizing the danger to ensue from the calling together of lower orders of spirits, who are expiating their worldly love of the carnal, perhaps, by holding themselves still on earth, using both soul and body of the medium for the purpose of sitters as well. This may end in releasing the spirit eventually from its earth trammels.

But, judging from suicidal attempts made often by such as have reaped nothing but disappointment from their search in this way, evil will come while none but the worldly-minded can draw such spirits to them. The attractions on both sides being worldly wealth, or knowledge leading to that, it is easy to be seen that the crowds gathered to worldly entertainments by mediums, too often themselves too purely worldly, to collect around them spirits of the same character, is as likely to be composed of unscrupulous persons, ready for any kind of fun to come out of it, as it is that roughly raiding spirits should break in upon public manifestations, to expose, as they say, the frauds being perpetrated by a person ignorant of the danger which really exists for a medium as well as all engaged in it, notwithstanding the exposure, not only at the moment, but by the attachment of such spirits of the second sphere, who, once drawn towards the medium, are not very likely to leave till all the mischief they can do is accomplished. From this arises the fact, that honest mediums' intentions are sometimes almost destroyed by their work, which has gathered such a force of lower influence about them, there is little hope of getting rid of them altogether till mediums have, by spiritual force of their own desires and prayer for assistance, rendered themselves proof to lower attacks and can come up higher.

This once being understood, the lower classes of public mediumship will be abandoned, and the higher grade looked upon as sufficiently desirable to rouse to work all classes of Spiritualists, who will find themselves well paid for their investigations from a higher standpoint. Thus, then, will the work really begin which will send forth Christian ministers ready to do battle in their "Lord's work," ready for spiritual combat which will leave the spiritual work of the Master no longer a dead but a living truth.

To this end, in our efforts to explain the law, we have endeavored to show the condition through which the material acts, and shall now try to go up higher with the truth that Spiritualism, as well as Spiritism, may be understood, and with it the law of the Master in such a way that it may leave the impress of truth. This being done, all danger from infestation, or the intrusion from evil influences, will be guarded against, mediums protected and Spiritualism as an exposition or continuance of the doctrine of Christ received, will retrieve its position, and the call to come up higher be accepted as such, and in the end place our religion as the religion, above all others, for life and life everlasting, the end of Death.

PART II.

CHAPTER I.

The miracles of Christianity received as an established fact by the churches have not always been received as such by all of Christ's followers. There are times when the heart as well as the mind, becomes desirous to know all the truth in reference to our established doctrines, and too unsatisfactory, at times, has been its response. In regard to the miracles especially, there has been a lack of belief on the part of many who, until the law is understood, will hardly accept them as they should be accepted, not as miracles but as demonstrations in fact of the misunderstood action of law, upon the part of observers as well as narrators of the proper understanding of the law relating to forces, were understood by Christ, at least in part explained.

The Great Teacher, the Master, the God, if you so choose to call him, was not unaware of the difficulty arising from a want of faith on the part of his followers; and as much as possible to strengthen them, gave them proof of his own capacity to overcome the obstacles arising from the ignorance of the action of natural law in their midst. The turning water into wine at the wedding feast is easily accounted for by the veriest tyro in spiritual wisdom in the second sphere, and can be as easily explained by them to the satisfaction of most, we trust, who have followed us thus far in our explanation.

The germs of the wine are in the water. All its constituent parts are there. The life of the sun has infused itself resulting in the root, the branches and finally into the grain itself. The action of the sun has brought its fruit to perfection, and is now only waiting to begin to continue its action to decay, that new life be given to the soil for the perfection of other germs which may fall upon its bosom, when it is plucked by the hand of man for his own use.

The natural craving of man for the essence of all things, the very life, prompts him to turn to the grape as possible to their own need, and by crushing from its bosom the watery parts of its earthly existence, he separates its life principles as well, as when farther examination proves, by a subtile process called fermentation, he extracted a quality not before known to have been encased in the form of the simple, innocent grape, which for a time increases the rapidity of the action of the vital life-current, and although he is exposing himself to danger he is not at first aware of, brings him to a sense of exhilaration nearer to that of the supposed material heaven than any he had before deemed possible. The action, then, of the sun upon the wine, has produced the water in the grape, extracted its sweetness, and when it is laid open to the action of the air, combines it with unseen forces which, when worked upon, give it the quality of exhilaration sought for so often elsewhere in grain as well as other fruit.

The operation of natural law understood by Christ enabled him to perform what seemed to be miracles, but in reality the effect of causes not understood by the multitude, but which in later days will be. Others followed not to confound the world but to open the eyes of the blind through natural causes, operated upon by the spiritual emanating from Christ himself.

Water having been turned into wine from the action of natural forces acting in harmony, the preparation for a new miracle is made before the coming of Christ, who subjected himself unto forces entirely different from any law then understood, but of as great importance, far greater perhaps, as its consequences, when understood, will be of more use, in the distance of the future, in promulgating the doctrine of good tidings to be proclaimed unto all people, than has yet been accepted.

SOMETHING BETTER.

'Tis well that you be worldly wise,
Both in the spirit and the letter,
In meeting schemes that rogues devise;
But wisdom leads to something better.

'Tis well fair fortune to address,
And try your level best to get her,
To cheer your seasons of distress;
But there is something surely better.

'Tis well Misfortune's wiles to meet,
Much as the old magicians met her,
With charms to snare her pretty feet;
But there is something vastly better.

'Tis well to raise a hue and cry
Against Oppression's ruthless fetter,
To gain men's plaudits by and by;
But there is always something better.

Both friend and foe, each one of you,
To this great boon must be a debtor!
The joy of being good and true;
And nothing in the world is better.

SILAS BOARDMAN.

SOMETHING NEW ABOUT HYPNOTISM.

VARIOUS DEVICES

Which Induce Hypnotism.

Strange Results of Using Powerful Mechanism.

And now we are to be hypnotized by machinery! What a horrid thought! We be innocently and contentedly strolling along the busy streets, our ideas centered on pleasures and successes of life, or upon our happy ones at home, only to find our eyes suddenly transfixed by a little demon of clockwork machine in the window of an enterprising merchant. It instantly divests us of all rational meutal control and holds us spellbound, with a strange fascination, to do the bidding of suggestions, good or evil, from any chance passerby.

Or, still far worse, we may fall prey to the uncanny machinations of the ambitious storekeeper, who has carefully surrounded his machine with such suggestive signs as "You must come in and purchase our great bargains," or "Be sure and leave your money here," and the normally penurious victim, with hypnotic prodigality meekly parts with his hard-earned wealth through the aid of nineteenth century science and machine-made mesmeric sleep.

All facetiousness aside, Dr. Athur MacDonald, of the Bureau of Education, Government specialist in education, as related to abnormalities, has a machine in his possession which will throw persons at all susceptible to mesmeric influences into the first stage of hypnotic somnambulism. It is an innocent enough looking machine to those uninitiated in its dread power, or to those who have never felt the mysterious, subtle, all pervading force of HYPNOTIC IMPRESSIONS.

Dr. MacDonald calls this machine the "mirror hypnotizer." Two slender, black ebony bars, 10 inches long, three eighths of an inch thick, by one and one quarter inches in width, are inlaid on the opposite broad sides with seven circular mirrors to each face, about an inch in diameter. These bars are superimposed upon rotating, vertical axis, propelled by powerful spring through a clockwork train of wheels.

In motion, the mosaic mirror bars revolve in opposite directions, not at a very high rate of speed—perhaps as many as 20 to 30 revolutions a second. With each whirl of the blades there are thrown into the eye of the spectator four blinding flashes of light, which seem to race in and out, now from the ends of the blades to the center, and from the center out again, in a most bewildering confusion.

A curious and startling optical illusion takes place if the blades are persistently gazed at. At first the two spacial relations or the opposite circumferential revolving of the blades are readily recognized, but in a short time this gives way to the sensation that the machine is moving bodily toward you, with ever increasing velocity—like a broad, bright meteor in the summer sky.

POWERFUL EFFECTS.

To test the machine properly, with a view to producing hypnotic sleep, Dr. MacDonald assured me that it is necessary to suggest to the new subject the idea of sleep being produced by the machine, and to constantly repeat the suggestion until sleep is produced for the first time. The machine itself really produces a profound physiological disturbance, and when viewed at a point somewhat above the eye, the scintillating, blinding flashes from the mirrors, become frightfully painful, and the head swims and reels, and over all comes an irresistible desire to close the eyes in peaceful slumber. The new subject will involuntarily withdraw his gaze from the painful glare, unless repeated suggestion that the machine is making him go to sleep is continued.

After the first successful effort to put a subject into hypnotic sleep, through the aid of the mirror hypnotizer, each succeeding attempt becomes much easier, and the individual soon is an autohypnotic subject, throwing himself with ease into profound somnambulism or a cataleptic condition by mere self-suggestion, as he views the machine.

Illustrating the effects of this device upon apparently normal people, Dr. MacDonald related that, after a lecture delivered at the Conference of Charity and Correction at New Haven, Conn., where he had

THE MACHINE REVOLVING

In front of the audience, many ladies and some men assured him that they dared not look at the machine more than a few moments at a time for fear they would pass into hypnotic coma.

The machine just described has a broader application than any other known device in being able to produce, simultaneously upon a large number of subjects the necessary incipient physiological effects which must precede the hypnotic condition. By its aid such masters of the mesmeric science as Charcot, Forel and Liegois could control entire classes in their more exhaustive and comparitive studies, and gain deep and valuable insight into what must ever seem to the layman a mysterious and occult art.

There are a number of other machines which are intended to be used as hypnotizers, and in Dr. MacDonald's extremely interesting laboratory were seen three other devices which are warranted, with the proper surroundings and the needed mental suggestions, to create an entire abscence of pesonel responsibility.

The instrument of next importance is rather a simple affair. A leather covered front plate, which fits the curve of the forehead, has two straps, which project from its ends, encircling the head and fastening at the rear with a buckle. From the center of the front of this plate extends outward a small rod of lead composition, some six inches in length. Upon the end of this rod, which may be bent easily in any direction and retain its position, is soldered a bright nickel-plated ball, half an inch in diameter.

HYPNOTIZED BY A BALL.

The experimenter fastens the band around the head of the subject, taking some ostensible precaution that the patient shall not see the ball too distinctly, suggesting at the same time that only a few moments will elapse, after the arrangements are complete, before he will pass into a complete condition of hypnosis. The ball is raised to a point so far above the eye that it is only by the greatest straining of the upward lifting muscles of the eye and eyelid that the subject can see it at all.

He is then commanded to concentrate all his powers of sight upon the sparkling spot of light reflected from the tiny sphere. Repeated suggestion that his eyelids are becoming heavy, so heavy that soon he will not be able to keep them open, accompanied by the actual tiring to excess of the obicularis, or eyelid muscle, completes the mental hallucination, and the victim helplessly sinks into deep slumber.

In many instances this slumber in no way differs from the healthful, deep sleep produced by normal causes, and no ill effects are to be apprehended. In fact, the same beneficial recuperation results from simple hypnotic slumbers as accompanies the somnolence

ENGENDERED BY FATIGUE.

But, again, hypnotic sleep in many individuals is marked by a hypersensitiveness of certain brain arreas which make them highly mobile through objective suggestion and influences in so pronounced a degree that a subject may be commanded by the experimenter to follow out lines of action radically different from his normal promptings.

It is difficult, however, so Dr. MacDonald informs me, to induce criminal propensities or acts through suggestion in those who have had healthy moral training, or in those of decisive moral convictions. So it would seem that a predisposition toward wrong doing must exist in the subject, or mesmeric influences will be of no avail to force him into acts which do violence to his moral ethics.

This is a point fraught with the deepest interest to the general public, for a widespread impression prevails that, once in the toils of a mesmerist, one may be swayed and dominated by the so-called superior will until he becomes a mere puppet, committing the most horrible and atrocious crimes by mere suggestion. It is a happy thought that we and our descendants may escape the machinations of men with evil eyes by possessing a substantial underpining of sound morality.

MACHINE-MADE EXISTENCE.

The two machines described above are the only ones in this instructive collection of somatologic instruments which directly possess in themselves the power of creating certain initial physiologic conditions which are objectively conducive to a subsequent hypnotic condition. The other instruments are dependent entirely upon the ability of the operator to create in the mind of the subject an hallucination that the device does possess inherent properties which will greatly assist in bringing about the hypnotist.

A very beautiful nickel-plated horse shoe magnet, some six inches in length, carrying upon its poles a keeper of eccentric outline, is sometimes used. This is placed in the extended hands of the subject, who is told to hold it rigidly before him, and the mind of the ignorant is still further worked upon by removing the keeper and permitting him to feel the awesome and subtle force of magnetism.

The last device exhibited by Dr. MacDonald is merely a modification of the magnet conception, thrown into the shape of a tube or finger ring some two inches in length. Curious, but this ring is said to have a much stronger influence upon many of the subjects than has the larger and more brilliant horse-shoe magnet. Perhaps the sentimental phase of wearing a ring surcharged with potent mesmeric force is more than many can resist who place love and mesmerism and rings in the same category.

Some day, in the dim and distant future, when man has become a precise automaton, with all his acts of life governed from hour to hour by suggestions from properly timed machinery, he will lie in his luxurious bed, listening to the daily news or the latest novel talked from his phonograph, and will view all the exciting episodes of the day in rapidly moving pictures upon his wall, waiting for the time when his most dearly beloved friend, the somnipathic, or hypnotizing, machine will go off, and give him a respite of oblivion for a few sweet hours from the fearful complexity of a machine-made life.

A GEORGIA GHOST-DEN.

Old-Time Plantation Wholly Abandoned to "Ha'nts."

Orville Shanks, the Cruel Master of Fifty Years Ago.

HE MADE THE PLACE A HELL UPON EARTH AND DIED IN AWFUL TORMENT—NOBODY HAS SINCE LIVED THERE.

During a recent visit to the piney woods section of Southern Georgia, says a correspondent of the Globe-Democrat, my attention was directed to the strange and uncanny conduct of the "ha'nts" that infest the old Shanks plantation so that it has remained untenanted for many years. The old mansion has fallen into decay, the fields have grown up in saplings and weeds, and briars have so choked up the roadway leading to the place that a guide is necessary to direct the visitor to an abode given over entirely to its supernatural occupants.

Leaving the main road we picked our way along what was once a stately avenue of oaks, whose sweeping boughs form a natural arch, the gloom of which is intensified by the long streamers of somber gray moss that wave and toss in the breezes from the distant seas. The avenue is flanked on either side by thrown-out fields covered by the sallow sedge, with an occasional clump of bear grass, with its ghostly flower stalk peering above the level of the grass and briars. A rotting palisade of slabs hewn from pine trees with broadaxes in the hands of negro slaves surrounds the old house, and across the fragments of the fallen gate we entered the premises. The house was a single-story structure, built of hewn pine logs of massive proportions, with a roof of heart pine clapboards, and was divided into several departments by board partitions, but time has been busy with the old homestead, the roof has fallen, the gutters are gone and the ancient chimneys of rough bricks molded by hand by the plantation slaves are tottering and ready to tumble down with the slightest shock. Everything about the place indicates desertion, desolation and decay, and no wonder that the negroes, naturally superstitious, should have been driven away from the plantation by the "ha'nts" with which it is reported to be infested. The memories with which the place is associated are sufficiently grewsome to have driven off more courageous people than simple negroes.

In the early 50s there came to that region a French Canadian, one Schenk, who had been a Rocky Mountain trapper, when the gold discoveries in California attracted him to that region and a streak of luck soon made him a rich man. Unfortunately, he became involved in a difficulty which ended in his shooting a man, and he had to flee the country. He had plenty of money, and was not very closely questioned by the people of that wild region.

The name "Schenk" soon became, in the vernacular of the Georgia cracker "Shanks," the reason for the change being the inability of the cracker to pronounce the name correctly, and by the fact that the bearer of the name was a tall, gaunt personage, whose appearance the name suited exactly. He was taciturn and uncommunicative, and showed from the beginning that he wanted as little to do with his neighbors as possible. He purchased about 1000 acres of land, bounded on one side by the Ockolacoochee River, and extending from the river into open pine barren.

He invested heavily in negroes, attending every sale of slaves that occurred in the country, to the horror and regret of the unfortunate creatures that were likely to become his property, for he soon acquired the reputation of being one of the hardest and cruelest masters in all the country. The laws were very loosely administered at the best in that out-of-the-way locality and for the negro there was small protection from the caprice of his master.

Orville Shanks, as he became known, in that region, cleared a plantation of several hundred acres of rich hammock land along the river, and he was so niggardly that he decided he would not permit the cattle of others to forage on his lands, and to that end he proceeded to build a high fence all around his domain. This brought him in conflict with the road overseer, as a public road passed through a corner of his possessions, and he was warned to remove his fence. He refused to comply, and the overseer ordered out his men and tore down that portion of the fence that obstructed the thoroughfare.

Shanks retaliated by ordering his negroes to build a fence that it would take a good deal of trouble and expense to tear down. They cut down large trees and piled them in heaps across the road, and extended wings of a similar structure for a considerable distance on either side, so that it had the appearance of a barricade, built for defence against some dangerous enemy rather than a fence to keep out a few roving sheep or scrub cattle. The Road Commissioners held a meeting and decided to change the course of the road, but presented Shanks to the Grand Jury just the same for obstructing a public road.

He was tried, found guilty and fined, but paid no attention to the mandates of the Court. A deputy sheriff went to arrest him, but was frightened out of his wits by Shanks, who had been informed of his proposed visit in advance, and, meeting him at the fence, threatened to make his negroes ride him on a rail if he set foot on his premises. This increased the unpopularity of the newcomer, who was dreaded and shunned by his neighbors until he became a veritable recluse.

He was a woman-hater by nature, and no female ever crossed his threshold except the unfortunate creatures who became his chattels by purchase, and many tales were whispered around about the dark deeds of which he was guilty and of which the helpless slaves were the victims. There was a law for the protection of slaves, but in such a case as that it was of little avail. Every man felt that he was infringing on his neighbors if he interfered with him in the control of his own affairs, so long as his actions fell short of disturbing the peace of the community or of the commission of murder.

In the case of Shanks the victims of his cruelties held him in such mortal terror that they were afraid to make public the terrible nature of his doings, for they knew the terrible penalty that awaited the informer afterward. When Shanks had occasion to go abroad he rode in a close carriage drawn by a gaunt animal that had the appearance of being half-starved, and a negro sat astride the horse and kept him going at his best speed. If the galt slackened Shanks carried a long reed with a sharp spike in the end of it, with which he prodded the negro until the speed was increased to suit him.

His favorite method of administering punishment to his slaves for minor offences was by stripping them naked, poking their heads through a crack in the fence and leaving them in that position for half a day at a time. After this ordeal the fence was lifted, the culprit released, given twenty or thirty lashes and sent to work again. He worked his slaves by the task, and woe to the wretch that came up short with his work. The master was merciless, and the prayers of the slave fell upon an ear that was absolutely deaf to every sentiment of pity.

In the rear of the moldering ruin I was shown a pit that has been half filled with rubbish, but it was with a shudder that I gazed into its depths and thought of its old-time horrors. Shanks called it his "nigger hell," and it came very near filling the measure of an earthly hades. It was about 20 feet deep, and sharp stakes were driven into the clay floor, the points protuding about an inch above the surface, and trimmed to a keen point. When a negro grew refractory and could not be subdued by the ordinary application of the whip, he was consigned to "hell." Bound hand and foot the poor helpless creature was thrown into the pit. After enduring the torture for an hour or two, if the culprit did not show sufficient signs of repentance, small pine poles were laid across the mouth of the pit and pine needles were scattered over them and set on fire, the fine coals trickling through in a red-hot shower upon the naked flesh of the hapless victim of the human monster.

One such experience was sufficient to break the most obdurate spirit, and few there were who ever made a second trip to "hell" on Shanks plantation. Occasionally some poor creature would risk his life in an attempt to escape from the clutches of his cruel master, and to such, when captured, the most condign punishment was meted out.

An old resident who lived in that part of the country during the infamous career of Shanks told me that he had heard a negro plead with his captors in the most heartrending manner to kill him outright rather than turn him over to his master, to be subjected to his fiendish tortures. Another method of dealing with such as complained of being sick was found to be exceedingly efficacious. It was bleeding. Phlebotomy was never a very safe and agreeable mode of treating the ailing and the Shanks method was worse than the usual manner of performing the operation. The patient was held fast, while a cleft hickory peg, with ends pointed, was jabbed in his nostrils till the blood flowed copiously.

This treatment was tried once too often, and the victim, a delicate negro girl, died from loss of blood. The report of the crime became noised around, in spite of the threats of Shanks, and an investigation was instituted that resulted in the arrest of Shanks on the charge of having murdered the girl. He was tried and convicted of the homicide, and it cost him several thousand dollars to get out of the scrape.

This resulted indirectly in his death. He never got over the chagrin attending the loss of so much money, and took to his bed. Lying there, revolving in his mind the memory of his past deeds, he was so tormented that he had no peace day or night. His body servant wanted to call in a physician, but was threatened with a trip to "hell" if he repeated the suggestion. Shanks had boasted that no doctor should come nosing around encouraging his negroes in their laziness, and even with the menace of approaching death he refused to have one on his premises.

At last the end drew near one stormy night in November, and he felt that the hand of death was upon him. Calling his body servant he ordered him to have two mules saddled, and to mount men on them and have them to ride around the house at the top of their speed, whooping and yelling as loudly as they could, so as to divirt his mind from the excruciating mental and physical tortures to which he was subjected. Around and around they rode, until both the animals and their riders were exhausted, when others took their places. All night long the terrible din was kept up, and just at dawn he died. His death was reported, and a few of his neighbors, who had never before crossed that inhospitable threshold, gathered in and assisted in burying the body.

He had left instructions that his body should be buried on a little knoll overlooking the house, and adjacent fields, and his instructions were carried out. "I want to be where I can see after things," he had remarked to the negroes, "and if you do not attend to your business I'll come back and give you h—l!"

The ignorant slaves held him in such mortal terror that they never doubted for a moment that he was fully capable of carrying out the threat. From that day till this no negro has ever willingly spent a night on that unhallowed ground. Shanks left no will and his property all went to a nephew in the West, who was a Methodist minister of very pronounced anti-slavery opinions. But his cupidity got the better of his humanitarian sentiments, and he compromised with his conscience which would not permit him to retain the slaves by instructing his attorney to sell the property on the plea of winding up the estate, pocketed the money and left the negroes to their fate. However, any change was the better for them.

The new owner of the plantation placed a hired overseer in charge of it, but it proved to be most unprofitable investment. The old negroes were removed and fresh ones sent there, but the scheme was of little avail. The slaves would run away if given the slightest opportunity, and the war coming on, the plantation was abandoned.

Since the war a few desultory attempts have been made to reclaim the land and put it in cultivation, but they have proved unsuccessful, and there appears to be a fatality attached to it that makes it a very undesirable possession. Only last year it was sold for the State and county taxes that had accumulated for several years and brought hardly enough to satisfy the cost of sale.

The negroes avoid the premises as if a curse hung over it. They claim that on stormy nights old Shanks can be seen gliding about through the shadowy pine thickets with a long whip in his hand, and that often they have heard horses galloping around the house and back and forth along the the avenue that leads to the deserted mansion. Cries and groans are often heard by belated travelers, according to the current gossip among the negroes, coming from the direction of the "hell" pit, and one 'possum hunter who lost his bearings and wandered into the forbidden ground reached his cabin overcome with fear.

He said that he walked right up to the pit before he was aware of its proximity, and as he pushed aside the drapery of moss that hangs from the branches of the surrounding trees a sight met his gaze that froze his blood with horror. The place was illuminated with a ghastly glow and what appeared to be the form of a man lay writhing in the bottom of the pit, while near the mouth of it stood a horrid-looking object, half man, half beast, with horns on its head and eyeballs of fire, and that it held a long staff in its claw-like grasp with which it kept stirring the fire. The frightened negro did not wait to take a second look, but fled in terror down the avenue to the big road and stumbled into the door of his cabin, two miles away, in a state of collapse.

Such are the weird tales that the darkies tell, but, however much of the evil reputation of the place is attributable to their superstitious fears, one fact remains, and that is that since the day that D'Orville Schenk was laid beneath the sod nobody has ever found the proprty profitable, or a residence on the premises agreeable. THE FOX HOME.

Let It Be Purchased and Made a Permanent Memorial.

Practical Suggestions on the Subject.

To the Editor:—Having read the articles by G. W. Kates and Dr. Wm. Cleveland in recent issues of The Progressive Thinker, relative to the purchase of the Fox property in Hydesville, N. Y., I wish to raise my voice in favor of a plan that cannot fail to meet the approval of every consistent Spiritualist.

The Fox home as the birth place of Modern Spiritualism should be sacredly regarded, and kept as near as possible in its original form and condition. As it remains to-day a few years at most must witness its destruction, for having withstood the ravages of time and the inclemencies of the weather for nearly a century, we cannot much longer expect it to resist the elements of decay unless properly repaired and cared for.

Not only for the sake of the present generation, but for the generations that are to follow should the Fox home be preserved, and unless this is done it must ever be a source of regret to all Spiritualists.

It is a blot on the otherwise fair page of the history of Spiritualism that those whom the angels chose as messengers of light to reveal the glad tidings of a life beyond the grave were allowed to die in almost utter destitution, forsaken by friends and scorned by those who were to reap the benefits of their labor of love.

Now that they are gone, let us not remember them by their shortcomings, but for their noble work done for all humanity, for although but human, with the frailties ever associated with earth-life, yet let us not forget that they, among thousands, were chosen by the angel world to draw aside the veil that separates the spirit-realm from ours, and to dispel the dark clouds of superstition that for ages had shrouded the mystery of so-called death; and that, to them while yet in their childish innocence and purity was intrusted the grand mission of ushering in a new religion—a religion of peace and love—that was destined to gladden the hearts and make bright the homes of mourning millions.

The lives of the Fox sisters were not lives of ease, and is it any wonder that Margaret Fox, destitute and without friends, persecuted by the Romish priests, at last in a moment of despair turned against the cause of Spiritualism, and for a time sought to overthrow its teachings? Is it not enough that she repented and strove to undo the wrong she had done before being called to the spirit world?

A medium's life at best is a hard one, and the thorny path of adversity trod by Margaret Fox might well daunt a braver heart and turn back many an one endowed with a stronger and less sensitive nature than that of this gentle, gifted medium.

Long after those who sought to bring calumny and dishonor upon these three greatest of all earthly mediums shall have been numbered among the forgotten, the names of the Fox sisters will stand out in golden letters upon the record of human greatness, and the lamp of progress trimmed by their loving hands illuminate the pathway of coming ages.

Let us Spiritualists do honor to those who have given us the grand truths of Spiritualism, and brought to us the light of a better way. Let it not be said that Spiritualists are slow to show respect to its founders and teachers.

I make the suggestion that Spiritualists select a committee of honorable men and women to receive contributions as a fund for the purchase of the Fox home and grounds, and that the grounds be fitted up for a spiritual camp-ground, as already suggested by Bro. Cleveland. Thus may the place where little Katie Fox received the first communication from the Spirit-world become a great spiritual centre from which light and truth shall be disseminated.

If every Spiritualist would contribute even the small sum of ten cents (and many are able to give ten, fifty, or even one hundred times that amount), enough would soon be realized to not only purchase the Fox property and transform it into a camp-ground, but also to rear a monument sacred to the memory of the Fox sisters.

Although a young man and comparatively new to the truths of Spiritualism, I deeply feel the importance of this project. Let us hear from others on this plan introduced by Bro. Kates, and so ably seconded by Bro. Cleveland.

The opportunity is now before us. Let us act, for soon it will be too late, and the Fox home where Spiritualism received its birth will be a thing of the past. S. B. York.

SAVONAROLA.

He Was Burned at the Stake.

Memorials of Him Are Still Carefully Preserved.

Harper's Magazine: Savonarola entered the Convent of St. Marco as a young man, where he created no particular impression either by his words or by his deeds; but when he was appointed Prior of the Convent, he at once made himself heard and felt. He exhorted and scolded clergy as well as laity; and he preached purity of political as well as of personal conduct. And the more he was ordered by his superiors to be silent, the more he talked. He was hissed and hooted, and pelted with curses and with stones. He was stretched, in the Bargello, upon the rack which tortured his body as cruelly as persecution had tortured his soul. He saw his two faithful monks slaughtered before his eyes; he was hung up by the neck on the scaffold; and his body was consumed by fire while life was still in it; and still he preached. And still he preaches to all the world. "My sons," he said, in the Library of St. Marco, "in the presence of God, standing before the sacred host, and with my enemies already in the Convent, I now confirm my doctrine. What I have said came to me from God, and He is my witness in Heaven that what I say is true. My last admonition to you is this: Let your arms be faith, patience, and prayer. I know not whether my enemies will take my life; but of this I am certain, that dead, I shall be able to do more for you in Heaven, than living, I have ever had power to do on earth."

Pope Pius VII., many years after Savonarola's death, is reported to have said: "I shall learn in the next world the mystery of that man. War raged around Savonarola in his life time; it has never ceased since his death. Saint, schismatic, or heretic, ignorant vandal or Christian martyr, prophet or charlatan, champion of the Roman Church, or apostle of emancipated Italy—which was Savonarola?"

Whether he was saint or heretic, prophet or charlatan, Savonarola and his memory are still honored in Florence; and his relics are never profaned even by political posters. The crucifix before which he is said to have knelt in prayer is still cherished in the Church of St. Michele; his portrait is still religiously kept in the Convent of St. Marco, where one still sees now and then, on the priests in its cloisters, the white Dominican gowns similar to that in which he preached, and in the cells in the Convent occupied by him in later life are carefully preserved not only this portrait, attributed to Fra Bartolommeo—and the best of him ever taken—but some of his manuscripts, portions of his wardrobe, his rosary, and a bit of charred wood, plucked from the fire upon which his body was consumed.

To the Editor:—The subject of the above sketch, Jerome Savonarola, was the original politico-religious reformer on the continent of Europe. He preceded Martin Luther, who published his first thesis against Rome 1517 A.D. Jerome Savonarola preached in Florence against the abuses of Romanism from 1480 to 1497. His error was in combining attempts at political with religious reform. He, however, effected the overthrow of the Medici, the ruling princely family. He was burned at the stake in Florence in 1498. Rome invented the hell, upon which Calvin improved; and both the Roman and Protestant Pope, burned a heretic, believing that if their God punished unbelief by an eternal fire, it justified its anticipation here. SPIRITUALISM IN DETROIT.

An Excellent Programme of Work Is Given.

To the Editor:—Throughout the length and breadth of our beautiful "City of the Straits" there is a general awakening, and the deepest interest is being manifested pertaining to Spiritualism, if the new movements now on foot, such as family circles and public organizations and a general spirit of inquiry are any indication. Detroit will soon take an advanced place, and become a shining light in the great cause of spiritual advancement.

Through the efforts of some sincere and spirited brethren in the western part of our city, we are to have for the month of November, three times a week (twice on Sunday and one weekday), Mr. Frank T. Ripley, so well and favorably known as a fearless and clear exponent of our cause.

The Central Spiritual Union, which was kindly noticed by you at the time of its birth in June last, although but four months old, has had a phenomenal growth, numbering among its members some of the brightest and most progressive people of our city.

The Union, as its name indicates, has already done a good work, and promises a glorious future.

A printed syllabus of fall and winter work is now being distributed, giving an outline of what is partly in store for those who are identified with the movement.

The Union has secured Star and Crescent Hall, corner Cass and Spencer streets. Meetings are held every Wednesday evening.

The following course of lectures will be delivered by Dr. C. W. Burrows, conductor, on the first and third Wednesdays of each month, beginning November 4, Are Thoughts Things? November 18, The Evolution of Man in Religious Belief: December 2, The Religion of Man, and Ethics of Science; December 16, The Bible the Most Occult and Spiritual Book; December 30, Mediums' night—five minute addresses; January 6, 1897, Primitive Christianity, or the Teachings of Jesus; January 20, Trance, the Door to Occultism, or How to Become a Psychic; February 3, The Religion of the Future; February 17, The Relation of the Visible to the Invisible Universe; March 3, The Higher Spiritual Culture; March 17, The Vibratory and Molecular Theories in Occult Phenomena; March 31, Mediums' night—five minute addresses; April 7, The Principles of Color and Light: April 21, The Philosophy of Spirit Return: May 5, A Look into the Sky, illustrated by lantern; May 19, Trance and Inspirational Mediumship.

The second and fourth Wednesdays will be filled by local talent, many prominent ministers, lawyers and doctors of the city having signified their pleasure to speak for us.

Each lecture is followed by a harmony circle, and the last Wednesday in each month by a social and hop. Thus do we seek to blend the material, intellectual and spiritual.

"For there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding."—Job xxxii:8.

RIGHT LIVING

— BY —

SUSAN H. WIXON,

Author of "Apples of Gold," "All in a Lifetime," "The Story Hour," "Summer Days at Onset," "Sunday Observance," etc., etc.

"Living is an art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the arts."—THOMAS STARR KING.

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as older persons whom it is wisely and appropriately designed to interest while teaching them valuable ethical lessons.

The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in children's lyceums. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. It is a most excellent book and should be widely circulated.

The Molecular Hypothesis OF NATURE.

BY PROF. W. M. LOCKWOOD.

The only treatise ever offered the reading and thinking public in the interest of modern Spiritualism, that is absolutely free from the theories of superstition, and which

Demonstrates continuity of life and our environment of spiritual influences, from the data of modern physical and physiological science.

To the Spiritualist, an impregnable foundation of scientific data and verified facts.

To the materialist and skeptic, a revelation of the invisible energies operative in Nature's formula of evolution.

To the ecclesiastic, a new heaven and a new earth. A book to read, to study and think about. A condensed volume of scientific information for 25 cents. Address your orders to

The Progressive Thinker, 40 Loomis street.

Real Life in the Spirit-Land.

Given inspirationally by Mrs. Maria M. King. You will not become weary while reading this excellent book. Price 75 cents.

GENERAL SURVEY

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Doings, Etc.

Bear in mind, please, that we cannot publish weekly reports of meetings. Whenever a change is made in speakers, or anything of special interest, send us a brief item, please. A great deal can be expressed in a dozen lines; but long reports will not be used. Meetings are of local interest only. We extend a cordial invitation to all speakers to send in their appointments to lecture, and general movements, which will be read by at least 40,000. We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion.

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

Farmer Riley writes from Marcellus, Mich.: "I am still in the field giving seances, and many people come from all parts of the country to visit me, and witness the demonstrations of spirit return. The cause is still growing in this part of Michigan."

On November 8 the Spiritual and Religious Association of Massillon, Ohio, commenced a course of Sunday evening meetings at G. A. R. Hall. This society, founded only last March, is increasing in membership, and is quietly but perseveringly working to spread the knowledge of spiritual truth in this locality. E. J. Bowtell is speaker for the present month, and on Sunday mornings for the remainder of the year he will address meetings at the Assembly Room, City Hall, Canton, O.

On the evening of November 11 there will be a testimonial benefit given to Prof. Sundeen, the mind-reader, at Bricklayers' Hall, 93 S. Peoria street. Admission, 15 cents.

The St. Louis Republic makes an attack upon the manifestations given through Hatfield Pettibone. C. H. Merry writes that there is no truth whatever in the charges made, and endorses Mr. Pettibone, as hundreds of others have done.

P. W. Geer, editor of The Torch of Reason, of Silverton, Ore., was in the city last week. He was a delegate to the Secular Convention.

G. W. Kates and wife are at 16 Greig street, Rochester, N. Y., during November. December address will be 283 Seventh street, Buffalo, N. Y. They have some open time in 1897.

More than four thousand school children and their teachers listened to the sweet tones of the late Ole Bull famous Cremona violin at the City Hall, Gloucester, Mass., Saturday afternoon, the 7th inst. Prof. J. Jay Watson and his daughter, Miss Annie A. Watson, were the principal artists. This wonderful violin is 280 years old, having been made in 1616. Hon. David I. Robinson, mayor of Gloucester, presided. This is the beginning of a series of annual entertainments to be given under the name of Sawyer Public School Day.

W. H. Burr, of Washington, D. C., writes: "At the last light circle seance of Pierre Keeler, instead of the invariable taking off of his coat, Dr. Hansmann's coat was taken off. He sat next to Mr. Keeler, who clasped his left arm with his two hands, while a gentleman at the other side clasped his right arm with both hands, forming what is called a double battery. The coat was thrown over from behind the screen onto me. A dozen years ago Dr. Hansmann pitied me and others of his friends for being deluded with Spiritualism. Now there is not a more ardent Spiritualist in Washington than he. He has several hundred slates full of spirit communications and is himself mediumistic."

Etta Pontius writes from Sturgis, Mich.: "The annual election of officers of the Sturgis Harmonial Society occurred September 20, 1896. The following officers will serve the coming year: President, Caspar Cresslar; treasurer, Christian Elser; secretary, Miss Etta Pontius. Dr. F. H. Denslow, a resident of Sturgis, has just closed a splendid series of lectures for our society, which, being inspired, were also very inspiring. Dr. Denslow will continue to lecture, and considering the fact that the society of Sturgis has recently ordained him, we are glad to recommend him to all others, since knowing his worth and admirable speaking qualities we trust others will find him equally satisfactory."

Mrs. Mary G. Peters writes: "The residents of Fall Brook, Cal., and vicinity have enjoyed an intellectual and spiritual treat through the mediumship of Miss Lydia W. Allen, who came to us from the Escondido camp-meeting, where her services as an eloquent lecturer and worker for the cause were highly appreciated by skeptics and Spiritualists alike. The first two meetings were held in a grove of magnificent oaks adjacent to the town. Subjects from the audience were called for by the guides, and after some hesitation the audience selected three topics for each meeting, the first being 'Antiquity of Man,' 'The Effects of Spiritualism on the Human Race,' and 'How Shall a Skeptic Become Convinced?' Miss Allen proceeded without delay to discuss the topics given—combining them into one connected and masterly address which lasted over one hour. The audience, which consisted largely of non-believers, was intensely interested. From the first moment of entrancement a change came over the medium, and the face, girlish in its normal condition, became matured and set; the voice, which is naturally mild, became deep and strong; gestures and manners changed, and the evident research along scientific lines, the depth of argument and eloquent delivery, proved conclusively the presence of some superior power. The last meeting was held in the town hall, where the next one will be also—the interest continuing unabated. Miss Allen leaves us for Los Angeles, where she will remain for a short time, preparing for a tour through the Southern States, which will begin the latter part of November, stopping in several of the large cities, en route to the Southern Cassadaga camp-meeting in Florida."

H. F. Tower, of New York, writes: "Dewitt C. Hough will hold public circles at 323 West 34th street, New York City. He answers questions in folded ballots in writing, and names given in full. Everyone present receives communications from spirit friends."

William E. Bonney writes from Kansas City, Mo.: "The work in Kansas City has started out in good shape for the present season. The First Society has been reorganized with Dr. Allen as president, and holds regular meetings at Tacoma Hall, 1318 Girard avenue. Mrs. Etta L. Leaman, of Concordia, lectured three Sundays in her usual good style and was well received. Following her came Mr. Roy Sutton, a young worker from St Joseph, Mo., who gave one lecture, followed by tests. Mr. Sutton gives promise of being a good instrument for the spirit-world to use in the interest of humanity. The rostrum is at present occupied by the well-known and always welcome worker, Mrs. J. B. H. Jackson. Mrs. Jackson never fails to interest the people, however skeptical they may be. Another meeting has been kept going for several weeks in Strope's Hall, by Capt. H. H. Brown, of Topeka, assisted by Mrs. Dr. Hutcheson, of Kansas City. I gave two lectures there myself in October, in Captain Brown's absence. There are, doubtless, enough Spiritualists in Kansas City and suburban towns to keep two or three halls full, if they would turn out. I shall be pleased to have my friends call and see me, or address 720 East 12th street. Am open for work within easy reach of Kansas City."

November 1st, Mr. Boutell spoke at Canton, Ohio, on the omnipotence of spirit. The brave, noble spirit finds good in everything. If evil, which our philosophy teaches us is but undeveloped good, seems to the external consideration to be but unmitigated evil, still the wise spirit grows strong and calm by the contemplation of that dweller on the threshold of all spiritual good. In the evening, at Massillon, Mr. Bowtell spoke on the state of those spirits who pass from this life with interests undetached from the mortal plane.

Dr. J. N. Magoon, who has been doing very efficient work in Milwaukee, Wis., is now stopping in this city, at 581½ North Clark street, where he can be addressed for engagements.

W. L. Lathrop, late of Boston, has removed to Chicago, and is now located at 4253 Cottage Grove avenue. He will hold developing and tests circles there.

The following notice has been sent to us: Mrs. Lora Holton will lecture and give musical psychometric readings and tests at Sigler's Hall, 526 W 63d street, Englewood (over post-office), Sunday, November 22, at 7:30. Subject: 'The Problem of Life.' Conference and mediums' meeting at 2:30. All are invited. These meetings will continue through the winter. Mrs. Holton will hold parlor musical test circles by engagement in the city and within a reasonable distance of Chicago, upon moderate terms. She can be seen daily at No. 83 Thirty-first st. She will also hold a circle next Thursday evening at 285 W. Monroe street."

Dr. Adah Sheehan will serve the Philosophical Society of Lima, Ohio, for December. She will accept engagements for week-night services in adjacent territory. January and February are open dates. March will find this able worker with the society in Kansas City. Engagements en route or for week-nights solicited. The last Sunday in June will be spent with the old Southwest Michigan Association, at their annual meeting to be held at Lake Cora. Engagements solicited in the vicinity for the first three Sundays in June; also for camp work for 1897. Address Elsinore Gate and Russell street, Cincinnati, O.

Georgina McIntyre writes: "We wish to let our friends know that we have organized the Sunday-school of Love, which meets at 1910 Washington boulevard every Sunday at 2 o'clock. We shall spare no labor to make this one of the most interesting as well as instructive schools in the city. We are going to give a dime social here Friday evening, Nov. 20, at 8 o'clock to which all are welcome. We will also hold meetings Sunday mornings and evenings at 10:45 and 7:45 until further notice. We extend a cordial invitation to all earnest workers in the vineyard of truth to come and assist us in spreading the Pentecostal feast. In a silent way we have been sowing the seeds in this part of the city for nearly six years, unaided mainly. Recognizing the truth that in union there is strength, we now throw aside every barrier that those who feel an added inspiration may join us. Song service every Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock. All are welcome."

Col. James Freeman writes from Bloomington, Ill., "Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Tripp are guests at my home, and are giving very convincing materializing seances in our city, where they can be addressed for a few weeks in my care. Charles W. Peters is again lecturing before the Bloomington Progressive Spiritualist Association. Address, 402 East Front street. Bloomington Ill."

E. M. Gilman writes from Milwaukee, Wis.; "I have located here for the winter. Quite an interest is being taken here in Spiritualism. Meetings are held in eight different halls every Sunday, of which three are German. The Unity Society holds socials on Thursday night of each week, which are well attended. One was held at the elegant residence of Mr. and Mrs. Bumps on the 12th inst., which, to say the least, was a grand success. The next will be held in the parlors of Dr and Mrs. Wheeler. The Unity Society meets every Sunday at 7:30 p. m., in the hall, 558 Jefferson street. Lectures and tests by Geo. H. Brooks, followed with tests by myself and Prof. A. P. Roberts, the 'Welsh prophet,' of this city, who has given some remarkable tests."

William B. Morrison writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "Mrs. Amanda L. Coffman has of late shown increased ability as a speaker. Her public work in spirit descriptions, messages and readings, is of a very remarkable character; fully equaling in clearness, variety and positive identification, any work previously done here by the most famed mediums, of whom we have had many of the best. She certainly stands to-day second to none; and we should be faithless to duty, did we neglect to let others know of any medium's growth and unfoldment. Mrs. Coffman's labors are and have been connected with the Band of Harmony, a new society lately formed here, having for speaker at the present time Dr. Dean Clarke, who is doing a good work in interesting thinking people."

W. R. writes from St. Paul, Minn.: "J. C. F. Grumbine opened the month of November at Central Hall for the Spiritual Alliance and was greeted with a large and friendly audience. Spiritual forces are rather crippled here, but no better field exists for consecrated and conscientious mediumship than here. St. Paul, like Minneapolis and other cities, suffers from undeveloped mediumship, and those who exploit Spiritualism in the name of mammon. Public halls and so-called 'hotels' for mediums and what not are veritable side shows and auxiliaries for personal ambitions and aggrandizements, and often are exploited as assignation houses. Any so-called wonder-worker, who can perform, is sought after, whatever may be his moral or medial qualifications. A rake off of dollars and cents is the summum bonum of the ambition and labor of these incubated sensitives and perennial frauds, while genuine mediumship is starved out. The propaganda of the devil goes on unrelentingly and the Spiritualist has no way or power to stem the tide. Fate and retribution will surely bring about a change. All true workers in St. Paul and Minneapolis can afford to wait and trust. Their guidance is not in vain! Solid and permanent work is being done in both cities by old time workers and stanch defenders of Spiritualism who care most of all for personal purity, honor and genuineness in character and mediumship. So we have faith in the overthrow of the forces of evil and darkness."

Mrs. Mary C. Lyman, of 189 Park avenue, whose ministrations on the West Side have been quite successful, writes: "The First Society of Spiritual Unity, November 1st, organized a children's lyceum, that will meet every Sunday at 2:30 p. m., in Washington Hall, 490 Washington boulevard, corner of Ogden avenue. We desire that this auxiliary to our society may be the means of satisfying a long felt need in the progressive work on the West Side. Many have been obliged to keep their children at home, or send them to orthodox Sunday-schools, not feeling able to send them to lyceums in other parts of our city. Complaints of paying car-fare, added to other attendant expenses, was more than some could afford, especially Sunday after Sunday. Our cause needs your worthy recognition in attending services, and replenishing the treasury. For some time we have only taken a collection, inviting those who were more blest with this world's advantages (materially) to be generous, that those who were unable to pay our former asked donation (10 cents) may have the craving of their spiritual appetites ministered to. We certainly must feel we are indebted to those who leave their bright homes in Spirit-life to bring us the instructive lessons not only of the life eternal opened to us in a continued existence, but profitable in our present every day affairs of to-day, which will enhance our joys now and make more beautiful our happiness in the future life."

J. M. White writes from Carthage, Mo.: "Owing to sickness I have been unable to attend the camps this past summer, but am now open for engagements for lectures, platform tests and seances. I have been giving seances at Sheldon, Jasper and Golden City, and am now intending to work in Carterville, Webb City and Joplin, Mo. My address for the next week will be Carthage, Mo."

F. E. McKenna writes of the good work done at Shepherd, Mich.: "We have just had Mrs. Annie L. Robinson, of Port Huron, here to give us two lectures. Knowing her reputation as a speaker and test medium we secured the Opera House for the meetings. The first evening, owing to a severe rainstorm, a small but very appreciative audience greeted our speaker. The second evening the Opera House was well filled. Mrs. Robinson's two lectures and the many tests she gave while here, has won for her the admiration of all who listened to her, and I am inclined to believe some of our orthodox friends stayed away for fear they might have admired some of the gems of thought as they fell from the lips of our inspired speaker."

Frank T. Ripley, speaker and platform test medium, is filling the large I. O. O. F. Hall for the Spiritual Advance Society of Detroit, Mich. It meets at 2:30 and 7:30 every Sunday in the Walker Block, corner of Fort and Griswell streets. Mr. Ripley can be engaged for December, January, February and March, on liberal terms. Address him at 266 Twenty-first street, Detroit, Mich.

Mrs. M. A. Reed, the medium, has moved to 4002 Ellis avenue, where she will be glad to see her friends.

THE N. S. A.

Complimentary Words from a Prominent Ohioan.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER for November 7 contains the report of President H. D. Barrett to the N. S. A. for the year ending November 17, 1896. It covers twenty columns; is a very comprehensive report, and shows that the cause of Spiritualism is in a very healthy condition. Prof. Barrett had to travel 33,000 miles, through forty States; crossed the continent four times, by four different railroads; giving 200 lectures, in addition to numerous conference talks; has written more than 1,200 letters and 100 articles for Spiritualist and secular newspapers. His herculean labors bore hard upon his health; but the angel-world and kind friends carried him safely through it all. Too much credit cannot be awarded to Prof. Barrett and all the officers of the N. S. A. for the valuable work accomplished in the past year, which, it is safe to say, eclipses any one year since the "Rochester knockings" first convinced the world that we do live hereafter and can talk with our deceased friends. The report should be carefully read by all Spiritualists and Freethinkers, and a general effort made to procure subscriptions for copies of the official proceedings of the N. S. A. when it appears in pamphlet form. C. H. MATHEWS.

Boy Eleven Years Old a Medium.

We have a grandson living with us, eleven years of age, who is giving some of the most startling manifestations for so young a child, without any effort on our part to draw them out. While at a neighbor's house with a few friends, among other tests, he went to the organ and began to touch the keys and acted as if hunting for some particular piece to play. With eyes closed and entranced he manifested a desire to have the piece sung and played. It proved to be the piece that was sung at Mr. W. T. Vance's funeral. A noble man and true Spiritualist, and a soldier in the late rebellion. There was present a part of the choir that sang at his funeral, and after the piece was sang the boy shook hands with all the old friends of the late Mr. Vance, and gave the Grand Army grip to one man present, who had also been a soldier, with many other tests, and with eyes closed and entranced. Last evening, at our house, a man came for a reading and he gave him some of the most wonderful tests of spirit presence that I ever witnessed, and I have seen many and varied manifestations.

MR. AND MRS. LEVI WOOD.

Passed to Spirit-Life.

On the 7th inst. the writer of these lines was called to Washington, Pa., to conduct funeral services, occasioned by the departure of Adelmer, a beautiful boy of 2 years, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Town, former residents of Washington, at present of Montpelier, Ind. Mrs. Town came in the early part of the season on a visit to her mother. About one month since the little boy was taken with a severe cold which terminated in that dreaded disease, scarlet fever. He was pronounced out of danger on two occasions (having a relapse after he was considered nearly recovered) but the treacherous disease preyed in secret upon the little body. He sank rapidly and suffered indescribable agonies until release by a passing out of the mortal. The parents of the child are Spiritualists, constant readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, and are in possession of nearly all the leading works on Spiritualism, so they have all the consolation our beautiful philosophy can afford.

At the burial, as the little casket was being lowered into the ground, the mother, overcome for the time with her grief at the physical separation with her little one, cried: "Good bye, my baby darling." Then, after a pause, she said: "I know your spirit is not there." As no Spiritualists were present, except the parents, an uncle of the departed, and a young lady medium, it is to be hoped that the service, as well as the last words of the mother at the grave, may have made an impression on the minds of those representing the different orthodox beliefs.

Religion of the Future. By S. Weil. Cloth. $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

A Word About Helen Stuart Richings.

TO THE EDITOR:—As I know you to be in love with our cause, and with all who honestly and intelligently work for its promotion, and as I know you would not wrong anyone who is putting their life and energy into the work, I know that when such a person is wronged you would be the first one to fly to their rescue.

I say all of this because of a very short talk I have had with Mrs. Helen Stuart Richings. It appears that some time since, when she was taking a hasty dinner in a Buffalo hotel, oge of those omnipresent newspaper interviewers attacked her for an interview. She told him that as she had to eat her dinner and catch the train which left in a very few moments, she positively had no time for even the shortest possible interview; but, reporter like, he sat down at the table opposite her and plied her with questions as to what kind of a preacher she was, where she was going to preach, and other like questions.

She told him, as plain as language could make it, that she was a Spiritualist, and was going, I think, to Milwaukee, preach Spiritualism.

Judge of her surprise when an extended interview came out announcing that she had renounced Spiritualism, and that henceforth she was going to devote her energies against it. She was to be the pastor of a church which had no sympathy with Spiritualism, and other like news, which the reporter dug wholly out of his own fertile brain.

Then the Chicago Chronicle took the matter up, and published it with a few emendations. The next thing she knew it was in THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, with editorial comments. Mrs. Richings seems to think, in her conversation on the subject, that the spiritual papers in this country are published by able newspaper men, and that their experience with the average daily paper should lead them to receive information from that source, especially when it is against a fellow worker, with a "grain of salt." At least their doubts should be large enough to lead them, before republishing such a thing, to write to the party indicated and ascertain whether they had renounced Spiritualism; if so, why?

Mrs. Richings never renounced Spiritualism—never thought of doing such a thing. On the contrary, she has preached it every Sunday and almost every other day for the last ten years, and hopes to continue to preach it for at least one-third of the incoming century.

Of course you, Mr Editor, like many others, was misled by the report in the daily papers, and had no desire to injure Mrs. Richings.

Though Mrs. Richings has engagements for a year ahead, she occasionally gets word from some one who supposes that she really has forsaken Spiritualism. Please correct the impression; let the world know that Rev. Helen Stuart Richings is yet in the field with her face to the foes of Spiritualism. Yours for the right.

MOSES HULL.

The extract that was published in The Progressive Thinker had been going the rounds of the secular press, and there appearing no denial whatever in regard to it, and Spiritualists eveyrwhere inquiring in regard to its truthfulness, there seemed to be a necessity for a denial. To say the least, that was demanded. When one's standing is assailed, he or she should promptly put in a denial. That is an easy way to set the matter at rest, one that Spiritualists demand. Mrs. Richings is a grand worker, but she should be prompt to correct errors or mistakes. That is the duty of all reformers.

The Popular Science Monthly for November, 1896.

No reader of Appleton's Popular Science Monthly will be likely to complain of dryness in the November number. Bashford Dean, of Columbia University, describes the leading "Public Aquariums in Europe," with illustrations, and tells what devices are used to give them a realistic appearance. Prof. A. S. Packard tells about a climb up "The Crater of Mount Shasta." In "Notes on Bhils, Burmese and Battaks," also illustrated, Dr. R. W. Shufeldt describes the physical and mental characters of three Oriental peoples. Another illustrated descriptive article, by Margaret W. Leighton, has the simple title, "Shells." The opening paper of the number, by Prof. W. H. Hudson, of Stanford University, deals with a more serious subject, "The Moral Standard," its aim being to show the superior reasonableness of scientific ethics. Prof. Edward R. Shaw treats of "The Employment of the Motor Activities in Teaching," showing how natural tendencies of the child that are troublesome if repressed, are helpful when properly directed. Prof. W. R. Newbold gives a scientific view of "Double Personality," a somewhat extreme depiction of which is familiar to the public in Dr. Jekyl and Mr. Hyde. Dr. Harrison Allen gives the careers, with portraits, of "Two Scientific Worthies"—Sir Thomas Browne and Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles. In lighter vein again are "A Dog's Laugh" (illustrated), by M. le Vicomte d'Aiglun, and "Popular Superstitions," by Dr. Walter J. Hoffman. Albert Gaudry calls attention to "The Abundance of Animal Life." Other articles deal with "Science in Wheat-Growing," "Evolution of Insect Instinct," and the teaching of the "Deaf and Dumb." There is also a "Sketch," with portrait, of William C. Redfield, the American meteorologist. In the "Editor's Table" the "new" woman, vague psychology, and the abuse of free libraries receive attention, and Prof. Jordan's "sympsychograph" joke in a recent number is explained for the benefit of those who did not see through it. This magazine leads all others; it is the best scientific magazine in the world. New York; D. Appleton & Company. Fifty cents a number, $5 a year.

Where Was Methuselah During the Deluge.

According to the Literary Digest, this is the question which Dr. Halsey L. Wood raises, and to which he finds no satisfactory answer. He says:

"This distinguished patriarch seems to have been forgotten at that time, for no mention is made of him as one of the chosen few to enter the Ark; and, on the other hand, we are told that 'every living creature perished without the Ark, and every man.'

"Now, Methuselah lived 'nine hundred and sixty and nine years,' and since he had fully ten months of life left to him at the beginning of the flood, he could have completed his grand total of years nowhere else than inside of the Ark. At Noah's birth, Methuselah had full six hundred years to live. 'In the six hundredth year of Noah's life,' 'the windows of heaven were opened,' and 'in the selfsame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife and the three wives of the sons with them into, the Ark.' Noah was therefore five hundred and ninety-nine years old when the flood began.

"Methuselah had still ten months to live ere his 969th year was complete. Where was he? The dwellers in the Ark did not issue from it for a year and ten days after their entrance. Methuselah must have therefore died during the interval, and presumably he was buried; but, strange to say, nothing is said of this singular circumstance."

H. V. SWERINGEN.

The Great Teacher and Medium, F. A. Wiggins, has Something to Say.

To the Editor:—Your widely circulating paper has a large sale here at our meetings each Sunday, and, as the people of every community like to see something in their paper from their home, I will send you just a word from this place. There are, indeed, only a few societies of which I know in better working condition than the First Spiritualist Church of Indianapolis. It has a church home of its own and all of the members seem to most fully enjoy their new quarters. The seating capacity of the main auditorium is about four hundred and fifty, and the size of all evening attendance is limited only by the seating accommodation of the building. I am doing the best that I can, in my humble way, to minister to the wants of this people for the months of October, November and December. I am certainly gratified at the profound interest that is at all times manifest at our meetings, and am glad to report to your many readers that there is a real live society here in this city. Since the society has become organized, under the church laws of this State, the secular press and the community at large have given us a recognition which we certainly did not enjoy before. I look upon this as a significant fact, which it might be well for Spiritualists everywhere to earnestly consider. If the people are so bide-bound by custom that they will not recognize this great truth except it be organized, and if it is really the wish and desire to reach the people, as we pretend, then let us employ the means by which we may secure the end which we seek. Organization seems to me to be one of the most important of all means to this end. But, if on the other hand, it is selfishness that prompts our motives, why, we can go into our retreat and take our light in with us. Selfishness, however, is not a characteristic of any true Spiritualist. It is my opinion, Mr. Editor, that the time has come when Spiritualism should seek, as never before, to reach the masses. A work of propagandism is needed. We are making a few converts here every week; and all that is required anywhere to do this, is a little honest, earnest work down among the people. Fellow workers in the cause let us all get down off our stilts of self-importance and get to work right among the people.

Indianapolis, Ind. F. A. WIGGIN.

Double Personality.

Apparent evidence for the existence of mind in connection with a body of which the consciousness belonging to that body has no knowledge is not unusual, and I have given some illustrations of it in my recent papers. But the interpretation of such phenomena is not easy.

Since our first-hand knowledge of mind is nearly always in the form of a personal consciousness or self, one is at first inclined to ascribe such manifestations to a self. But since they are denied by the normal self, it would then be necessary to assume the existence of a second self in order to account for them, and this second self is conceived by some as existing beneath the level of the normal self and as having its own memories, interests, hopes and fears, as acquainted with the existence of the upper self, and as bearing to it a relation sometimes hostile, sometimes benignant.

Of this theory and its congeners I shall have more to say at another time; for the present I must confine myself to that which I am developing. According to it the evidence which is sufficient to establish the existence of a mental event may be and usually is wholly insufficient to establish that of a personality or self. When an automatic hand writes a message of which the upper consciousness knows nothing—a point, by the way, very hard to prove—we have evidence for the existence of a mental event; but if we ascribe it to a person of any sort, we are practically adding to it, without evidence, a multitude of mental events combined in definite ways.—Prof. W. R. Newbold in Appleton's Popular Science Monthly for November.

WHAT DID THE BABY SEE?

We had watched for days around him,
The youngest of our fold,
The little sprite, with his eyes of light,
And his hair of burnished gold.

But now the eyes were darkened,
Blinded by death and pain,
And we feared the smile we loved the while Might never return again.

It seemed that the baby slumbered,
No sleep the watchers knew,
For the night of pain had come again,
And the hopes that so hopeless grew—

When, lo! the little eyes opened,
The little face shone with light,
And the baby smiled with that sunny smile
Which always expressed delight.

We watched him with awe and wonder;
We watched him with hope and fear;
But the smile had fled, and the baby was dead,
And we were weeping here.

What did that smile betoken?
What could the rapture be?
In the hour of death, with his latest breath,
Oh! what did the baby see?

FINE STANZA OF POETRY.

It Is Accompanied by a Portrait.

TO THE EDITOR:—For the benefit of your many readers, I will state that I made the acquaintance of Mr. Jacob Ita and his wife, Mrs. S. Ita, of 1522 Brady street, Davenport, Iowa, who are mediums possessing rare spiritual gifts, and Mr. Ita has developed independent slate-writing equal to any that I have seen.

I have a slate that Mr. Ita gave me the use of, that contains a spiritual message produced through him last summer at Moline, Ill. This message, which I herewith copy, is of vital importance to the skeptic, etc. It was done under satisfactory test conditions, between slates fastened by rubber bands, in the presence of the sitter. There was no pencil used, and the writing is in pink:

The insect bursting from its tomb-like bed—
The grain that in a thousand grains revives—
The trees that seem in wint'ry torpor dead—
Yet each new year renewing their green lives;
All teach, without the added aid of faith,
That life still triumphs o'er apparent death. Signed, DAVID SWING.

A bust portrait of this noted minister, which is a correct likeness of the author of the message, appears at the bottom of the slate. What more proof can be given to convince the investigator of its genuineness, and of Mr. Ita's grand mediumship? G. G. W. VAN HORN.

A New Worker in Denver.

To the Editor:—After my sojourn in my native State, New York, and closing my business there, I have again returned to this beautiful city of Denver, where the sun shines in brightness; and to those ailing, this air and sun are blessings that Dame Nature bestows so gratuitously.

Again I find Denver alive in Spiritualism, and many mediums here. Assisting Dr. G. C. B. Ewell, of the First Spiritual Church, are Miss Jennie Darrell, Mr. Harry Shagren, independent slate-writing, and Mrs. M. A. Gridley, formerly of Brooklyn, N. Y., a prophetic clairvoyant also Geo. W. Walrond, trance and inspirational speaker, with many others here. It was my pleasure to attend the materializing seance at the First Church, given by Mrs. Darrell, Friday evening, October 30. It being the first demonstration by this lady in this city; it was quite a success.

Last Sunday evening I listened to Geo. W. Walrond and enjoyed his lecture, which demonstrated the philosophy of truth we all love. His tests were all recognized and the meeting pronounced a success. There are mediums and material here to move some things to great success, if it were possible to bring the forces together.

The Spiritualists' State convention convened in the First Spiritualist Church, Monday, November 9, and continued one week. Much good work is expected to be done.

MRS. E. L. TEED.

As its title denotes, it is a veritable encyclopedia of information on the subject. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"The Dead Man's Message," an occult romance by Florence Marryat. The author's wide experience in Spiritualism and her study of occult science have prepared her to write this romance, which will be found laden with gems picked up in the course of her investigation and studies. Cloth $1. For sale at this office.

"Talleyrand's Letter to the Pope" will be found especially interesting to all who would desire to make a study of Romanism and the Bible. The historic facts he states, and his keen, scathing review of Romish ideas and practices should be read by all. Sold at this office. Price 25 cents

"Mahomet, the Illustrious." By Godfrey Higgins, Esq. (Library of Liberal Classics.) No author was better qualified to write an impartial and honest life of Mahomet than Godfrey Higgins, and this volume is intensely interesting. It should be read in conjunction with Gibbon's work. For sale at this office. Price, 25 cents.

"Mediumship and Its Development, and How to Mesmerize to Assist Development." By W. H. Bach. Especially useful to learners who seek to know and utilize the laws of mediumship and development, and avoid errors. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

"The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional." This book, by the well-known Father Chiniquy, reveals the degrading, impure influences and results of the Romish confessional, as poved by the sad experience of many wrecked lives. Price, by mail, $1. For sale at this office.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE.

For the Home, the Lyceum and Societies.

A Manual of Physical, Intellectual and Spiritual Culture.

COMPILED BY EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

A COLLECTION OF MUSIC AND Songs, Golden Chain Recitations, Memory Gems, Choral Responses, Funeral Services, Programs for sessions, Parliamentary Rules. Instructions for Organizing and conducting Lyceums. Instructions for Physical Culture, Calisthenics and Marching; Banners, Standards, the Band of Mercy, etc.; a book by the aid of which a Progressive Lyceum, a Spiritual or Liberal Society may be organized and conducted without other assistance. It supplies the wants of Spiritual Societies for fresh Spiritual songs, with music free from the dismal tone of the old hymnology. It furnishes a unique selection of choice readings and responses such as no other selection contains. It gives a practical system of graceful calisthenics, every step of which is made plain by engravings. It gives instructions how to make the badges and banners and instructs in marching. It shows how to establish a Band of Mercy as auxiliary to the Lyceum, and has all the most beautiful songs which have been gathered up by that movement.

The author and compiler of this Guide is eminently prepared for the task by years of devoted labor in the Lyceum. The book is the result of practical work and tested by the interest awakened in the actual session of the Lyceum.

While intended for the working Lyceum, the guide is admirably adapted to the needs of the family, supplying 76 pages of new spiritual music and words found nowhere else, except in sheet form at many times the cost. The book has been placed at the remarkably low price of 50 cents, sent postpaid.

HERESY,

...OR...

LED TO THE LIGHT.

A Thrilling, Psychological Story of Evangelization and Free Thought. It is to Protestantism what the "Secrets of the Convent" is to Catholicism.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

The distinguished author, Hudson Tuttle, requires no introduction to the readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, but the following headings of chapters will show them what they may expect from the book:

CONTENTS:—An Idyl—Fordham—Building the Church—The Evangelist—Blood—The Saloon—The Lost Daughter—Law—The Harvest of Souls—Jane Grey—The Mother of Cain—Evolution—Stella—The Cell—Death—A Step Forward—The Home Circle—The Double Role—Heresy—Annette—The Bank Robbery—Liberty—All is Well That Ends Well—The New Church—The New Way; Led to the Light

Every chapter is devoted to one idea, and the whole presents so many tableaux moving onward to the climax. The fiendish career of the revivalist is contrasted with the character of the honest minister and the thinking agnostic. The steps by which a preacher emerges from the church, and the difficulties he meets are graphically presented. The new church and progressive lyceum evolved out of the old, form an interesting study to those seeking new methods.

It is a beautiful volume of 223 pages, and the price in accordance with our new departure, is 30 cents, postpaid, or five copies for $1 25. For sale at the office of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

LIFE IN TWO SPHERES.

A Fascinating Work.

The readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will remember the story under the above title, by Hudson Tuttle, which was published in its columns. At the time, constant inquiries were made as to its appearing in book form. This wish has now been gratified. It makes a volume of 243 pages, in style and form like the "Convent of the Sacred Heart," with a finely-engraved likeness of the author on the cover. The scenes of the story alternately shift from earth to the spirit spheres, and the philosophy of Spiritualism, the occupation and modes of life of spiritual beings, are presented in the pleasing form of narrative.

The following are the chapter-titles: Introduction; The House of the Sage; Home of the Miser; The Low Societies; Hades; Christmastide in the Spheres of Light; Christmastide and the Golden Gate; The Unhappy Marriage; Easter Day in Heaven; A Visit to the Earth; The Change Called Death; Coming to the Knowledge of the Light; The Society Again Visits Earth; The Forsaken and Despised; Discussion; A Visit to a Distant Globe; Reunion in the Spirit-world; Contentedness Not Goodness; Address of the Sage.

It is a book the Spiritualist will be delighted with; a book in which the investigator will find answers to ever-recurring questions; a book which will interest the church member, nor repel the most prejudiced. The price in paper is 50 cents; muslin $1; postpaid.

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES.

A New Edition, Profusely Illustrated.

"I choose that a story should be founded on probability, and not always resemble a dream. I desire to find nothing in it trivial or extravagant; and I desire above all, that under the appearances of fable, there may appear some latent truth, obvious to the discerning eye, though it escape the observation of the vulgar."—VOLTAIRE.

CONTENTS: "The White Bull," a Satirical Romance; "Zadig, or Fate," an Oriental History; "The Sage and the Atheist;" "The Princess of Babylon;" "The Man of Forty Crowns;" "The Huron, or Pupil of Nature;" "Micromegas," a Satire on Mankind; "The World as it Goes;" "The Black and the White;" "Memnon, the Philosopher;" "Andre Des Touches at Siam;" "Bababec;" "The Study of Nature;" "A Conversation With a Chinese;" "Plato's Dream;" "A Pleasure in Having no Pleasure;" "An Adventure in India;" "Jeannot and Colin;" "Travels of Scarmentado;" "The Good Brahmin;" "The Two Comforters;" "Ancient Faith and Fable."

"A delightful reproduction, unique and refreshing."—Boston Commonwealth.

VOLNEY'S RUINS

—AND—

THE LAW OF NATURE,

TO WHICH IS ADDED

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens of the Ancients.

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

S. E. F., Sioux Falls: Q. An aged person, nearly blind, dependent on charity. Would it be wrong to open the door and set the spirit free? What would be the condition that had lost mind and memory here?

A. It is best to bear the misfortunes of this life to the end. The spirit, that was enfeebled by its contact with the physical body will not be permanently affected by the failure of the latter. It is not to be supposed that the spirit at once recovers its full activity. The infirmities of the body are reflected, for a time, but the new life will be glorious by comparison. When the spiritual perceptions awaken to the new life they will carry with them an unspeakable joy.

A. T. Waterman: Q. Will you kindly answer in The Progressive Thinker the following question: Webster defines Providence—"2. Especially the foresight and care which God exercises over his creatures;" * * * "3. (Theological sense.) A manifestation of the care and superintendence which God exercises over his creatures; an event in which the care or design of God is directly seen and shown."

The latter definition is the equivalent, I apprehend, of what is called "special providence." Now for the question: In the philosophy or religion of Spiritualism is there anything which answers to "Providence?"

A. In the absolute control of the universe, material and spiritual, by law we have the perfect expression of providence.

When appeals are made, as by prayer, or earnest desire, to a higher power, there may come the interposition of spirit friends, and there is a manifestation of what has been called "special providence." In such cases there is no suspension of law, but forces are brought to bear on other lines. The answering of such prayers, and the interposition of spiritual powers, depends on the environing condiditions which makes this possible.

Although the Divine Spirit may not directly answer, there are laws and conditions through and by which the earnest spirit is granted the assistance it desires. It is a mistake to refer the answer directly to God, as it would be to say he supports the world in space by his extended arm. The Protestant churches hold as sacrilege the appeal to any being but God. The Catholics are more wise, and offer their prayers to their patron saints, by which comforting love and assuring affection are awakened by direct contact.

W. Buist Picken, England: Q. Recently it was my great pleasure to read your profound and comprehensive work, Psychic Science. In it you say: "If a certain vessel be closed, and the air exhausted, until only one hundred atoms remain, that hundred leave no space, but occupy the entire vessel. If the vacuum be made more perfect, and only ten atoms remain, the ten still occupy the whole space; and if the process could be carried so far that only one remained, it would still fill the space * * * In short, were there but atom in the universe, that atom would fill all space."

Than that I have not read anything more interesting for many years. What concerns me about it is the data. If your stupendous affirmations be based on adequate philosophical and scientific data, I would be deeply indebted to you for directions as to where to see it.

A. I am always at a great disadvantage when called on to explain passages in the books I have published. Writing as the amanuensis of intelligences far beyond and superior to myself, I cannot give more than my own understanding of such passages, unless I am able to recall their authors and allow them to explain and enlarge; and this I am not often able to do. I infer that Prof. Crookes in the series of researches where he employed the "tube" which has given his name world-wide renown, and opened a new field of discovery, is the authority on which the statement rests.

John Mollhoff: Q. Is it possible that an infidel's oath can be impeached and made void according to the Constitution of the United States?

A. The framers of the Constitution carefully preserved that wonderful instrument from religious bias. The word God does not occur in it. Even in the oath prescribed for the President it is omitted, and he is allowed to affirm if he desires. The first article in the amendments, to make the matter irrevocable, says: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." This absolutely separates the government from religion, placing all religions, or no religion, on the same basis. They all must take care of themselves, and stand before the law as equals. No officer, even the President, is required to take an oath on the Bible or in the name of God, for, if they prefer, they can affirm, and this is true of every oath under the supreme Constitution. Any State law to the contrary would be set aside by the highest court. An infidel's affirmation is as valid as the oath of a Calvinist in the cognizance of this supreme authority.

A Render, Texas: Q. (1) What is the difference between psychometry and clairvoyance, and have they sufficient foundation to be denominated a science?

(2) Can future events be foretold by either, when no thought of such events has been in the mind of the subject?

(3) I have, on rare occasions, in a state half-waking, been able to read, as from a tablet, poetry of a high order. How shall I understand or explain this?

A. (1) Psychometry and clairvoyance both begin with the impressibility of the mind. All things have their aura, or spirit atmosphere, and the influence this exerts on the sensitive subject is Whitehead THREE Linotype called psychometric; a person, a place, a mineral specimen, a letter, each gives impressions of all the influences they have received. The mind of the subject simply receives. Clairvoyance goes further and sees beyond these impressions. It is true that the two blend most inextricably at times. Both are small divisions of spiritual or psychic science.

(2) Prophesy of future events in the life of an individual, with sufficient knowledge, is as possible as the coming of an eclipse or occultation of a planet in astronomy. If this were not so, then we could not believe the "reign of law."

(3) Such visions presage the dawning of clairvoyant powers, and, if desired, should be earnestly desired, and cultivated.

"A Mother," St. Paul, Minn.: Q. I had a little boy die four years ago. I now hear rappings, and sometimes the sound as of a distant bell. Is it possible that he comes back to me?

A. Let this mother be assured that these sounds are results of attempts made by her darling boy to attract her attention, and that there is no place so attractive to him as his mother's side; and that although borne by attendant spirits far away, yet will he be connected with the strands of love over which will be transmitted to him your thoughts. He is tied like the fabled stork, that even when taking its longest flights to distant countries, bore away one end of the thread, the other of which was firmly secured in the home-nest—wherever it went it felt the pull of the cord. So is it with your child, with all the dear children, who stand just on the other side of the thin veil which conceals our mortal vision.

T. M., Blue Mound, Ill.: Q. I wish to know what Spiritualism teaches concerning epilepsy and catalepsy. The cause does not seem to be understood in many cases. Has obsession anything to do with it; and, if so, how could this be determined, and what means taken to relieve the afflicted person?

A. Epilepsy, a "falling sickness," has no especial psychological significance. Its name descends from Hipocrates, and is intended to mean the sudden loss of sensation and spasms. It is strictly an organic disease, referable to defects of bodily functions, the result of many diverse causes reflected on the brain. It is difficult to diagnose and perhaps entirely beyond the control of the most skillful physician, who can only hope to palliate the symptoms, trusting to the vital process to bring restoration, which they sometimes do. Excesses in ancestors is the first of causes, intensified often by excesses in the subject.

Catalepsy is entirely distinct, although a state of suspended powers of motion, and as the symptoms are similar in the hypnotic patient, the term "Cataleptic state," has been used as synonymous, and "cataleptic," as the same as "hypnotic." This is not advisable, as it is misleading.

In ancient times the epileptic, like all others seized with violent disease, was regarded as obsessed, and exorcism was a most lucrative profession. We do not desire to return to these absurd claims of the priesthood, although admitting the possibility of obsession. It would be equivalent to denying the claims of mesmerism or hypnotism to do that—for if a hypnotist is able to control a subject, doing so not by any powers conferred by the body, but by spiritual force, if the same hypnotist freed from his body came to this subject as a spirit, it would be possible for him to influence him in the same manner, and such influence might be extended to a complete control, which would be known as obsession. Lyman C. Howe made some very valuable suggestions on this subject in a late number of The Progressive Thinker, which, although apparently in criticism of the position maintained in this department, really expressed the exact thoughts I would have set forth.

TRAVEL AND WORK.

A Prominent Worker Writes Notes of Interest.

FROM DENVER TO NEW YORK AND WASHINGTON.

TO THE EDITOR:—The days pass so swiftly that I hardly realize that I have not sent you a letter, until someone by letter inquires why I do not write THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. Since my last I have been on to New York City and the N. S. A. convention. I found New York alive, as it always is, but, for the size of the city, little interest is manifest in our cause. The First Society is doing good work under the leadership of Mrs. Newton, but comparatively small audiences are to be found for the metropolis. I had the pleasure of meeting many old friends, as well as making the acquaintance of that gifted worker, Mrs. Palmer Ressaguo.

I addressed the afternoon meeting, and gave some ideas on the N. S. A. work, following with demonstrations of the phenomena, to the delight of many, and wonder of some, I suppose. While I am ever proud of my mediumship, I can but feel that earnest wish, that man would be more interested in the philosophical, rather than sensational side of our work; but both are needed, and I hope that we are steadily growing, more, perhaps, than we can at the present time realize.

I also found that Mr. Leonard had made an attempt to start a new society, and was making much progress, which I trust will be crowned with grand success, for surely that large city ought to support, ably, many Spiritual meetings. I also met those earnest workers, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, of Jamestown, N. Y., who labored for the new society in October.

I also had the pleasure of being the guest of "The Woman's Progressive Union," of Brooklyn, and hearing our Emerson speak and give tests in his inimitable manner, and at the close of his work addressed them for a time on the N. S. A. work.

An invitation from my friend, J. B. Hatch, Jr., of Boston, made it possible for me to join the New England delegation at New York, and journey with them to Washington. My thanks are due to him and others of the party who made the time pass most pleasantly.

Of course the convention was a success and much good for the cause was accomplished. A body such as gathered there could not do otherwise; for when we sink personalities and seek the true interests of our cause we must prosper.

I was sorry to leave the hall before adjournment, but to reach home in time for my Sunday work it was imperative. I must beg the pardon of my friends for my unceremonious flitting, and wish them all God speed at this time.

I reached home—tired—at 7 a. m., but ready for work, and occupied both services with accounts of the work of the convention.

During my absence Mrs. M. A. Gridley, Dr. Sarah L. Hard and Mrs. Ewell ably ministered to my people. I found on my arrival my friends of the Texas camp—Mrs. Jennie Darrell and Harry Shagren, both well-known mediums—and at the present time we are holding a series of seances that are awakening most decided interest.

Mrs. E. Louise Teed, who was here in the spring, has returned to locate for the winter, and meets with a warm welcome from all.

On Friday evening a surprise party was tendered me by friends, headed by Mrs. Gridley. After the bountiful repast, happy words of welcome and appreciation of my labors here were expressed by Mrs. Gridley and Mr. Walrond and duly responded to by myself.

I must bring my rambling letter to an end, with warm regards from Starlight and myself to all. G. C. B. EWELL.

LITTLE GIRL'S LETTER.

Her Mamma's Birthday, and What Was Done.

Her Spirit Band Arranged a Nice Programme.

DEAR MR. FRANCIS:—I am a little girl, twelve years of age, and have been a medium one year and a half. Last Saturday was my mamma's birthday, and my spirit band arranged a programme for the evening to surprise her. Six of my controls played solos on the piano; one sang an Indian song, and a papoose came and sang a comic song. My papa wrote the enclosed story for the occasion, and I think it would be pleasant reading for your many subscribers, if you have room to print it. We look forward to Tuesday morning's mail to bring us the ever welcome PROGRESSIVE THINKER. With many wishes for your success, I remain,

Your friend,
GERTIE B. MILLS.

[We have not room for the entire story, but give the Spiritualist part, as of most interest to Spiritualist readers. —ED.]

* * * As I glanced back over my past life, there was no spot or place or act which I would have altered. My wife's life was as pure as the snow on a mountain peak, and our home life was guided in a spirit of love and truth. Had we sinned by loving our darling child too much? Such thoughts as these took possession of me and threatened my reason. I paced the floor continually, watching the door of the sick room as hungry as a shipwrecked sailor for the sight of land.

After many sleepless nights, and days of torturing anxiety, my wife told me the crisis approached. Our darling had put up a good fight for life, and with youth and a good constitution on her side, might yet stay on earth to bless our declining years. The doctor approached and told me to prepare my fortitude to enter the infected room. As I stepped in and beheld my once beautiful child lying on the bed gazing at me with tender eyes from which the fever had not entirely left, I suppressed a scream. Her face had lost its contour, and the flesh from her shapely arms, limbs and body had gone to feed the fever. The doctor motioned me to advance towards the bedside, and as our darling attempted to hold out her arms to me, I sank on my knees, unable to stand and realize the great change.

As my wife came in and knelt beside me she took our hands in hers and said: "Dear mamma and papa, I have been away from you a long time, but except when I was in great pain I have been very happy. I think I have been in spirit-land, and wish you could see it. I cannot describe it to you, as everything is so beautiful. Happy children greeted me, and a spirit clad in white, whose face beamed with love, took me by the hand and led me along well-trimmed walks bordered by banks of flowers more beautiful than any you ever saw or imagined. Groups of happy children romped on the greenest of grass; all seemed so happy singing the most musical airs, that I longed to join them. My dear spirit guide, anticipating my thought, said: 'My dear child, I must now take you back, but in a very short time I will come for you, and then you will have these children for your playmates, and forever be happy in spirit-life.' Now my dear parents, you must not grieve for me if I go, for if you could see it as I have, you would not wish me to remain in this world of pain and sorrow, but go where all is joy and peace."

She closed her eyes as she ceased talking, and I thought her spirit had winged its flight to the beautiful home she had described. We arose from our knees tearless, and as I held my wife's hand, I realized that only too soon our idolized child would take the journey she seemed to look forward to with delight. She remained for a few moments in a stupor or trance, and then slowly opened her eyes and beckoned us to come nearer. Taking us each by the hand, she said: "Mamma and papa, the same dear spirit has come after me, and I must go. She tells me you must not think of me as dead and lying in the ground, but in a beautiful celestial home, surrounded by everything bright and happy. She also says that I can visit you again in your home, and although you may not be able to see me, yet in time I can make my presence felt by you. Good-bye, dear ones;" and with a kiss, and a beatific smile on her face, she passed to a higher realm.

Neither my wife nor myself cried out, but with a convulsive sob we kissed the face which had always given us so much pleasure and comfort, and went into another room, while kind hands straightened out the limbs and prepared the mortal remains for burial.

The funeral over, my wife, who had until now kept up by a superhuman effort, succumbed, and was taken down with brain fever. Loving friends stood around, taking turns in the sick room; the best medical practitioners were called in, and for weeks her life hung in the balance. Day and night I sat by her bedside, watching for the fever to abate. It seemed as though sleep had deserted me, and even when some kind friend led me from her bedside and induced me to lie down, it was only for a few minutes until I was up again. When the doctor informed me the rallying point had arrived, I went in with him, hoping for the best—fearing the worst. After a time she opened her eyes, and taking my hand in hers, said: "My dear husband, it is hard for you to lose me too, but a spirit band is here waiting to take me to the other side, and our precious child is with them. I want you to always remember us as having been your good and loving friends who made you a pleasant visit for a few years on earth, and have now passed to another home which they will prepare for you, and make it even better and happier forever than the happiest hours or years which we spent together on earth. I have seen many of our relatives and friends who have passed over, and some are standing beside us now. A glorious, happy life awaits all who have conformed to right principles and stood up sturdily with Love and Truth as mottoes on their banner. Since we must part, it will be only for a short time. Every person, unless he is taken off prematurely, must bear his sorrows and burdens on this mundane sphere, that he may prove by right living, that although he is beset by temptations and evil desires, yet by repulsing them he will be better fitted to occupy a place among the exalted spirits in the celestial home. And now, good-bye, dear husband. I shall always watch over you, and when the appointed time comes, will be here with our darling child to guide you to happiness and love."

She kissed me, and all was over.

What happened after that is mere conjecture. Kind friends attended to the preparations for the funeral, and after the excitement which I had passed through was over, I found myself once more attending to my duties as before. Many years have passed since the scenes which I have narrated occurred, and many friends who were kind to me in my dire distress have joined their loved ones on the other side. I sit patiently waiting for my summons to go, feeling that my rewards will be commensurate with the good my example has done by strictly upholding Love and Truth.

IMPORTANT FACTS.

They Are Plainly Told by Mrs. Mattie E. Hull.

Incidents Which Illustrate Conditions in Real Life.

To the Editor:—Sometime since, while I was filling an engagement in a town, (not necessary to name here,) I reached the hall quite a little while before it was time to open the meeting, and took my seat in the front row of chairs designed for the audience, until such time as the chairman should come to accompany me to the platform. As the people came in, and the chairs on each side and behind me filled, I overheard bits of conversation that probably would have been suppressed, if the parties engaged had known my indenity. There were some things said in that fragmentary talk that set me to thinking, and that thinking has caused me to jot down from the typewriter, the following lines.

One lady addressed another thus: "I never come here to listen to the lectures, I wouldn't give a dime to hear anybody speak. I come here for the tests." "Do you often get one?" was the response of the lady to whom the conversation was addressed. "Oh, my! no!" was the answer. "But I stand just as good a chance as any one, and I had rather come here and pay ten cents, and run my chances, than to go to a medium and pay for a sitting. I would be more sure of getting tests than I am when I come here, and I have no dollars to throw away on mediums."

"Are you a Spiritualist?" interrogated the lady to whom the question was first addressed. "I don't know much about it. All I know is what I have seen here. "I never read a Spiritualist book or paper in my life, but I guess I am as much a Spiritualist as anything. A medium told me once that I was going to lose some money, and I lost some, so there must be something in it."

In a few moments I heard another party say: "I know there is something in it, for we have circles in our house, but we have them on the sly" (the words, "on the sly," were said in a lower tone than the preceding sentence). All this made a deep impression on my mind. "Even our children," she went on to say, "know nothing about it." The lady to whom these words were addressed asked: "Do you get any manifestations?" "Yes," was the response. "We get lovely messages from our little girl. She gives beautiful descriptions of her spirit-home. She says she has teachers, and that she will tell us who they are after a while. She says she often sees the children, and she wishes they would not cry so much for her."

The woman who was receiving this precious bit of information said: "I should think you would tell them. I remember how they took on when she died." "Yes I know," was the answer, "but they couldn't understand it, and it would be just like them to tell it at school; the other children would make fun of them. There is time enough yet. I prefer to wait until they are old enough to fight their own battles."

As the numbers in the hall increased and the hum of voices was heard from every part of the room, I wondered if the dialogues to which I had been a listener were a sample of the chit-chat that was going on all about me. I knew it could not be, for I observed many familiar faces—faces of friends who I knew had been in Spiritualism a long time, and who desired the best there was in its glorious philosophy. Notwithstanding this, the ardor I had taken to the hall on behalf of my work had suddenly chilled, and after my introduction to the audience, I felt to say, "What came ye out for to see?"

I have schooled myself as much as possible during my many years of public work to be as positive as possible to disagreeable conditions that I may feel from one or many in the audience, and to rise to an altitude where my spirit may become receptive to the higher influences; but there are occasions where it requires all the will and soul-force one may command, to conquer disturbing elements, and I felt thus on this occasion.

What a fine inspiration(?) one might be expected to gather from an audience made up mostly of such individuals. What a compliment is paid to our mediums when those who rush for the front seats feel they "stand as good a chance to get a test as any one, and have no money to throw away" on them. What a sad comment upon our earnest, faithful lecturers, to know there is even one in the audience who has listened to lectures and lectures, and yet "doesn't understand anything about Spiritualism." What an incentive there is to writers of books and and publishers of papers, when halls are crowded and emptied, and not a dozen out of the hundreds who pass the table offering Spiritualistic literature, even look at books and papers treating on these subjects.

What avails it, as far as the good of the cause is concerned, though a so-called Spiritualist praises our lectures and promises to defend mediums? Is that father or mother a true Spiritualist who will invite mediums secretly to their homes and hold circles "on the sly," not even allowing their children to participate in the joy when a departed member of the family comes with messages of love from the Spirit-world? Would a mother—a true Spiritualist—put a child to bed sobbing for its dead sister, when she had reason to suppose that little one would shortly appear in another room under the roof where the little mourner was sleeping? If so, all I have to say is, Spiritualism has not touched the deeps of her soul and done its work there.

I would not in any way, either with voice or pen, say aught to induce people to discount mediumship. All we know of the sublime teachings of Spiritualism, is due directly or indirectly to that source, but I press the question home to the readers of your widely circulated journal, has not the method of the past few years relative to the management of a large per cent of the local meetings, relegated the most spiritual work to the rear?

Some of the readers of these lines were identified with the work of Spiritualism in its early days. I would ask if there was ever a grander work achieved than in those times when Prof. Denton, Thos. Gales Forster, Achsah Sprague, Mrs. M. S. Towsend Wood, Lizzie Doten, N. S. and I. P. Greenleaf, Warren Chase, Dr. Storer and a host of others whose names shine like stars in the galaxy of Spiritualism, graced its rostrum? Those who heard those grand advocates of our philosophy in those days when Spiritualists were as one brotherhood, know the inspirations through their organisms fell like holy baptisms upon those who listened. Skeptics crowded the audience rooms and went away to investigate, and ascertain if their statements were true. Where did they go? To the home circles; they were held in every community. Boys and girls were touched by the power of the spirit, and related wonderful visions and many of them spake as mortal never spake before. Who does not hold tender memories of those days who experienced those things? There was no spirit of rivalry or jealousy felt on those hallowed occasions, hearts were softened and made tender as the dear messages from our arisen friends were voiced by human lips. From the circle-room the newly converted, went to the public meetings to hear explained the things they had seen and heard. There was a strength in the work of that day because the laborers in the vineyard of Spiritualism, were working on spiritual lines.

I believe in, and thoroughly endorse the idea of co-operation between the phenomenal and philosophical in Spiritualism in public, wherever it seems the most practical, if satisfactory work can be done.

But is not the matter of Spiritualism put in a peculiar and a false light when it is proclaimed emphatically by those most interested in phenomenal work, that "audiences will not gather to hear a lecture unless supplemented with a test seance." That may be true in some localities, but it is not the case the world over, and is not such a statement a libel on the intelligence and integrity of the rank and file of Spiritualists?

I have met many of our grand workers the past year, have learned from them, that they continue to be successful though they conduct their meetings in the old way. Sometimes I follow them in their work and I learn by those who have been favored with their services that they "fill the bill."

There are but few mediums, comparatively speaking, who can do as good work in the presence of an audience of hundreds as in a quiet parlor meeting. One failure by a medium is heralded an hundred times more than a half dozen successful readings, and in numerous instances, public work taken up at an early stage in a medium's career has proven disastrous, not only to the health of the medium but the mediumship itself.

There are occasions, especially at the large gatherings such as one meets at the campmeetings, where it seems absolutely necessary for phenomenal work on the platform. Those who are called to do this are as a general rule satisfactory in their work. The manifestations given, strengthen and clinch the arguments. Tests of wonderful accuracy, and magnificent readings are given. While these grand mediums are numerous, they are not to be found in every community where there are Spiritualists, or where spiritual meetings are held. I do not know of a lecturer in the field that objects to co-operating occasionally with a first-class medium, I do, however, know of many who protest to sitting an hour after giving a lecture, and listening to so-called readings, advice in business schemes, the talking over domestic troubles, and hunting of "lost papers," under the pretence of giving tests.

I do not wonder that many of the older and more thoughtful ones among our adherents are conspicious in the meetings in some localities for their absence. If they were furnished food for thought, and felt an effort was being made to get into the soul of Spiritualism, many who have gone to different churches would return to their old love and be as ready as in former times to help bear aloft the standard of Spiritualism. There are glorious exceptions, to the conditions mentioned in this communication, and I believe that the time is not far distant, when the majority of our good people will be led to see that Spiritualism, to every individual means unfoldment, education —a rising into higher life, a knowledge that we are spirits here and now, and as such, must take up its Great Work.

FROM "THE HUB."

Notes and News of Spiritualism in Boston.

A New England Party Attends the N. S. A. Convention.

To the Editor:—It is so seldom that we see a Boston letter, or news of any kind from the Hub, that we think the Spiritualists of the West must think that the Spiritualist of the East are all asleep. But let me tell you that we are all wide-awake and are trying to advance the great cause of Spiritualism.

It was a great pleasure to the writer to meet so many Spiritualists of the West at the convention just held in Washington. I think the New England Spiritualists showed their interest by attending the convention in such large numbers. It was the largest party that ever left New England—Massachusetts and Connecticut furnishing the largest numbers.

The party started from Boston, via the N. Y. N. H. & H. R. R., in their special car, arriving at Fall River at about 8 o'clock. Leaving their car, the party went on board the magnificent steamer (The Priscilla) of the Fall River line. The night was all that could be asked for, for the comfort and pleasure of the party.

After a good night's rest, the party arrived in New York at 7 o'clock Monday morning. The Massachucetts and Maine members of the party congregated in the grand saloon of the steamer to await and receive the Excursionists that were to join the party at New York, coming from Connecticut via rail.

From the Priscilla we went on board an annex boat (which had been engaged for our party), and sailed across the river to Jersey City, where we found an excellent breakfast awaiting us.

After satisfying the inner man, we boarded a special car of the Royal Blue line and journeyed on to Philadephia, Pa., where we made a stop of about three hours.

The party visited the Mint, Independence Hall and Wannamaker's store, after which they sat down to dinner furnished by the Royal Blue line. We found as we entered the spacious dining room a long table with covers laid for 53.

After partaking of a bounteous feast, we again boarded the train and started for the National Capital to attend the Convention. The train arrived at Washington at 6:30 P.M., and the company found carriages in waiting to convey them to their hotel, the Ebbitt House. The people that went to make up the jolly party from New England are as follows. Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Hatch, Jr., and Master E. W. Hatch and Charlie L. C. Hatch, of Boston; Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, Worcester; Mrs. Carrie P. Prull, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Hatcher, Mr. Hebron Libby, Boston; Mrs. M. E. Young, Mrs. Mattie Allbe, Somerville; Mrs. Burus Stewart, Lake Pleasant; Mr. and Mrs. H. Makenzie, Somerville; Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Wentworth, Charlestown; Mrs. Flavin Thrall and Miss Lehavne Thrall, Poquonock, Ct; Mr. and Mrs. Storrs, Hartford, Ct; Mr. N. U. Lyon, Fall River; Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Rand, Hartland, Maine; Mrs. M. L. Bowers, New York; Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Fowler, Lynn; Mr. F. W. Smith, Mr. A. H. Blakinton, Rockland, Maine; Mrs. A. B. Pinney, Mrs. A. Holman, Mrs. Emma Grant, of Winsted, Ct; Mrs. A. E. Pierce, Hartford, Ct; Mrs. J. J. Whitney (California) now of Boston, Mass; Mrs. Hattie Penney, Miss Marie Sullivan, Boston; Mr. M. A. Warren, Mr. Fred. Woodbury of Hudson, Mass.; Mr. C. W. Sullivan, Boston; Mrs. Mattie Chamberlain, Hyde Park, Mass.; Mr. and Mrs. Whiting, New Haven, Ct.; Mr. W. H. Hawkes, Boston; Mr. W. H. Bach, Springfield, Mass.; Mrs. Anna Dick, Dr. N. P. Smith, Mrs. L. A. Potter, Miss C. F. Sherman, Mrs. Sarah Gill, Boston; Mrs. Maggie Waite, New York; Mr. Mullen, New York. Dr. G. C. B. Ewell joined the party in New York. You can see by the list that the party consisted of workers.

There are many among the above that became aquainted with the Western Spiritualists, and their friendship is bound together with a strong cord that will take all eternity to sever.

I know I must be trying your patience, so I will say a word about the meeting in Boston, and then I will stop this rambling letter. After being closed all summer the meetings opened in October. The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society; that meets at 241 Tremont Street.

This society is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, in this part of the country. It has for its members some of the oldest Spiritualists, and some of the greatest workers. It is a charitable society and does a good work. It meets every Friday.

On Sunday, Oct. 4, The Boston Spiritual Temple that meets in Berkeley Hall opened its meeting. It was to have had as its speaker for that month Prof. J. Clegg Wright, but owing to illness he was obliged to cancel the engagement. (We trust that ere this time he has fully recovered, as we can ill afford to lose such workers). But the society was fortunate in securing the service of that very popular speaker and test medium Mr. J. Frank Baxter, who on account of the disbanding of a society for which he was going to speak, was at liberty.

The First Spiritual Temple opened its meetings Sunday Oct. 4, having as medium Mr. and Mrs. O. L. Concannon and as speaker in the afternoon that excellent trance speaker Mrs. N. J. Willis. Full houses have been the results.

On Sunday afternoon Oct. 4, the Boston Spiritual Lyceum opened its school and a good number of children took part in the opening exercises. This, the youngest lyceum in the country, is fast growing in numbers. It is officered by young people and can well be called the Young People's Lyceum. As this is the only lyceum that meets in Boston (I am sorry to say), the Spiritualists should see to it that their children attend. Nothing is taught in this lyceum but Spiritualism. The writer being the conductor, would like to hear from the different Conductors and officers of lyceums throughout the country. We would also be pleased to receive letters from any child or pupil in any lyceum.

On Wednesday, Oct. 7, The Helping Hand Society, an auxiliary to the Boston Spiritual Temple, opened meetings at 3 Boylston Place, Gould Hall. This society opened with a new board of officers, with Mrs. Carrie L. Hatch as its president, and judging from the manner in which it opened, and the large audience, it looks as if it was going to be the banner year for that society.

The speakers of the Temple are all given a reception by this society on the third Wednesday in each month. The first Wednesday is given to the Veterans' Spiritualist Union. This society is doing a great work. It is a strictly charity society, and expends much money among the poor. It has already expended over $5,000 to poor Spiritualists mediums. It has just purchased an elegant mansion with beautiful grounds, for the purpose of a Spiritualist Home. And I would like to say right here, that if anyone wishes to help this society, either with money or furnishing for the New Home, the society will feel very grateful. Goods or money should be sent to W. H. Banks, clerk, or M. T. Dole, treasure. Remember this is not a Boston society, it is a National Society with headquarters in Boston, Mass. If you wish to join, send your name with $1.00 to W. H. Banks, 77 State street, Boston, and help their good work along.

This month the Boston Spiritual Temple has for speaker a lady from the West, Mrs. Abbie E. Sheets of Grand Ledge, Mich., and I want to say to her western friends that she is one of the best lady speakers that has stood upon our platform for many seasons, and we are in doubt if we ever let her return again to the west—if so, only to return again to Boston and the East. Mrs. Sheets opened our meeting Nov. 1, and standing room was at a premium. The hall was full long before the time to open the meeting. If there are any more speakers in the west like Mrs. Sheets, send them along.

Besides Mrs. Sheets, we have with us that noted California medium, Mrs. J. J. Whitney. The people of the East consider Mrs Whitney one of the best test mediums that has stood upon their platform. Her tests are clearly given, and very convincing, she has made a host of friends at the Hub, and it pains them to think that she talks of returning to California in December—only, however, for a short stay. With such Ladies as Mrs. Sheets and Mrs. Whitney the Spiritualist platform is elevated to a high order—at least that is what the eastern Spiritualists think.

You can see by this that the Spiritualists of New England are not asleep, at least here in Boston.

ENCYCLOPEDIA
OR A CONCORDANCE

To the principal passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism;

Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.

BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair; and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM contains 835 pages, beautifully printed on good paper, contains a full-page portrait of the author and is handsomely bound in cloth. Every Spiritualist should have this work.

HYPNOTISM;

Its Facts, Theories and Related Phenomena, with Explanatory Anecdotes, Descriptions and Reminiscences.

BY CARL SEXTUS. THE BOOK IS largely a record of the facts and demonstrations which the author has seen, heard of or presented in his own experiments. The history of the various phases of the science is succinctly presented, and the various theories clearly stated. Many of the experiments described occurred in Chicago. The pictorial illustrations add much to the interest and value of the book, which will be found very interesting to the general reader, as well as helpful and instructive to the student. The work is a handsome volume of 300 pages, bound in cloth. Price, $2.00. For sale at the office of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

Researches in Oriental History.

BY G. W. BROWN, M. D.

One Vol. 12mo, 407 Pages, Cloth, $1.50.

GENERAL DIVISION.

1. RESEARCHES IN JEWISH HISTORY.
2. RESEARCHES IN ZOROASTRIANISM.
3. DERIVATION OF CHRISTIANITY.
4. WHENCE OUR ARYAN ANCESTORS?

The whole comprises an earnest but fruitless search for a Historical Jesus.

In this volume the Jews are clearly shown not to have been the holy and favored people they claim to have been. The Messianic idea is traced to the Bactrian Philosopher, 2850 years B. C., and its history is outlined, following the waves of emigration, until it is fully developed into Christianity, with a mythical hero, at Alexandria, in Egypt, soon after the commencement of the Christian era.

The book demonstrates that Christianity and its central hero are mythical; that the whole system is based on fraud, falsehood, forgery, fear and force; and that its rites, ceremonials, dogmas and superstitions are but survivals of so-called paganism. It shows vast research among the records of the past; its facts are mostly gleaned from Christian authority; and no person can read it without instruction and profit, whether he reaches the same conclusions with the author or otherwise. THE PSYCHOGRAPH
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and third mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE . .

CURES CONSTIPATION!

And Many Liver and Kidney Troubles. It is a Most Pleasant Drink.

Among thousands of testimonials we receive, the following from W. H. Morse, Therapeutist and Consulting Chemist, of Garwood, N. J., speaks for itself:

"Let me commend to your notice the GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE, manufactured at Ayer, Mass., by the company of that name. It is not only a grateful, refreshing and stimulating beverage, relished by all, but, as well it is mildly laxative, health-promoting and thoroughly scientific in composition; in these essentials altogether unlike any other beverage for this purpose. It is well worthy of being brought before the public. W. H. MORSE."

A small package will be sent to any address for 35 cents, and a larger package containing twice as much, for 50 cents. This package will go as far as four pounds of coffee. All can drink this coffee that pure coffee will not agree with, and it DOES cure constipation. State rights for sale to manufacture and sell this coffee. A great money-maker!

A Letter that Explains Itself.

BEACHMONT, MASS., Oct. 24, 1896.

GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE, Co., Ayer, Mass.: Please send us at once 12 more large packages of Golden Laxative Coffee, for which you will find $5. We desire to say that we are much pleased with it, as it is the best thing that our family ever used for constipation. It has cured all of us but myself and son. Our neighbors all want some. What will you charge us for a case of 100 packages? I think you ought to claim more more for it than you do, as it is the finest thing for the complexion that I have ever used. My face was something horrid to look at before using the Golden Laxative Coffee; now the skin is soft and pink as a baby's. I went to the Great World's Food Fair and saw your booth, and I must say it was one of the most beautiful there; and I see by the Boston Globe that they speak in the highest terms of the coffee and your exhibit there, for which I was glad, as you deserve all success for placing before the public an article of so much merit. Yours,

MRS. C. L. BATH.

The Cause in Iowa.

TO THE EDITOR:—When I last wrote you, Mrs. Kayner and myself were enjoying beautiful weather in the capital city of this great State. A few days later we received an urgent call to come to Strawberry Point, in the northeast county of the State. It took us away from the more level farming section into a far more broken and rugged country. This is one of the finest dairy sections in the State, the farmers sending their milk to the butter creameries.

Arrived at this place we were met by kind friends of the cause, Mr. Gager, Mrs. Treadwell and Dr. Barrington, and were conducted to the hospitable home of E. L. Gager. We found that bills had been well distributed, announcing that meetings would be held in the Universalist church, and Mrs. Kayner spoke six times to audiences that gave good attention. Her tests of character reading and description of spirits were very marked, and many of them instantly recognized. People came in with wagons from the country eight and ten miles away. One family came from Elkport, nearly twenty-two miles, and after he heard Mrs. Kayner speak, wanted to know if we would go to his place. We told him that if we could see our way there and back all right, we would go. He said that as soon as he returned home he would look about and see what could be done. Three or four days after we received a letter from him wherein he said that the hall was engaged and we were announced to be there the following week for two nights at least. So the morning after election he came for us with a team and we were in for a cool, rough ride over the hills. Thursday evening, the 5th inst., she spoke in Sall's Hall to an audience larger than any we had at this place. On the evening of the 6th Mrs. Kayner again spoke to a large audience for these small towns. There were many tests given, and as these were the first Spiritualist meetings ever held in Elkport, there were many different reasons given to account for the phenomena. Some said that the friend, Mr. Frank Kafar, told her all that she gave to the people. That he and another friend in the town posted her before she came to the hall; and yet the guides picked out scars, describing and locating them, that the friends knew nothing of whatever. One remarkable test was the reading of a photograph that was handed to her, face down, that had two faces on it. She described them both, telling sex, traits of character, etc., that were pronounced correct. The people watched her very closely to see that she did not look at the face of the picture, and although she had never seen the party before, or even spoken a word to them, yet when we got to the hotel we heard the charge made that she had been posted beforehand just what to say, and overheard the party say that she never saw or spoke to the medium before she took the photograph. The guides also read two or three while blindfolded, to demonstrate that it would be impossible to do so by physiognomy. This morning, the 9th, we bid adieu to the hospitality and kindness of Bro. Kafar and family, who did all in their power to make us comfortable, and returned to the Point, and now are preparing to start on the road again, as we have a call for Independence. T. D. KAYNER.

FROM DENVER, COL.

Doings of Societies, Workers and Mediums.

To the Editor:—Dr. G. C. B. Ewell, pastor of the First Spiritual Church, Denver, Col., on Sunday morning at 10:30 was in his accustomed place on the platform, apparently as fresh as if his past week had been one of leisure, instead of a journey of 3,000 miles in attendance on a national convention filled with business twenty hours out of the twenty-four, and making several business calls upon old patients, and friendly ones as well, besides speaking from platform at impromptu call many times. Some one remarked at the Sunday service, if it was not an illustration of spirit power, phenomenal enough for any demand, it were a pity.

So do any of our inspirational workers present most wonderful, convincing phenomena of spirit agency in many ways.

A fine resume of the work of the N. S. A. at Washington was the privilege of the two audiences of the day, morning and evening.

Dr. Ewell found awaiting him acquaintances made at the recent campmeeting in Texas, in the persons of Mrs. Jennie Darrell and Mr. Harry S. Shagren—not unknown, probably, to many of your readers.

After the lecture on Sunday evening, Mrs. Darrell was introduced to the audience and gave a wonderful exhibition of clairvoyant power in a few moments only devoted to the test. In her absence from the hall a gentleman set his watch at an hour of his own choice, another selected a number of cards and arranged them to suit his own fancy, many gave numbers which were put upon a slate with the amount, and so on with other tests, all of which she was able to describe accurately on her return.

On Tuesday night, at a public seance, a cabinet was placed in the middle of our large platform and after undergoing change of clothing under surveillance of a committee of ladies—volunteers from the audience—she entered it and received handkerchiefs from the audience. In a second of time they were thrown out with beautiful portraits printed on them, many of which were recognized by their owners.

The slate-writing of Mr. Shagren was as satisfactory; a page of legible matter written in three different colors, with address and signature as plain as ever open hand gave, between slates which never left the sight of the audience. Mrs. Darrell gives materializing—full forms—and holds seances in the church for that on Thursday evenings. She insists on strict test conditions, disrobing and re-dressing in the presence of a volunteer committee of ladies; and in clothes furnished by them.

They will remain in Denver a while giving seances Tuesday and Thursday evenings, and be present at the society meetings Sundays and Wednesdays.

Under the auspices of our church, a State convention of Spiritualists is called for November 10, 11 and 12, our pastor being missionary at large for the National, and State agent as well. We hope every Spiritualist in Colorado will respond either by letter or in person. Let us know how many there are in the State. Let us be placed in communication with you, that we may be able to help you to help yourselves and others. That is the religion of Spiritualism rightly understood.

THE FAMOUS SPECIALIST

Who is so successful in treating Chronic Diseases, devotes his whole time to his practice. This is one reason for his great success.

ANOTHER REASON is that he does not try to run down other doctors.

ANOTHER REASON is he is acknowledged by all to have the most wonderful psychic powers by which he can locate the cause of disease.

ANOTHER REASON is that he has his patients write him each week, and he sends them weekly instructions, thus showing that he watches each case closely.

ANOTHER REASON is he gives only the purest medicines and in the smallest doses that will produce the desired result. Some cases are cured without any medicine.

ANOTHER REASON is he makes the price of treatment right to all.

The Good Cause Flourishing.

A COMPLIMENT TO MRS. M. E. CADWALLADER.

TO THE EDITOR:—Our association, which was founded in 1852, has passed through many vicissitudes in the many years which have passed, and many of our influential members have passed the borderland between the two worlds, and for some time we have had no encouraging reports to offer.

Our constitution and by-laws provide for only voluntary contributions, so that even the poorest could become members by being properly endorsed, and subscribing to our constitution.

This year we are much encouraged. The arrest of our mediums has drawn us closer together, and many who have held aloof from the local work have signified their intention of coming forward and helping financially to place the First Association upon a firm foundation.

We have secured a commodious hall in the centre of the city, and are holding meetings with great success. During October the well-known and inspired orator, Mr. A. E. Tisdale, lectured twice each Sunday and rendered many of his inspiring songs, to the gratification of large audiences.

We have also issued tracts for general distribution, containing a brief address by President H. D. Barrett, of the N. S. A., presenting the principles of Spiritualism in a manner which has commanded the interest of all. In connection with our association we have organized a Helping Hand Society and Young People's Spiritual Union. The members of both meet each week and the interest is growing.

Through the winter it is our purpose to hold a series of mediums' meetings and special young people's services, in connection with the lyceum work.

Our people are loyal to the N. S. A., and do all they can to support it financially, but owing to the call for means to sustain the cause of the mediums here, have not been able to contribute as much to its treasury as in former years. Some of our mediums here have been in destitute circumstances on account of the persecution, and the ban put upon them, and we have had to take special collections to aid them in their temporary embarrassment.

It is our duty and privilege to say that the present encouraging outlook is largely due to the tireless efforts of our vice-president, Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, who by her faithful work for the mediums here, and the cause generally, has aroused a greater interest, and to this cause we are indebted for the many who have recently signified their intention to subscribe financially toward the expenses of our meetings.

We have reason to feel much encouraged, and are sure that the meetings conducted this season under the auspices of the First Association of Spiritualists will serve to create a widespread interest in the cause of Spiritualism.

Stockton, Cal., to the Front.

To the Editor:—Thinking your readers would be pleased to hear how the work is progressing in California and feeling good news of the cause is encouraging to others, I take the liberty of telling of what we are doing in Stockton. The old society having disbanded, a few of us met together and organized a new one under a charter of the National Organization; but I must give credit where it is due. Our State Society very happily selected Mrs. Elizabeth Sloper, an earnest, faithful, never-ceasing worker, as State organizer, and it was through her efforts that an interest was awakened resulting in the forming of "The People's Spiritualist Society of Stockton," of which the grand and noble worker, Dr. C. Grattan, was elected president, and L. B. Horton, secretary—two earnest souls whose greatest desires are to give the progressive truths of Spiritualism to the world, and under their able management we have made a grand start by obtaining the services of Prof. A. J. Swarts, Ph.D., LL.D., of Chicago, and his noble sister, Mrs. M A. Janny, Ph.D., who, Sunday evening, Nov. 1, finished a four weeks' course of lectures and lessons upon the higher truths. The Professor's lectures were presented in language that all could appreciate, understand and individually apply to every-day life. To listen to him is a treat that mortals don't meet with very often. Mrs. Janny assisted her brother grandly in his work, but in the classes that were formed she excelled as a teacher of sarcognomy, and expounder of Prof. Babbitt's great discoveries in connection with how to apply science to the improving of the human conditions.

They drew large audiences, among whom were seen lawyers and members of the medical fraternity.

Our society, though small in numbers, are earnest workers, and we are adding to our membership every week. Besides our Sunday evening meetings, we have organized an afternoon meeting for development, and so far have received encouraging evidences of spirit power, several coming out as mediums and others following, proving that when earnest mortals call upon their spirit friends they will surely respond. Thus the good work goes on, and I would say to all Spiritualists and true seekers after higher truths, let us be more earnest and united, and the compensation shall be, sad hearts will be comforted, mourners' tears shall be wiped away, and humanity drawn nearer to the great ruling power of the universe. Hoping I have not tired your readers by the length of this, I am, yours for the cause, of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards, very truly,

DEVELOPMENT.

In answer to the many inquiries that come to me from all parts of the country relative to the development of mediumship, we would say the American Spiritual Health Circle is intended to develop health and strength particularly.

Naturally, mediumistic people will be assisted in the development of their gifts by it. We have, however, a class for the special purpose of developing mediumistic gifts to which weekly instructions are given, as received from the guides of some of the best known and most successful mediums in Boston and vicinity. Chas. E. Watkins, M. D., the renowned independent slate-writer and psychic, permits the use of his name.

Finding it impossible to answer the many inquiries, we have concluded, with the consent of the guides to make the developing circle general, and will send outline, terms, etc., to all interested on receipt of your address on stamped envelope.

Testimonial.

B. F. POOLE, Clinton, Iowa—Dear Sir:—Your Melted Pebble Spectacles are all right. They fit me well. Are just what I wanted. I am 91 years old. Many thanks. Respectfully,
GEO. W. GOODWIN.
Hancock Point, Maine.

A Deserved Compliment.

I want to say to the one hundred thousand readers of the best Spiritualist paper in America, that Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, of Jamestown, N. Y., are serving the First Spiritualist Church of Rochester, Ind., for the present month, and are accomplishing a grand work. Mr. Sprague's lectures are logical, forceful and every way appreciative. He goes right at the facts and presents them so clearly that they cannot be controverted, and as a result all hearers, of whatever denomination, are free to admit that Spiritualism is the religion of nature and the one true philosophy.

In addition to the ability of Mr. and Mrs. Sprague as speakers and platform test mediums, they are good, honest, creditable people, temperate in all things, and hard workers in the cause they represent.

Our audiences are large and composed of men and women who are not only a credit to the society but possessing a character that attracts the attention of the best social surroundings.

What we need on the Spiritualist rostrums are more Spragues and Hulls to preach the philosophy of Spiritualism, and more Lockwoods to establish the science. M. B.

THE SURE FOUNDATION.

"There is no death!" the poet sings,
"What seems so is transition;"
A change of form to spirit brings
A more refined condition.

But is it not a fairy tale—
Imagination's dreaming—
Assuring us that earth's dark trail
On earth is only seeming?

Our loved ones vanish from our sight;
Their forms are laid away,
When touched by death's destroying blight,
To moulder back to clay.

The question born of cold distrust
Doth ever yet remain:
"If man shall die"—as die he must—
"Shall he then live again?"

The Christian and the Infidel,
Discussing pro and con,
Avail us naught. Ah! who can tell—
Does life continue on?

The answer, if it comes at all,
Must come through demonstration;
Our faith and hope in ruins fall
Without this sure foundation.

Then welcome all phenomena—
From raps to inspiration—
The whole encyclopædia
Of psychic information.

MRS. A. H. REYNOLDS.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1. For sale at this office.

NEW BOOKS.

Whose Soul Have I Now? A Novel. By Mary Clay Knapp. Boston: Arena Publishing Co.

A romance that, to spiritualized minds, will appear intensely realistic. In the form of an autobiographical story it discusses instructively matters of love, virtue, ideal or spiritual forces, telepathy, psychic or soul forces, materialism, marriage, etc. The story is well woven, the ideas well wrought out and the lesson is taught in such an entertaining way that one follows it from beginning to end with unflagging interest. Price $1.25. Can be ordered from this office.

Development of Mediumship by Terrestrial Magnetism. By Abby A. Judson.

A dainty little book in illuminated white cloth covers, in which the author sets forth plain and succinct instructions far the practical development of mediumship by utilizing the magnetic currents of our globe. She narrates her own instructive experience, and the results in her own case. Price 50 cents.

Our Nation's History and Song; With the Campaign Songs Our Fathers Sung. By Joseph M. Clary, A. B. L., L. B. Chas. H. Kerr & Co., Publishers, Chicago. Paper, 50 cents.

Presents the history of the United States, by means of the current of song, from the earliest period of our national life to the present. National songs and campaign songs are interwoven with party platforms and statistical tables of popular and electoral votes of each presidential election, the whole making a book unique and interesting.

Human Culture and Cure. Part First—The Philosophy of Cure (Including Methods and Instruments). By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL.D., Dean of the College of Fine Forces, and author of The Principles of Light and Color, etc.

There is a close connection between Dr. Babbitt's "Principles of Light and Color" and his "Human Culture and Cure;" they may be considered as parts of one great whole, constituting together a work that might fitly and justly entitle their author to laurels of highest praise for deep incisive research into and intuitive perception of Nature's finer forces, and the application of the same to the physical, mental and spiritual upbuilding of humanity.

The bill of fare presented is rich, rare and of inestimable value, and there is no reader to whom it may not be of great practical benefit.

Dr. Babbitt goes deeper into his subject than is possible for any mere materialistic scientist to enter, because of his possession of the finer intuitive and clairvoyant faculty. This gives added clearness and value to his work.

Figs or Pigs? Fruit or Brute? A Text-book of the Vegetarian Philosophy. By James Madison Allen. Sold by the author, Springfield, Mo. Price, 15 cents.

Under this alliterative and suggestive title, the author, who is well-known to Spiritualists, has prepared a little handbook presenting the reasons and arguments in favor of vegetarianism. It is a succinct yet comprehensive statement of the principal reasons for entertaining the principle that vegetables and fruit should constitute the food of mankind.

"The Universe." What Force Is. The Beginning of Creation. What Matter Is. The Creation of the Earth. The Beginning of Life. Immortality. The Substance of Its Environments. Psychic Science. What the "Soul of Things" Is. Song of Psyche. By L. M. Roe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

A small pamphlet on a very great subject. "Multum in parvo" may well be said of this brochure of 71 pages. It is packed full of condensed thought. Each sentence affords a subject for study; it will bear reading and re-reading.

Certain thoughts are prayers. There are moments when, whatever be the attitude of the body, the soul is upon its knees.—Hugo.

PEN-FLASHES FROM THE PACIFIC COAST.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

POSTPONED POSSIBILITIES.

Few things fill me with more dignified disgust than to see a preacher solemnly rise in the pulpit, and putting on a gloomy scowl, drawl out the words:—"Let us begin the praise of God by reading from his holy word." Does God the Infinite Over-soul, the Infinite Spirit, desire praise? Does the Almighty ask for flattery? Children and sectarian "babes in Christ" may desire praise; and there are the poor undeveloped mortals who feast upon praise and flattery. These are the postponed possibilities of full-orbed human beings.

"Why call ye me good?" said Jesus—"none is good but one, and that is God." Dr. Livingstone, the great African explorer, never it is said, preserved any words of praise, written or spoken concerning himself. The consciousness of having done right according to the dictates of his best judgment was a sufficient reward. A just appreciation, however, is not praise.

It is reported of the brilliant Gen. Gordon, the ideal soldier and statesman, assassinated in the Soudan, that he would not listen to a word of praise. He destroyed an important sketch of his Chinese victories so that his friends might avoid praising him in the future.

Praise and flattery become the babyhood of the race. Great and good souls will have none of it. And then to apply it to God—"let us begin his praise"—fills and thrills inteligent men with a dignified pity mingled with contempt. Our preachers ought to be preached to until they mend their theological ways.

An old old orthodox hymn begins thus:

"Praise God in conversation,
Praise Him in prayer;
Praise in the congregation,
Praise Him everywhere."

God requires no praise; neither do intelligent men and women. But let the good and the wise be appreciated and encouraged in their works of reform. It will lighten their burdens. It will lift leaden loads from languishing lives, melt away mountains of misery and spread the sunshine of summer over souls that are chilled with disappointment and sorrowing for consummation of hope delayed.

LAND GRABBERS.

I am no politician. No party can claim my allegiance. Being an American, I vote for the most honest, upright and conscientious man. And I've a deep conviction that every person born into this world has an original right to air to breathe, to water to drink, and to soil—land for ploughing, sowing and reaping. And yet, America is largely a country of foreign-born landlords, dukes, earls, barons, owning vast millions of our choicest acres. The Arena gives the following:

Names.	No. of acres.
Duke of Bedford	51,085
Earl of Brownlow	57,799
Earl of Carlisle	78,540
Earl of Cawdor	51,538
Earl of Cleveland	106,650
Earl of Derby	56,698
Duke of Devonshire	148,626
Lord of Londonsboro	52,655
Duke of Northumberland	191,460
Duke of Portland	55,259
Earls of Powis	46,095
Duke of Rutland	70,030
Lady Willoughby	59,212
Sir W. W. Win	91,612
Earl of Yarborough	54,570
Baron Tweeddale	1,750,000
Byron H. Evans	700,000
Duke of Sutherland	422,000
W. Whaley, M. P.	310,000
Robert Tenant	530,000
Lord Dunmore	120,000
Benjamin Neugas	100,000
Lord Houghton	60,000
Lord Dunraven	60,000
A. Peel, M. P.	10,000
M. Ellerhousen	600,000
Alexander Grant	35,000
C. M. Beach	10,000
Marquis Demores	15,000

"As if individuals could not acquire our lands fast enough, we find that vast combinations of foreign capital have been formed to accomplish that purpose. A Scotch syndicate, for example, owns 500,000 acres in Florida; an English syndicate owns 1,800,000 acres in Mississippi; another owns 3,000,000 acres in Texas; a Dutch syndicate owns 4,500,000 in New Mexico, etc. There are fifty-six foreign corporations and individuals that together own more than 26,000,000 acres of land in the United States. This is an area larger than the State of Indiana, and would make more than 140,000 farms of 160 acres each." * * * American corporations and individuals own perhaps almost as much land for speculative purposes as is held by Europeans. There seems to be a growing tendency that there should be a limit to land ownership, and that foreign ownership should be prohibited.

A MARKED CONTRAST.

At the Cassadaga camp, J. Clegg Wright is thus reported—I hope falsely:

"Of all the rotten things in this world, an invocation is the most rotten. Whenever an invocation is given I want to take to the green sward. It is an insult to human reason. It is deplorable to me to see the wooden-headedness of some people who don the robes of darkness and perpetuate the bondage of human intelligence."

Such rough ranting assertions may have interested scoffing atheists but at the same time they must have chilled every sensitive, religiously-inclined Spiritualist that heard them.

One of the noblest and most scholarly men, as well as a writing and clairvoyant medium, was W. Stainton Moses, editor of London Light. Under the automatic control of his exalted spirit teachers, he wrote:

"In any case neglect not to offer up earnest and active prayer for blessings which spirits) can minister. Did ye know the power of prayer ye would use it more; not as vain man prays for that which he thinks best, but for the ministery of those who can soothe his sorrows, alleviate his woes, and bring down blessings upon him richer than any he can picture. Pray, frind, pray!"

If Mr. Wright referred to hypocrisy and the abuse of priestly prayers, why did he not so say, rather than to launch a general thunderbolt at all invocations, pronouncing them "rotten." Mrs. Richmond, Mr. Wiggins, Mr. Colville and nearly all of our grandly inspired speakers, prelude their lectures with invocations. Prayers and invocations are innate in human nature. They bubble up spontaneously. Looking up to a superior Power, or persons, is divine. Pigs may not look to the oak from whence the acorns fell. It could hardly be expected of pigs! But men are supposed to have developed a long way up from their primal, pighood condition. Ancient spirits, the highest angels, pray, so we are taught. Prayer is aspiration. Invocations are thinking of, and calling upon loving angels. The best of us need their help. Let us, then, be humble, aspirational, prayerful.

GEMS OF TRUTH FROM JOSEPH.

With an eye on "Christian Scientists," Mental Scientists and other extremists of that ilk who contend that "evil is a lesser good," J. O. Barrett, secretary of the Minnesota State Forestry Association, discourses wisely as follows:

"These new doctors of divinity have their rights of opinion, but does their opinion change the fact that evil is as positive a condition or moral quality as goodness? Was Nero's fiddling while the Christian martyrs were burning a lesser good? Was the general massacre of the Huguenots in France a lesser good? Was the Reign of Terror in Paris a lesser good? Was the hanging of the Quakers by the pious Puritans a lesser good? Was the assassination of Abraham Lincoln a lesser good? Are the murderous raids of the Turks upon the defenseless men, women and children of Armenia a lesser good? Is the Spanish butchery of the Cuban patriots a lesser good? Personal and social robbery, prostitution, inebriety, tyranny, bloody savagery, and the miseries thus endured and entailed upon us—is it all a lesser good?

"I cannot help the conviction—and do not want to—that 'vice is a monster,' a reality, a positive fact; and that it is our business not to call it pretty names, a 'lesser good'—but an absolute evil."

Otherwise expressed, our old friend, J. O. Barrett, does not believe that a malicious lie is a lesser truth, that rape is lesser chastity, and that willful murder is a lesser effort to save human life. Joseph's theology is sound. He is capable of thinking on all sides of great moral problems, and so thinking generally comes to right conclusions. May the Minnesota forests that he seeks to save and cultivate ever wave gracefully in his honor. Wave on, oh, forests.

FRANCIS SCHLATTER.

Rumor has it that this strange mystic—this healer of healers—is in Mexico, winding his zigzag way among the miners to San Diego. It is to be hoped that the rumor may prove to be reality. I am inclined to give it credence. Upon his reaching San Diego I shall make him my guest, thus constituting a compound Health-Home battery, a jubilee time for invalids!

Schlatter is certainly a nineteenth century wonder. He is profoundly independent. He cares nothing for what is denominated "Society." He travels through the valleys and over mountains horseback or muleback; or on foot, bareheaded and barefooted. He prefers to be much of the time alone. Some asking him to heal them he does not even notice. Others he goes out of his way to find and heal without being asked. He is moved by the spirit. In early life he was a Catholic; but now pays no regard to any church or church ceremonies. He seems to know nothing of Spiritualism; or at least did not seem to a few years ago when in San Antonio, Texas. He was there ten or fifteen days; and he certainly performed some astounding cures. Others he did not help. He is a powerful medium, not knowing it.

What was peculiar with him in San Antonio, he would rush off to a house uninvited, unexpectedly to the family; and curing an invalid, would receive neither thanks nor money. He seemed a complete instrument in invisible yet potent hands. He did not talk good English. I never heard him say, "spirits," or angels. He declared that his power was from the "Father." He came to San Antonio uninvited, and left, no one knew for where. He left, too, in the height of his prosperity. He made no special friends. He did not seem to do as well after an officious Mexican seemingly took charge of him and his work. The "Regulars" pronounced him crazy. A spiritual medium declared that he was one of the twelve Messiahs. The Theosophists said he was a Mystico-Mahatma reincarnated to finish up some undone Karma work of a previous life.

It is reported through the western press and private sources that Schlatter has twice been imprisoned as a vagrant, that he has been beaten with lashes on his bare back, that he has been mobbed in the streets, that he commands those he heals to thank God, not him; that he was arraigned in Hot Springs as a lunatic, and accordingly, when he stretched out his hands in Denver to heal a man, he suddenly withdrew them, telling him that he could not heal him. The man wanting to know why, Francis said, "You would not like to have it known;" but the man persisted, and Francis then told him he had been a murderer. After this the man cowed, and slunk away in the crowd.

To the popular mind he is odd, eccentric, a lunatic, a pestilent fellow and mentally weak—weak-minded—all of which reminds me of these words of that ancient medium, the apostle Paul: "For he hath chosen the foolish things of this world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty."

UNIVERSALISTS PLEASED WITH SPIRITUALISM.

And why should they not be? Universalism is a beautiful faith—faith in the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and in the final progression and restoration of mankind to holiness and Heaven. And Spiritualism—a conscious converse with the resurrected souls residing in the Spiritual world, sustains, demonstrates the truth of the above faith; and reaching further, transforms hope into reality, faith into fruition.

"Add to your faith knowledge," said Paul. Spiritualists have done this. No communicating spirits have taught total depravity, "election and reprobation," or "eternal Hell torments." They teach evolution and sing the song of progression. And yet there are Universalist preachers who, out of envy and jealousy, preach popgun sermons against, and hurl theological javelins at Spiritualists. They are bigots fingering around Ballou's outworn buttonholes. They live on faith and donations. They yet fight "Partialists" and quote the old Abrahamic promises to prove that:

"Judas with a cord outstripped his Lord
And got to Heaven first."

There are a couple of these old silurian fossils here in Southern California, and they would best benefit Universalism by getting their carcasses underground as soon as possible. They have outlived their once little usefulness. They hang on to life to slander their superiors, to find fault—to growl and grunt. Neptune pity the ship that sails such barnacles!

On the other hand, there are Universalist preachers with young blood in their veins—preachers afire with inpiration, and fully abreast of the times. The spirit never grows old. Souls smile under their crowns of white. Leigh Hunt at eighty was called the immortal boy.

In 1810 Boston had a population of 33,000. The population covering the same territory now is 160,000—and what has been the increase in Universalism? Let us see! There was then one Universalist Church founded in 1785, and now there are in the same district two—just two, Revs. Roblins' and Perins'. At this rate, how long will it take Universalism to turn the crank of the Universe? Universalism is a back chapter. It shows the dry rot. Whittemore's hat proved too small for growing young men, and the Rev. Dr. Sawyer's bulls only excited smiles.

The Rev. Holmes Slade, of Elgin, Ill., one of the ablest, most influential and liberal-minded preachers in the Universalist ministry, in writing me of my late pamphlets, "Who are these Spiritualists?" says: "Your late publication, doctor, on Spiritualism came duly to hand and I esteem it very highly, and thank you for it. I may say that with your definition and presentation of Spiritualism I am more than pleased. I have always believed since 1849 or 1850 in the psychological powers of the invisible world and the holy ministeries of angels as being among the most wonderful phenomena of this wonderful age. I have remembered you these forty years and more with great affection, and it was a rich treat to break bread with you in your California home and freshen up an old friendship."

Beginning with the Rev. Moses Ballou, then a pastor in Philadelphia, down to the Rev. Mr. Parker of the West, more than fifty Universalist clergymen have invited—urged me—to return to the fellowship of the denomination. But, never! Can the ripened wheat return into its envelope of chaff? Can the winged bird again go back into its cast-off shell? Can—will the well-born child of progress return to its uterine life to dwell in a placent, a prison of darkness? Never.

PRESERVING THE SIMPLE.

Universalists, far behind the Unitarians in liberality and scholarships, have a fixed creed, and the hypocrites and super-sanctified in the sect would like to crush or eliminate all the more liberal elements from the denomination. These are the brakes that check the car of progress. They are the old cadavers that disagreeably scent the church of humanity. They are the carrion corpses that compel the angels to hold their noses as they wing their way above them. Though denying a future Hell, these moss-back bigots in the sect carry around a little picayunish pocket Hell to scorch and smirch those that don't sneeze when they take the genuine brand of Winchester snuff. And yet, rich in hope, and noted in both continents for charity and sympathy, I believe in the final salvation of these men, basing my belief largely upon this Scriptural text—"The Lord preserveth the simple."

AMONG PACIFIC COAST MEDIUMS.

Remembering that Greece gave the world a Socrates, Judea a Jesus, Patmos a John, and rugged Scotland a Duguid, it is generally conceded that mountainous countries and ozone-charged islands, rather than low fog-lands, are conducive to the highest phases of mediumship. Stars, environments certainly and sometimes seriously affect sensitives.

Mrs. Montague is filling a year's engagement with the Psychical Society—otherwise a Spiritualist Society, in Oakland. This lady was born in Paris, France, and her parents were devoted Roman Catholics. She does not know the time when she was not a seer. When a child she saw beautiful scenes, fairy lands, and played with angel children. She wondered why everybody could not see them. Her visions were considered by churchmen dreams and disordered vagaries of the imagination. From early youth—taught from above—she utterly abhorred nobles, kings and priests; and the more so since many of her visions related to the Inquisition, and those old Crusaders that crimsoned the plains of Europe and portions of the Orient with human blood.

At sixteen she became a Protestant. Though deprived of early school privileges, information and a knowledge of books came to her by impression and inspiration when asleep, or in a dreamy semi-conscious state. Her wisdom was often a puzzle to her companions.

At twenty she had a most astounding spirit test. Her mother, whom she supposed well, several thousand miles distant, came as a spirit and announced to her every detail of her sickness, death, and transition into spirit-life. The spiritual world was from this time on as real to her as this world. Though learning several languages from her spirit-educators, she never heard English spoken till 1878; and yet she now lectures in it eloquently and fluently.

She is clairvoyant and clairaudient, but did not begin to psychometrize until about five years ago. Her platform lectures are of a superior order, and her public tests are marvelous. Whenever she lectures in San Diego, crowds flock to hear hear. Such mediumship both demonstrates a future existence and builds up Spiritualism. Much work and many golden days await this truly inspired woman. Mr. Montague, her husband, has mining interests in the vicinity of San Diego.

FREITAG AND HER GIFTS.

Mrs. Maude L. Freitag, with her husband—an excellent, unassuming man—resides in National City, only a few miles from San Diego. Here she attended school. Here she has many warm personal friends who are not Spiritualists. As a woman she is highly esteemed by all who know her. Her mediumship began early. When at school she would see names invisible to others, written upon the blackboard. And she thus gave tests not knowing it to be Spiritualism; for she had neither attended a scance, nor listened to a Spiritualist lecture.

Mrs. Freitag did not go to some psychic "confidence man," or to some traveling tramp, to be developed as a slate-writing medium or something else. No. Home development is safest and best.

This lady gives excellent lectures in her trance state. She writes automatically under control. She is clairvoyant and clairaudient. But her phase most astonishing and convincing to skeptics is her ballot tests, which she gives before crowded audiences. So far as my knowledge, or hearsay, extends she never fails in her tests. Possibly putting her upon a platform with half a dozen jealous, envious mediums around her with their different controls—their different disturbing wills, thoughts and aural emanations, her controlling intelligence might fail, and so might an archangel under such conditions. Her method of the ballot tests is similar to Mrs. Foye's. They are demonstrations of the fact of spirit communion. Often Mrs. Freitag does not touch ballots. Sometimes the ballots, besides being folded tightly, are pinned; others are both folded and sewed together carefully before coming to the hall. But no matter—the spirits read them just the same, and do it every time.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCE IN A CROWDED HALL.

I never ask for a test. I do not wish tests. And it quite disgusts me to see old, bald-headed Spiritualists hunting for tests, signs, and wonders. True, like others I am delighted to receive messages from those who have crossed the crystal river of death. Accordingly (never having met, seen nor spoken with her in San Diego) I stepped into Lafayette hall one evening last month to hear Mrs. Freitag. The services had commenced, the hall was crowded. I took my seat about halfway back behind a post. When the blank ballots were passed I wrote on three the names, Frederick W. Evans, Rev. J. H. Harter, and S. B. Brittan, folding and rolling them tightly. There were about a peck of these ballots carried up to the table. After giving perhaps a dozen or more communications—all recognized—she saw a star over a ballot, and picking it up, there were three heavy raps; and "I see," she said, "a tall, dignified spirit walking upon the platform. He must have been a public man. He is bright, graceful and commanding in appearance. I heard the name Burton,—no, Brinton,—no, Brittan," three heavy raps. "Did any one in the audience," she asked, "write the name of Brittan? If so, stand up."

I arose. "I now see," she added, "written in the air over your head, Samuel B. Brittan. Was that the name of your friend now in spirit-life? It was—and he says you further wrote in the ballot—'Have you a word for me?'" "Yes, I did." The skeptic holding the ballot all this time, now opened it and read the contents to the audience. It was correct.

Prof. Brittan's message, referring to our past mutual work in liberalizing religious ideas, and in healing body and soul as did the Nazarene, bade me go on, assurring me that I should ever have him and other heavenly helpers to aid me. Ancient spirits inspired me. A great work was coming up before me, especially in foreign lands. "The past," he said, "that you have accomplished in the way of human progress will fade away into forgetfulness almost, as compared with what you will yet accomplish for the good of humanity."

Such messages are pleasant and encouraging. And, to accept them for just what they are worth after passing them through the crucibles of my better judgment, and highest reason. Neither spirits, angels, nor gods are infallible. Cultured reason is the supreme judge.

Prof. Brittan had previously informed me through Dr. Schlesinger that he was interested in my work; which was natural considering the fact that he was physician, lecturer and author when in mortal life. As a spirit he came to me unexpected, unasked, confirming what the intelligences had said through Mrs. Montague, that such ancients as the Mohammedan Ben Ali, and the old Grecian Galen aided me in my instantaneous cures. Friend Colville's controlling intelligences had previously told me the same thing, accompanied with prophecies that I should find valuable manuscripts and hieroglyphic documents confirming many historic facts, now questioned by the literate. We shall see.

Honor, all honor to mediums.

Mediumship is a blessed gift, rightly, religiously used. Genuine mediums are comparable to pure gold. They are gems in any household. They are message-bearers from heaven; and they are also moral necessities to convince worldly materialists of a future conscious existence and to bring us into closer relations with those exalted angels that minister to us mortals.

"How beautiful upon the mountains," said the old prophet, "are the feet of those that publish peace, that bring good tidings of good things." And how beautiful upon the mountains of progress and truth are the feet and the whole personages of mediums that are unselfish, honest, truthful, modest, candid, conscientious and heaven-inspired! They are bearers of love-messages to earth from the highlands of immortality; they are the golden censers that, swinging between heaven and earth, bring the incense of hope and comfort to mortals; they are the birds of paradise that tell in tones, sweet as angels use, of a sunny summerland when sorrows of earth are o'er; they are the oaks of Olympus and the cedars of Lebanon, that, catching the rising sunbeams, reflect them in radiance bright to the lower planes of earth; they are the illumined ladders of light upon which angels, as in Jacob's time, are seen ascending and descending; they are the angel lamps suspended in the mid heavens, lighting the pathway of weary mortals to the many-mansioned house of the Father, eternal in the Heavens. Oh! Spiritualists, treat them tenderly, kindly, giving them the very best and most harmonious conditions. They are God's elect.

Pretenders, impostors, how common! Smooth-tongued women and "confidence men" cute and sleek, a sort of pot-hole mediums tramping through the country trading upon the gullibility of gullible spiritists! They profess to develop mediums for shekels, psychometrize ores, astrologize destinies, locate gold mines, find Kidd's money, materialize spirits, utter prophecies—anything called for by their gullible dupes. Expose them, and some little clique of Spiritistic sapheads will pop up and cry "persecution" and defend them. There are spiritists who would believe in and defend the "Devil" if he could manufacture a rap, read a sealed letter or materialize a ghost. Slime follows in the tracks of these fellows. They ought to go to work and earn the bread they eat; or, dropping their pretended mediumship, they might go to frying out rattlesnake oil for the cure of rheumatism.

There are mediums that no money would tempt me to favorably notice publicly. They may have mediumistic gifts which they frequently grossly abuse. They require watching. Their ways are crooked. They will lie. They do not pay their honest debts. They do not keep their promises. They are specimens of traveling "confidence" men. And, sad to say, there are Spiritists with sufficiently soft spongy craniums to support these frauds—frauds who ought to ply pick, spade and hoe ten hours a day, and so get an honest living.

NO MEDICINES FOR BABES.

On my way East recently to Washington, by the Santa Fe, when out of the lemon fields of Riverside and the orange orchards of San Bernardino, a babe in the sleeping-car was noticed to be restless, crying and evidently seriously ill. The mother, so frail, excited the sympathy of all present.

Approaching the mother, at length, I very innocently said: "Your babe is sick. What medicines are you giving it?"

"The doctor," she replied, "before leaving Los Angeles, prepared these medicines, codeine, bismuth and paregoric. I've just given her five drops of codeine."

"And how much paregoric," I inquired, "do you give her at a time?"

"Ten drops and sometimes more to make her sleep; and I put this bismuth powder into her milk to keep it from souring."

"Yes, but your babe, I see, continues fretting and worrying, crying."

"I know it does," she said, "the poor thing is sick. Are you a doctor?" "I am."

"Well, what medicines would you give my baby?"

"Nothing—I simply advise less foods, the sipping of hot water, and magnetism. The drugs you are administering are slow poisons. If the child has enough vitality to partially withstand these drastic drugs, these chemical poisons, it will grow up into a poor, nervous sickly woman."

"But if I don't give her the codeine or the paregoric she will cry and scream and kick."

"All right; kicking will develope her muscles, screaming will expand her lungs and crying will strengthen the chest. The child is not so sick as it is tired and nervous. When it cries and screams again pass it on to me."

Soon, squirming like an eel, its poor, pinched face broke out in strains unsought and decidedly unmusical—and immediately she put the little, frail, drug-cursed creature into my arms.

Psychically sensing its condition, I put its little, cold, bird's-claw-like hands into one of mine; its fevery head up against my face, and in less than three minutes it fell asleep, calmly asleep, and slept sweetly during the night.

"You must have charmed the baby," was her remark in the morning. And for over a thousand miles I spiritually fathered that little innocent. All it required was soothing magnetism, light nourishment, occasional sipping of hot water and a daily warm bath, followed by a little olive oil.

Mothers, dog these heroic, drastic drug doctors away from your homes, and use good sound common sense, with a few simple household remedies, and you will save both human lives and doctors' bills.

F. A. WIGGINS, TRANCE AND TEST MEDIUM.

Appointed a delegate from the First Spiritualist Society of San Diego, and a proxy delegate for Mr. T. G. Newman, editor of the Philosophical Journal, to the late National Association of Spiritualists convening in Washington, I purchased my through ticket and started eastward in a sleeper, full of faith; but several inches of snow on the highlands of New Mexico and Colorado gave me la grippe and I was compelled to stop in Indianapolis and go to bed.

Taking up a Sunday morning paper in the hotel, I saw the announcement that the Rev. F. A. Wiggins was to speak during the day in the Spiritualist Church. The title "Rev." gave no offence, for I reverence all good men and women; and Church—ecclesia in Greek—means a sympathizing body of believers. And Spiritualists are, or certainly ought to be, a harmonious body of sympathizing believers.

This church edifice purchased of the Lutherans was packed, especially in the evening, to its utmost capacity. The discourses of Mr. Wiggins were instructive, logical and eloquent. He speaks in a semi-conscious trance, and gives tests at the conclusion of his evening lectures, using ballots as do Mrs. Foye and Mrs. Freitag, except that he is blindfolded. The spirits controlling him made no mistakes. Every test name was recognized. Skeptics were astonished, and half doubting Spiritualists were confirmed.

This able exponent of Spiritualism graduated from the theological department of Madison University a Baptist preacher. Being a fine scholar and a most exemplary man, the higher spirit-world of intelligences thought him constituted of the right stuff for their use, and so, through a struggle, they took him, and use him for the upbuilding of truth. He is not a destroyer, but a constructer. If his left hand smites the idols of the past, his right hand builds temples of progress.

He is a worker. He sometimes reads sixty and seventy ballots in one evening. Wherever he labors Zion puts on her beautiful garments of prosperity. At a private seance with this gentleman, my old friends Luthor Colby, H. B. Storer and others came with their greetings. There was no mistaking their identity. Another exalted spirit standing upon a mountain prophesied! I await this prophecy with the deepest interest.

FLOCKING TO CALIFORNIA.

The redbreasts, the swallows and the orioles, moved by an impulse almost immutable, are flocking to the Pacific Coast and Mexico, lands of sunshine and eternal summer. And so mediums and lecturers, and many Spiritualists, impressed by their invisible guides, have already reached this coast for the winter and perhaps permanently. Among the latter are the Lillies, so highly esteemed in the East. Mr. Lillie called upon me last evening. And by the way, he is a most excellent singer and musician; and Mrs. Lillie is one of the very ablest and most successful lecturers in the field. I bespeak for them a warm and most cordial reception upon this sunset coast.

Mr. Ravlin, a reformed—theological reformed—Baptist preacher, is now speaking for the First Spiritualist Society of San Diego. He is drawing large audiences and is administering solid allopathic doses to the orthodox theology. Having been there for thirty years, he knows how. His arraignment of the sectarian "doctrines of devils" is not only withering but absolutely searching. The Society, under its new president, Mr. Wilcox, is doing remarkably well. Success to all our workers. —J. M. PEEBLES.

HOME-MADE SUNSHINE.

What care I—as the days go by—
Whether gloomy or bright the sky?
What care I what the weather may be?
Cold or warm—'tis the same to me.
For my dear home skies—they are always blue;
And my dear home weather (the glad days thro')
Is "beautiful summer" from morn till night,
And my feet walk ever in love's true light.
And why? Well, here is my baby sweet,
Following me 'round on his restless feet,
Smiling on me thro' his soft blue eyes,
And gladdening and brightening my indoor skies.
And baby's father, with fond, true heart
(To baby and me, home's better part)—
His face is sunshine and we rejoice
In the music heard in his loving voice.
So why should we heed—as the days go by—
The gloom or the light of the weather and sky
Of the outside world, when we're busy all day
Manufacturing sunshine which fades not away?
With smiles, with kisses, with peace, and with joy—
Father and mother, and baby boy—
We are living each day in the sunshine we make—
And God keep us and guide us for love's dear sake! —Harper's Bazar.

THE MOHAMMEDAN MESSIAH.

His Coming Will Be Foretold by Sixty Forerunners.

According to tradition, says the Contemporary Review, the true mahdi will be preceded by sixty forerunners—John Baptists or Eliases—called babs (bab means the door through which enters the messiah).

As a rule those holy personages—ulemas, or descendants of the prophet, who end by setting up themselves as the messiah—begin by calling themselves only babs, or doors, and if they meet with success and are accepted they then pose as the actual mahdi.

As to the babism of recent times, this is its simple origin: About fifty years ago a young native of Shiraz named Mirza Ali Mohammed was the favorite pupil of a celebrated shika, who was looked upon as a sort of bab, or forerunner of the mahdi. After he died his young pupil, Mirza Ali Mohammed, announced himself as also a bab. He was soon surrounded with disciples. His popularity alarmed the reigning shah. He was arrested and kept in prison for some time, but as his followers increased in number the ulemas thought it prudent to condemn him to death by torture. The subsequent massacre of the babs is a matter of recent history. The babs that were left, inspired by a thirst for vengeance, now plotted the assassination of the shah and each attempt has been followed by more bab massacres.

Now you have the key of the situation. The late shah succumbed at last to one of these assassins, who had unsuccessfully attempted his destruction several times before. The bab, young Mirza, was not a highly educated person, but very proud and of irreproachable life. He was not otherwise remarkable but possessed of a strange faculty of writing with extreme speed (you would call it mediumistic writing, an accomplishment considered miraculous by our adepts). Still, he wrote little about his doctrine or his person, but after his death his apostles made a mahdi of him, and from that to a divine incarnation was a step easily accomplished, as we have seen illustrated in your own Christian religion. To mahdiism were soon joined mysticism and pantheism, which have always dominated the philosophic instincts of the Iranian people. If you want to understand present Persian politics you must bear in mind that Iranla (Persia) has always been and is now full of sects like babism, which are called soufi hakem, sheikhi babis, etc.

RELIGIOUSLY INSANE.

A Bangor Man Committed to the Insane Asylum.

The municipal officers held a meeting at noon Friday and it was voted to commit Samuel J. Keith, of this city, to the insane asylum at Augusta and he was taken there on the afternoon train by Mr. A. K. Rollins.

Mr. Keith's case is a sad one. A week ago he grew religiously insane. He was all right, so his friends say, until he went to a certain series of religious meetings very recently held here, not, however the Moody meetings. From that time his mind began to fail and his condition has gone from bad to worse.

He claimed that he had been visited by God and told his family that he must make a sacrifice. Wednesday night he declared to his wife and child that they would both be dead before morning. He did not say that he intended to kill them, but his relatives closely watched his movements.

He said he had received a message from heaven that he must preach and stated that he tried to hire the Y. M. C. hall for that purpose, but the authorities would not let him have it.

Mr. Keith was a pleasant agreeable young man with a decided aptitude for business and was well liked by all who knew him. He is the son of J. L. Keith of Old Town and his family is a particularly bright one. Many friends will regret to hear of the misfortune which has overtaken the young man and will hope that he may soon be restored to full health and to his family, as the physicians say there is good reason for beliving that he will be.—Bangor Daily Commercial.

THOUGHTS.

When beautiful thoughts unto you are given—
Beautiful thoughts from earth to heaven—
You should give heed to them, give them expression;
They may to some one bring sweet consolation.
Weary ones traveling along life's rough highway,
Stumbling and falling in some darkened by-way,
May catch the sweet sound of truths that are spoken
As balm to the soul or the heart that is broken.
'Tis better to let the light that's within you
Shine forth and be seen by those in the dark,
That they may in error no longer continue,
But be guided aright by the glimmering spark.
Give to each thought the careful attention
That you would bestow on some cherished flower—
That it may expand to its fullest dimension
In beauty, in color, in fragrance and power.
'Tis selfishness only that hides from another
The things that we so greatly enjoy;
Then keep not those heaven-born thoughts from each other,
For selfishness will real pleasure destroy. —Clara Glenford.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION

WHAT IS GOD

And Where and What Is Heaven?

A Lecture Delivered November 1, BY MRS. NORIE CLAMAN, Under the Inspiration of "Brother John."

We then as workers together with him beseech you also that you receive not the grace of God in vain. Cor. II., 1: 6.

The subject chosen for discussion at this hour has been handed in by a member of the congregation, and I want to say before entering upon these most important questions that I shall endeavor, as far as I know, to tell to you in the simplest form of language I can command what I know to be the truth, what has been taught me, and also what I have seen upon the spirit side of the immortal part of life relative to this God, and also to the other subject, heaven.

It is not my desire to obstruct a bridge or a something in your pathway, or to divert your opinions, but what-soever is said from this pulpit at this hour upon these two important subjects is for man's betterment and edification, and also for the upbuilding of the spiritual intelligences here, too. There are those of you who may feel within yourselves that there are no invisible forces present at this time. Do not be mistaken, friends, for there are innumerable forces here who have been taught exactly as some of you have been—taught that there is a personal God and a literal heaven; and in that narrow, man-made religion they are seeking, as some of you are seeking to-night; they are seeking that help which man cannot give them; are seeking that help which orthodox creeds have said God alone can give. But it is within themselves to get it. It is within themselves to receive the truth. This is why they—I am speaking of the spiritual forces present—have come here at this time that some word of truth may be given them from which they may derive a benefit, whereby they may be helped to go on in the spirit life.

First, as we look along down the ages of time, long years before the Jesus of Nazareth was born upon the material plane, the conscious part of man called out for help; he knew not whence it was to come; he knew not whence he himself came, and he cried out for a something to be given him whereby he might know and realize the immortal part of mankind. Long ages ago a parallel line was drawn out between this something and the mortal man. He studied around and about it, all the conditions of it imaginable, to find a name by which he might call this something, and the name of God was finally decided upon. But they did not go far enough with that name. In crying out to this God in their prayers, they called upon him as if he were a being. They prayed aloud on bended knees with a great volume of words, when this power to whom they prayed was a something within themselves, oh! mortal man.

You may ask the question from the orthodox standpoint, "who is this God?" The answer nine times out of ten will be that He is a spirit. He is the ruler, of all this universe. It would have to be a very narrow contracted God, if He ruled only this universe. Others will say to you, He is an all-wise being, an occupant of a throne in heaven. A minister of the gospel, a learned man of this city, said to my instrument a few days ago—I was with her and heard him: "God is a spirit. God is good. God is a just God, and he lives in heaven." She asked him where was heaven. "Up there, up there," he answered.

Up where? Has any one who lives there in the spheres of immortal life—for I cannot call it "up there"—has anyone, oh! friends of earth, ever returned from the place they call heaven and told you that there was a God up there who was a personality, who could see children born only to be cast down to a literal hell? Oh, no! Let us not accept such a belief as that. Let us tear down these dogmas set up by man to cover up self. To cover up self, man has tried to make God an idol to save some and to damn others.

Long years ago, when I was living here, I was taught these doctrines, but there was always something within my breast which said to me: "John, there is something better than that for you, and you must work out this heaven for yourself. You must understand this God who lives just as much within yourself as anywhere else.

There is a power, there is an intelligence, and it is very unscientific to call this power God; but you can call it something else, a power which far surpasses that name.—Jehova. What is it? I AM. I AM, that is what you should call it, only you put these two expressions as one. I am life, I am that good, I am that God individually and the over-soul.

Let us reason together. If you were not, from whence comes your conscious state? If you were not, oh! man of earth, whence do you receive this intelligence? This power, this Life, is within every soul. You call it ego, you can call it I AM, but remember that it is a power which lives not beyond upon a throne, but within yourself.

But how can we understand then this power of which I speak? It is the easiest and simplest thing in the world to understand. How? By retiring within yourself and there seeking. Not by placing an idol upon a throne to be worshiped, but by creating within yourself a desire for heaven, a desire for immortal life.

"But," say you, "where is this heaven?" "Where can I find this heaven?" By looking within. There you have everything that is to be found anywhere—in all this boundless universe, all space, taking in all of the other planets. And by the recognition of one's own self, by looking within one's own self, you have it all, and you have it exactly as you make it.

Then we cannot call heaven a place, can we? In some instances I have been sent to bear spirits out of mortal life into spirit life whose lives had been spiritual, whose lives here had been grand, good lives, and when awakened in the Spirit-world they went to a place which I should call a place of rest. And how did they gain that place of rest? They paid attention to that I AM, that God force which lives supreme within. They paid attention to the pleadings of conscience, accepted the truth and understood themselves, and now they are receiving the reward of the deeds they did here. They are enjoying heaven. Yes, and they come back to us of the material plane, they bring words of cheer, words of comfort, and they say in our ears: "Listen! I am pleading for you, and I will guide you there."

Then, oh! then, what? If he upon the material plane says: "Open the door of my understanding. Come in and sup with me and I with you. I am a part of you and you a part of me." Oh! how quickly does that chain begin to grow, and there is soon a way built across the little stream that divides the mortal from the immortal life. This drives away all fear of death. This drives away all the terrors of the fairy stories our mothers told to us when we were boys, of the devil getting us if we were bad. These drive away all of these harmful ideas and they are wiped, as it were, from off the face of the earth. This is the way, friends, that heaven is being constructed. This is the way that heaven is being brought to earth, by each soul awakened to a sense of its duty seeking to help its fellow man. Then if we work in union, this great intelligence that lives incarnate in everything ceases to be a God and becomes a light; ceases to be what has been put up as an idol, and lives in everything alike. The lowest forms of molecules of life—every blade of grass, the leaves of the trees, the animals, and everything that mind can conceive of,—tells you that there is a something that propels that life, or how would it get there? It shows that there must be an intelligence within that brings forth that life in its special form. Then comes the dawn of glorious truth. Mankind cannot go any more along that little narrow pathway which has been constructed by mortal man. No longer can we be satisfied with what is within the lids of the Holy Bible so-called. No longer can we be satisfied with the songs we have sung. Then we ask what is there that can satisfy us? There is but one single thing that alone can satisfy the inquiring mind of mortal man, and that is this: The understanding of himself, a realization of what is this force, what he himself is, and what becomes of the immortal part when he is through with the mortal man. And as the dawn breaks I can see the glorious sun of truth appearing which shall be able to help the human family.

Upon the material plane we know that when our neighbor is sick and we carry food to him, pay his rent, go hungry if necessary that he may be fed, there is a something within us that says: "Thou hast done well. Accept the applause of those who through the power of impression led you aright." This is the condition that is being felt all through this land. As it grows it will supply many hungry souls who have never been satisfied by creed, dogma or priesthood.

This is only truth backed up by spirit-life, borne in anew to you from time to time. It is the only truth which can satisfy the inquiring soul of mankind to-day; the only truth known anywhere among men upon the material plane that teaches the simplicity of immortal life. It is the only truth that brings your loved ones back to your arms, whose mortal part has been given back to mother clay. It is the only truth that says to you, "They are not dead. Let that be banished from your mind forever. There are no dead. The entire boundless universe is all life. There is no death. And this heaven so long talked of is not a place, but a condition, a peaceful, quiet, harmonious condition. Rest, oh! thou weary one. Peace and love is what makes heaven— not a place, but a condition."

The man who works from morning until night for the betterment of mankind is the man who when he awakens in the spirit morning will find a home whose every timber is a thought which he has put forth for the good of his fellow men, as was so beautifully explained in the poem read at the opening of the meeting, and great will be that spirit's home. Great will be his reward, because he has been striving while living here to have an abiding place when through with this life, and at the same time by and through these conditions he could through the power of impression help his fellowmen living here into a higher and better understanding of themselves.

There is no time, dear friends, in the busy world of to-day among so many human souls, to talk about man-made creeds or man-made religions. The time was when the material world was full of narrow minded and selfish men, and we have been warring with them to make them understand themselves, to awaken them to the fact that there is something better beyond this first sphere, and just as they are here so are they there.

There are millions of souls to-day incarnated back upon this material plane who are helping us through the power of love to scatter these truths. In the private rooms are the little circles being held by many of you to learn the truth of immortal life, to know the lines which draw you closer and closer to the spheres in the spirit life. So hasten away from man-made creeds of to-day. Come one come all, and join the army. Come and unite with us while we are here, for ere the dawn of a new century, the truths which I have proclaimed to you shall be carried from shore to shore and put into practice. God's kingdom shall be established upon the material plane. I AM shall speak out through the mouths of mortal man. There shall be no more clashing of arms, no more of wringing of hands; but peace will reign, heaven will be instituted in every home, and children of love will be born, and wives and husbands will be united, not as two but as one. And when they go into the spheres of immortal life, their home over there will be well made, because every thought of love, and that great power of attraction which governs everything will be put into practice, and they will receive the reward of a well spent life while here.

Place yourself then, let me pray of you, in a condition to receive your loved ones in the spirit-life. Be prepared with garments clean and white. Oh! may the angel world come close around those of earth to-day. Break down the barriers and let the sunshine flood in. Open the way now, oh! friends of earth. Let heaven be yours. Let that ego which is all life know itself.

SPIRITUAL ELECTRICITY.

Translation of a Very Ancient Manuscript.

I give the following as the translation of a very ancient Mss.:

Look well, that you understand that which comes to you, for out of the potency of the thought comes the potency of the Word. Mighty events and their consequences shape themselves even from the seemingly feeble vibrations. To those who are glad to listen, hear what the spirit hath to say: "Yield not up these privileges, they are a part of your birthright."

It is not what to say, but how to choose that which will be most readily understood. To talk of Fohat, the Spirit of Fire, is to talk of the One; not only of the one, but of the essence of the Incomprehensible and Unapproachable. This is symbolical. When we are considering the macrocosm, we may perceive something of that which is there, by an examination of the microcosm. Let us so study.

That from which the human mind recoils, because it perceives how useless it is to try to perceive the unperceivable, we will approach, because, by meditating, there may grow upon us some idea of that which was, and is and is to come.

The symbol of the infinite and the spiritual, is typified on the physical plane, by its manifestation. Now let us see how it manifests itself. You are all familiar with the physical fire. Whence comes it? All of the Aryan myths tell us that it came down from Heaven, and they say well, because it is the direct manifestation of the omnipotent force of the universe.

Let us pursue the examination a little farther. Fire is omnipotent. Those who have studied in the physical realms of knowledge are willing to admit there is nothing upon the surface of the earth that will not yield to the power of fire, and there is but one opposing force in the visible universe, that is named water. It is also known that beyond a certain point water itself is dissolved into its constituents by fire; and then, that which it had before opposed, it increases in intensity, heat and power of absorption. In one sense, fire absorbs everything. We will not, however, diverge from the main idea, by attempting to follow out these changes of polarity, and of vibration, but satisfy our minds with the simple statement that everything does, or can be made to disappear in fire. Fine gold is there separated from its dross. Whatever is there consumed is separated into its essential parts, the manifested and the unmanifested, and that which remains in the fire is freed from gross, physical conditions. All the stains, all the impurities, and all the filthiness are dissolved away by the intensity of the potency within the fire.

Again, fire is universal. There is no place upon the whole earth, nor in the universe, of absolute cold, therefore, there must be fire everywhere. Fire is omniscient, because it contains within itself all things. Fire is omnipotent, because nothing can stand against it. Fire is omnipresent, because out of that which seems most opposed, it can be evoked. Thus we have the TRIAD, which stands for the ONE. Outside of potency, knowledge and presence, nothing else could exist, or be created. They who in the ancient times thought and meditated much upon this subject, deemed Fohat, or Fire, not the manifestation perceived on the physical plane, but the essence or pattern on the spiritual plane, of all that appears on the visible. It is Spiritual Electricity, the innermost of the innermost, and fire is its symbol, fittest type of that which is the ONE.

It is perceivable of Fohat, that all which approaches it, is absorbed into it, and is cleansed and purified of all but the highest potency, so it must also be a symbol of purity.

Philosophers say that it is not approachable, and why? Because that which seeks to approach, from a physical conception, understading or desire, will be consumed or changed; that which remains will be the essence, while that which fades away, will be the stain, the worthless, the weakness, the illusion, the changeable. That which remains will be pure, and in alignment to the plane of itself.

Suppose a great city is on fire, in a number of places. The great lapping tongues of flame and intense heat, breaking out here and there, finally unite, and become one in their work of destruction. So they who approach Fohat in thought, come into alignment, and as they come closer within the light, they ever approach, never touch the flame, for they must advance only from within, and be changed from the physical materiality, to the Spiritually essential.

Do you wonder that the old philosophers insisted so strenuously upon the idea of purity of thought, of act, and of living; because in the approach, the Word is absolute and inevitable, and in the consuming, it were better that the larger part remain as pure gold, and that the smaller part were purged away, and this is in proportion to the overcoming of the physical desires, the increase of spiritual knowledge, and perfection of life.

There can be no manifestation without Fohat. Darkness, cold and death are synonymous terms. If light is universal, if life is universal, Fohat must be universal also. Then whatever fire in the physical typifies, whatever in meditation you can ascribe to it, you can ascribe to Fohat. The fire which apparently devoureth, absorbs and contains within itself all existence, all life, all manifestation.

When Fohat shall have withdrawn itself, within itself (as fire sometimes seems to have done), or in other words dies out, it still contains within itself the germ or spark of re-creation, regeneration and re-manifestation. Thus the Divine Karma, produced by desire of the good, lingers forever, and ever through all the eternities, to produce the out-going of the cycle which returning into itself, completes for Fohat, the Spiritual Electricity, the beginning and end of the great Manvantaric day.

He who will study the light and the fire, looking to them only as the veil which but thinly conceals the essence, may of himself learn many lessons which can make him richer in knowledge, and perchance it may make life easier on the rough and rugged road, over which all the earth-born must travel. To whoever may read, let there come the benediction of peace, help, strength, beneficence, and guidance. We look to the higher self—Spiritual Electricity. —W. P. PHELON, M. D.

I CURE FITS

When I say I cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS a lifelong study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. ANIMALS IN HEAVEN.

Have They a Continued Existence?

Some Interesting Experiences in Proof of the Affirmative.

Having had many remarkable experiences, and having heard of others still more remarkable, which were well authenticated, in affirmation of the above query, and having carefully weighed all the evidence obtained, I am as positive that all species of animals survive the disintegration of the material body as I am of the most elementary principles of nature. If they do not—then farewell to the immortality of the soul of man; for there is just as much evidence that the animal has a soul as there is that man has. It is supreme egotism for man to assume that he alone of all the animal kingdom will survive the change called death.

"But," says an objector, "they don't aspire to immortality."

How does he know they do not? Has he ever interviewed them upon the subject?

Another says: "If there are animals in heaven, then excuse me; I will demand a card of absence."

Very well; if this one has an antipathy to animals he will very likely be assigned to a sphere where they are not. But remember this: Animals, like people, will cease to thirst for blood in the spirit form, and therefore will no more go forth to the slaughter of prey; will no more "sting" or "bite," or bite.

Isaiah spoke of the spirit-world when he said:

"The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the suckling together; and a little child shall lead them . . And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord (spirit) as the waters cover the sea."—Isaiah xi:6,8,9.

When we have given to the world our revelations upon the origin and evolution of spirit and matter, we will illustrate the part animals have to play in the universal drama of life.

The fact is, there are many Spiritualists who have not outgrown the narrow orthodox heaven—they seem to imagine heaven to be a painted city with streets of gold, gates of ivory; cold, cheerless, sculptured walls, with perhaps a few gardens of flowers.

In the spirit we have roamed those "evergreen mountains of life," those sylvan, vine-trellised dales with their indescribable variety of rainbow-tinted flowers; those beauteous waving plains, and by the clear waters have seen the wild deer and the lion sporting together, while the forests were melodious with the celestial songs of birds. Such is our ideal heaven. But we must omit further description here and return to cold facts.

B. F. Underwood, one of the most profound thinkers of the age, recently wrote a powerful argument in the defence of animals, in which he quoted the following sublime passage from that other brilliant writer, Jerome K. Jerome:

"Ah! old staunch friend, with your deep, clear eyes and bright, quick glances that take in all one has to say before one has time to speak it, do you know you are only an animal and have no mind? Do you know that dull-eyed, gin-sodden lout leaning against the outpost there is immeasurably your superior? Do you know that every little-minded selfish scoundrel, who never did a gentle deed or said a kind word, who never had a thought that was not mean and low, or a desire that was not mean and base, whose every action is a fraud and whose every utterance is a lie; do you know that these crawling skulks are as much superior to you as the sun is superior to sunlight, you honorable, brave-hearted, unselfish brute? They are men, you know, and men are the greatest, noblest and wisest and best beings in the whole vast, eternal universe. Any man will tell you that."

Not "any man." There are many men in our list of acquaintances who believe the meanest dog is superior to the average biped call man.

The terms "brutal" and "beastly" are misnomers as applied to men. Usually when the epithet is applied to an individual, he is so much below the beasts of the field that such appellations highly flatter him.

A CLAIRVOYANT HORSE.

A pastor of one of the San Diego churches (whose name I am requested to withhold for obvious reasons, though the statements can be easily verified) had a very remakable experience in the early days of California. He then had a circuit in the mining camps of Placer county, if I remember the county correctly, and had started to give a series of temperance lectures, which were resulting disastrously to the saloons in the town where he was located.

One morning he found a card tacked to his door warning him that if he attempted to keep his appointment to deliver a temperance lecture at a certain camp, ten miles from there, he would never reach the place alive.

He treated the matter as a joke, and on the appointed evening mounted his faithful steed and set out to keep his date. There was a fork in the road, both branches leading to the same place—one being shorter but rougher than the other. Being a slow rider, it was always his custom to take the short route.

That night he started, as usual, on the short route, and had proceeded but a short distance when his horse suddenly seized the bits between his teeth, wheeled about and dashed back to the fork in the road. This nettled the rider, and having again obtained control of the reins he applied the whip to the trembling animal and soon found himself at the same point. It was a bright moonlight night and nothing was visible to the clerical rider, but all of a sudden the horse again reared upon his hind feet and struck the air with both front feet as though someone had seized him by the bits. Again the animal wheeled and ran back to the forks of the road, trembling and frothing at the mouth. Never had the horse displayed such conduct before, and the rider thought it strange, and so, with the remark, "Have it your own way, then," took the other road and arrived a little late, but in time to give his lecture. He did not mention his experience, however, until some time after, thinking nothing more about it, until one of his converts confessed that he, with a number of others, had been in a plot to assassinate the reverend gentleman, and that they were ambushed at a point about a mile beyond where the animal became frightened, in the canyon, knowing that to be his accustomed route. The men chanced to be superstitious, and believing it to be a miracle that saved the preacher's life, several of them joined the church and confessed to relieve their conscience.

OTHER EXPERIENCES.

Mrs. Flora B. White, a well known and estimable lady of San Diego, in a letter to the Herald of Light, made the following statement, which is well authenticated, and which should be sufficient proof of the existence of animals out of the material form: "Some years ago I had a home in the Santa Cruz mountains, and when my dear old mother passed out of my mortal sight, we laid her to rest under one of the large redwood trees on the home place and within sight of the house windows. Our cat was a great pet of my mother's, and was constantly with her in her last illness. A few days after the funeral, we noticed the cat playing on and around the grave, and, watching her closely, would see her rub against what to us seemed empty space, and show every evidence of pleasure and companionship. This was an every-day occurrence, until one evening we found the lifeless body of the cat stretched on the grave. The question is what did she see around the grave and why did she die there?

"Nearly two years ago myself and husband were stopping with Prof. J. S. Loveland at his home in Summerland. One afternoon we drove into Santa Barbara, returning in the early evening. Our horse (a steady-going old fellow which we have had for years) suddenly shied, at nothing we could see. Taken unawares, we could not control him. The buggy was overturned, breaking it to pieces and throwing us out, dislocating my husband's shoulder and breaking two ribs for me. We were carried back to Prof. Loveland's house, where we found the horse, trembling with excitement, and on enquiring found there had been four runaway accidents at or near the same place in the road where we were hurt."

The writer of this article has had several experiences with a horse on the plains of Kansas. At certain points, in broad daylight and on the open prairie, the animal would suddenly rear backward, with protruding eyes and loud snorts, and trembling in every muscle, would try to run away from something invisible to the rider, and no amount of persuasion would induce him to pass that point without making a detour of nearly a quarter of a mile around the invisible object. At all times, excepting upon these three or four occasion, the horse was perfectly gentle and never shied at material objects—unless a whip, or something truly dangerous.

In a previous number of the Herald of Light, Ella Wilson Marchant, a well-known writer of San Bernardino, gave a similar proof under the heading, "What Did the Cat See?" She told how, upon one occasion, her pet cat, which had always been "at home" in all parts of the house, suddenly became frightened at something it saw in the stairway, but which Mrs Marchant could not see. Through curiosity, she gathered the cat in her arms and carried it upstairs, despite its struggles. Upon being released it dashed away into the garret and hid behind some boxes and other articles stored therein, and later mewed piteously until released from the room. On other occasions, both before and after this episode, the cat allowed itself to be taken into this room without showing the slightest alarm. In answer to the question in the heading of Mrs. Marchant's article, it might be suggested that the cat saw a savage dog which had yielded up the flesh.

It was the accidental discovery of the clairvoyance of animals that led the writer to the investigation of this and occult forces. —E. S. GREEN.

AN APPEAL

To the Spiritualists of America.

The Veteran Spiritualists' Union was incorporated in 1891 under the laws of Massachusetts for the purpose of enrolling and organizing Spiritualists for co-operative action in promulgating the truths of Spiritualism, to solicit bequests and donations from all Spiritualists who desire through its agency to alleviate the necessities of the sick or destitute among its members and others, a work which it has carried on to the full extent of its means since its organization. The Union is not local in its membership, or in the bestowal of its bounties, its members being from nearly every State of the Union, and its beneficiaries to fifteen States, and have not been confined to its members exclusively, nearly one half being outside its pale, and in some urgent cases, even outside the ranks of Spiritualism.

Believing that the time has fully arrived, and the needs of the hour calls for immediate action, the Union therefore, in accordance with the objects for which it was organized, proposes to establish and equip a Home in which to care for the aged, and destitute, and in connection therewith, as soon as practicable, a Hospital building, in which to treat the sick among its unfortunate members, in accordance with the most advanced ideas in hypnotism, magnetism, and kindred remedies.

It is with great pleasure that the Union announces, that after six years of persistent effort, it has at last succeeded in procuring a tract of land, with buildings thereon peculiarly adapted to the purposes of a Home. This establishment is situated in one of the most beautiful suburbs of Boston, known as "Waverly in the town of Belmont." This property, widely known as the Campbell Mansion, has been purchased from Mr. Henry F. Campbell, a gentleman who is deeply in sympathy with the objects and purposes of the Union and a member thereof, and who accompanies the sale with generous gifts of both land and money.

The estate immediately adjoins the Beaver Brook reservation, so-called, of the new Metropolitan Park, and contains a portion of the celebrated Agassiz Moraine and Agassiz Oaks, well known to scientists throughout the country.

The grounds also contain a grove in which to hold open air meetings in the proper season, which will be undoubtedly a marked feature of the movement, and a valuable aid in disseminating the truths of Spiritualism.

Within a radius of nine miles are the cities of Boston, Somerville, Cambridge, Waltham, Newton, Woburn, and the towns of Belmont, Watertown, Winchester, Arlington, Stoneham, and the historic battle-grounds of Lexington and Concord, embracing a population of nearly or quite a million of inhabitants, thus opening a vast field in which to sow the seed of the new gospel of Spiritualism.

Thus with our benevolent work we combine the educational.

The executive work of the Union is done gratuitously by a board of fifteen directors, and no member thereof receives any pecuniary compensation for services rendered.

The Union now earnestly appeals to Spiritualists to embrace the opportunity offered them to contribute to the support of so grand a work, remembering that the power to do so implies the obligation, and "that he who gives quickly gives twice."

All sums received will be acknowledged personally, and in the Banner of Light, with the names of the donors, by Moses T. Dole, treasurer, No. 71 Perkins street, Charlestown District, Boston, Mass. Christopher C. Shaw, president, Wm. H. Banks, clerk. Moses T. Dole, treasurer.

GONE ASTRAY.

Tradition tells us travelers have stood
Lost and alone within the mossy wood,
No mark to guide, and no familiar sound,
No sign of man for miles and miles around;
The forest dim and dark as night draws on,
No hope of rescue ere another dawn.
Could they enjoy the sweet, damp, mossy smell,
Or list to tales the whispering oaks might tell?
Or understand the murmurings of the pines,
Or read what's plainly written 'twixt the lines
In Nature's generous book, unheeding Man
So seldom reads and never understands.
Ah, no, the lonely soul by fear opprest,
Frenzied, is lost to reason and to rest;
Thus the poor outcast, banished from his kind,
A lonelier, darker solitude may find
Within the city's noisy streets,
Where he may witness, but not taste the sweets
Of social life and loving family ties,
Than he who to the forest gladly flies
To dwell within some lonely cave or hut
Content, aye, glad, to think himself forgot.
Hid from the cruel scorn of human eye,
Rejoicing there alone to live and die.
Oh, cruel, unrelenting human hate
To aggravate a fallen brother's fate.
Your boasted, all-forgiving Christian love
Is dead, indeed, to witness all unmoved
The helpless struggles of the throng who fall,
And then fill to the brim their cup of gall,
With petty spite and haughty arrogance,
Proud, untried virtue, and dense ignorance
Of weaker natures, and the thoughtless mind,
Or vilely bred. alas! to crime inclined.
Why punish thus the weary, sin-sick soul,
Tonic and physic to make weak bodies whole?
A thinking man must bow and blush with shame
To think his soul inhabits human frame.
Made in "God's image"—so the pious read.
"A little lower than the angels"—now, indeed,
I think that means, except by saving grace,
Lower than the angels of the "other place."

"EUTHANASIA."

Thankful for the Help Received.

To the Editor:—The article in The Progressive Thinker, November 7, entitled "Euthanasia," meets a long felt want of poor, unfortunate mortals, lingering, as it were, so near the borderland that even the spirit itself longs to be released from the wornout physical body which holds it a prisoner.

We have in our midst, at this time, a faithful sister and medium, who, when under control, speaks several languages, giving many wonderful tests of the power of spirit, when in her more restored physical condition, suffering extremely from an inward cancer. All arrangements have been made for some time for the receiving of the spirit, when freed from its earthly tenement of pain and suffering. Her spirit mother and friends are in daily attendance, anxiously waiting to welcome her to her well-earned home, where, with the knowledge she already has of its surroundings (being a fine clairvoyant), she can return to her patient, indulgent husband and friends here to carry on the work she has left unfinished, as it were, to take up her work on the spirit-side, with new life and vigor.

I wish to thank the brother personally, for the words he so nobly presented in regard to suicides. It has helped me for one, more than he can realize; in that alone his article has done its mission—it has held the spirit-mirror before my eyes. When influenced by these unhappy ones who come to us of times when conditions are such that they can control, we are tempted to do what they have done, thinking to escape our unpleasant duties of life, and to be freed from "taking on" these personations of despair and hopelessness.

His words have helped me to grow strong, and to feel that surely we do not escape the individual consciousness when we awaken to the fact of our rashness. I wish we had many more such M. D.'s in our cause, for the betterment of humanity, for certainly we need them, when one of the greatest battles we have to fight is with the "earth physicians of our free America," while mediums are in every State being persecuted for their mediumship; many are suffering imprisonment and humiliation from this one phase alone.

I sincerely hope this brother may write us from time to time, through the columns of The Progressive Thinker, which grows better and better as each week it is presented to us, clean and bright—so full of wisdom and new life. Long may it live to carry on its humanitarian work. —ESTELLE F. HOWES.

Joan, the Medium.

Or, the Inspired Heroine of Orleans. Spiritualism as a Leader of Armies. By MOSES HULL. This is at once the most truthful history of Joan of Arc, and one of the most convincing arguments on Spiritualism ever written. No novel was ever more thrillingly interesting; no history more true. Price in cloth, 40 cents; paper cover, 25 cents.

The Real Issue.

By MOSES HULL. A compound of the two pamphlets, "The Irrepressible Conflict," and "Your Answer or Your Life;" with important additions, making a book of 160 pages all for 25 cents. This book contains statistics, facts and documents, on the tendencies of the times, that every one should have.

All About Devils.

Or, an Inquiry as to whether Modern Spiritualism and other Great Reforms come from His Satanic Majesty and His Subordinates in the Kingdom of Darkness. 60 pages. By MOSES HULL. Price, 15 cents.

Jesus and the Mediums, or Christ and Mediumship.

Careful comparison of some of the Spiritualism and Mediumship of the Bible with that of to-day. By MOSES HULL. An invincible argument proving that Jesus was only a medium, subject to all the conditions of modern mediumship. It also shows that all the manifestations throughout the Old and New Testament were under the same conditions that mediums require to-day; and that the coming of Christ is the return of mediumship to the world. 48 pages. Price, 10 cents.

The Spiritual Birth, or Death and Its To-Morrow.

The Spiritual Idea of Death, Heaven and Hell. By MOSES HULL. This pamphlet besides giving the Spiritualistic interpretation of many things in the Bible—interpretations never before given, explains the heavens and hells believed in by Spiritualists. Price, 10 cents.

The Quarantine Raised.

Or the Twenty Years Battle Against a Worker Ended. Price 10 cents.

THE COMING AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

BY BURTON AMES HUNTINGTON.

This excellent book is written in the interest of humanity, of liberty, and of patriotism—a book written for the purpose of calling attention to the deadly dangers that beset us on every side, and more especially to the hostile attitude and the insidious wiles of an ever-present, though secret, unscrupulous foe—the Catholics. Washington's words of warning, Lincoln's apprehension and the prophecy of General Grant are all included in the volume. Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, in a recent sermon said: "The church tolerates heretics where she is obliged to do so, but she hates them with a deadly hatred, and uses all her power to annihilate them. Our enemies know how she treated heretics in the Middle Ages, and how she treats them today where she has the power. We no more think of denying these historic facts than we do of blaming the Holy Ghost and the princes of the church for what they have thought fit to do." Every one should read this work. Paper, 300 pages. It will be sent, postpaid, for fifty cents. For sale at this office.

ENCYCLOPEDIA ... OF ... BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM ... OR ... A CONCORDANCE

To the principal passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism;

Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.

BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair; and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM contains 385 pages, beautifully printed on good paper, contains a full-page portrait of the author and is handsomely bound in cloth. Every Spiritualist should have this work.

PRICE $1. FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

A thrilling appeal to all who are interested in learning how the great forces of the Roman Catholic Church are seeking to control all movements pertaining to human progress that are in opposition to their dogmatic religious teachings. Price 15 cents. For sale at this office.

"THE WATSEKA WONDER."

To the student of psychic phenomena, this pamphlet is intensely interesting. It gives detailed accounts of two cases of "double consciousness," namely Mary Lurancy Vennum, of Watseka, Ill., and Mary Reynolds, of Venango county, Pa. For sale at this office. Price 15 cents.

MODERN SCIENCE.

Interesting Facts and Statements.

Spiritualists Should Examine Science as Well as Phenomena.

All gases are composed of atoms or molecules, of which there are millions of millions of millions in a cubic inch. These myriads of mites are ever flying about with intense velocities. Each knocks against or encounters its fellows. It may be five thousand millions of times. It may be twenty thousand millions of times, in a second. By the energy of these knocks heat is evolved or pressure produced upon any surface which bounds or restrains the gas. Once when Pasteur was dining with his daughter and her family at her home in Burgundy he took care to dip in a glass of water the cherries that were served for dessert and then wipe them carefully with his napkin before putting them in his mouth. His fastidiousness amused the people at the table, but the scientist rebuked them for their levity and discoursed at length on the dangers in microbes and animalculae. A few moments later in a fit of abstraction, he suddenly seized the glass in which he had washed the cherries and drank the water, microbes and all, at a single draught.

HEALTHY MICROBES.

That nature generally knows what she is about better than some scientific experimenters Professor Kijanizia of Kiew has found out to his sorrow. He thought people would be better off if the air was sterilized. Thereupon he destroyed all the microbes in a certain quantity of air and fed it to a number of small animals. But the pure air did not seem to agree with the little beasts, it seemed, for they all died.

THE SUNSHINE.

There was a time, not many years ago, when the sun might shine and shine with all its might and yet leave no scientific record of its presence beyond the effect of mere heat shown by the thermometer. Nowadays all this is changed and there are scattered over various portions of the country instruments which catch every gleam of bright sunlight and write it down indelibly, so that by looking at the picture presented we may see at a glance whether such and such a day was really fine or cloudy. The contrivance by which this is effected is exceedingly simple, consisting as it does of nothing more than a solid glass ball set on a pedestal with a surrounding frame in which to place at a suitable angle a little strip of blue cardboard. The glass ball plays the part of a burning-glass, and when the sun shines brightly the rays are focused upon the strip of cardboard, where the effect is seen in a scorched patch of more or less distinctness. As the relative position of the sun changes the scorch changes too, so that at the end of a bright, sunny day the picture on the card consists of a long scorched line. By measuring this line we get a record of the number of hours' sunshine prevalent during the day. The instrument, although commendably simple has one great drawback. If the brilliancy of the suns' rays be shrouded even to a very small extent by mist or by a thin veil of cirrus cloud the heat produced is insufficient to produce a burn on the card.

PASTE DIAMONDS.

Electricity is now used to detect paste diamonds from the genuine. A small disk of aluminum is attached to the spindle of a small motor. A clamp with a small flat spring, provided with an adjustable screw, holds the article to be tested. It is then moistened and placed in contact with the rapidly revolving aluminum disk. If the stone is a genuine one it will be left intact; if it is bogus it will show brilliant metallic marks.

THERMOMETERS.

To tell whether a thermometer accurately does its work invert the instrument. If the mercury does not fall to the end or if it breaks into several small columns the thermometer contains air and is inaccurate. If perfectly made the slender thread should fill the tube or break off at the bulb and fall to the end of the tube. There is another interesting fact about thermometers. Nine persons out of ten think the mercurial column round, but that is not the case. The thread of mercury in thermometers is flat. If it were round the column could hardly be seen, for the opening of the tube is as fine as the finest thread. Some eight or ten years ago a Boston manufacturer introduced a scheme of coating the back of the tube with white sizing. That makes the column of mercury stand out clear and distinct. Thermometers are cheaper and better than ever before. You can now buy a heat-marker for 25 cents but a first-class instrument will cost you $2. A cheap instrument is like a cheap watch—it is unreliable. The reason for this is that a perfect thermometer has a scale of its own. The cheap thermometer is made on guess work. Hence you see a difference of two, three or five degrees between thermometers in the same locality on the same day. The most sensitive heat marker is the Crookes. It consists of four arms suspended on a steel pivot, rotating like a miniature wind gauge, and the whole affair is inclosed in a glass tube from which the air has been exhausted. The light of a candle one or two feet away causes the arms to rotate. Quite as sensitive is the thermopile, which is used to detect the faint rays of heat transmitted from the moon and stars to this cold world

THE COIN DID NOT COME BACK.

On one occasion, while examining the mechanism of the monster revolving lamp belonging to an English lighthouse, a gentleman wishing to see how many seconds would elapse in completing a revolution, took a half crown piece form his pocket and placed it on the revolving framework. Watch in hand, he waited for the coin to come around again, but no half crown appeared. The seconds lengthened into minutes, still no half crown. "Strange" he exclaimed, "What can be the meaning of it?" In order to ascertain the cause of the strange phenomenon he walked around to the other side of the lamp, and in doing so encountered one of the lighthouse men, who touched his hat and said, "Thank you sir," in an undertone. The man, seeing the coin coming toward him, had pocketed it, thinking it was meant for a tip.

Raoul Pictet who has done much original chemical work at low temperatures, suggests that by making use of low temperatures syntheses may be obtained which would be otherwise impossible. In many chemical operations the heat generated so raises the general temperature of the bodies acted upon that all control over the combination is lost. At very low temperatures, however, all chemical action ceases. By choosing the right temperature therefore, reaction between chemicals may be made as slow as desired. By this means M. Pictet has effected combinations that are impossible at ordinary temperatures.

HYSTERIA.

An unusually rare case of supposed nervous hysteria was exhibited at Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York, the other day, by Dr. Herman W. Biggs, professor of nervous diseases at the college. The patient was a healthy, intelligent woman 35 years old, who had suddenly become deaf and dumb, as it was believed. There was an effort to speak but no sound could be uttered. At the same time the patient did not, or professed not to hear what was addressed to her. Rest and quiet did not bring relief nor did a calm reasoning, by means of writing, with the woman produce any change such as would be produced by mental treatment in ordinary cases of hysteria. An examination revealed the fact that no local disease interfered, the trachea was in a healthy condition, but the patient had no control of the vocal cords. No vibrations could be produced; and, consequently, no sound was heard. It was clear that the vocal cords were temporarily paralyzed. Prof. Biggs told the students that if there was no permanent injury to the cords, the local trouble would yield to and be disposed of by means of the use of electricity. The electric battery was then called into use, the cords were relaxed and the woman spoke as formerly. Hearing and speech were both restored.

STEEL CORSETS.

The story that a deviation of her compass resulting from the presence of steel in a cork leg worn by the man at the wheel caused the steamer Susan E. Peck to strand near Bar Point, Lake Erie, in September last, with a loss of $20,000, recalls a similar circumstance. According to the narrator, on one of the trips of the fine steel steamer Castella down Lake Huron the last season the second mate reported to Capt. Allen that the compass had suddenly gone wrong, that the needle would swing three or four points to the right or left at intervals and that because of these erratic movements it had become utterly impossible to steer a course—in fact, he had lost trace of the course altogether. Capt. Allen accompanied the mate to the pilot house and found matters just as they had been described. Besides the man at the wheel two lady passengers were in the pilot house when Capt. Allen entered. Turning to them, after meditating for a moment, he asked if they wore steel corsets. A reply in the affirmative led to further question as to where they had been and this elicited the information that the ladies had paid a visit to the engine room and that while there the engineer had afforded them an opportunity to inspect the dynamo which supplied the electric lights of the steamer "That settles it, you must get out of here!" next greeted the ears of the ladies as Capt. Allen opened the pilot-house for their exit. And while they were walking back to the cabin in a maze of surprise and astonishment at Capt. Allen's exhibit of bluff, sailorlike authority, that compass got right down to staid business again and showed the man at the wheel the way with its usual precision. It is hardly necessary to explain that the dynamo had magnetized the steel corsets worn by the ladies and that the corsets became responsible for the crazy race the needle of the compass ran as the wearers moved to and fro in the pilot house.

OBJECT OF SCIENCE.

The object of science is nature—the world of phenomena, whose ongoings are open to our observation and contemplation. The object of theology is the supposed attributes, plans and purposes of the unknown cause of phenomena. Science is knowledge classified and methodized. For convenience we label a certain class of facts astronomy, geology, chemistry, biology, etc., but all these sciences are but segments of a circle, parts of one great science—the science of the universe. All the sciences being related, there can be no complete knowledge of any without thorough knowledge of all.

BEAN FORCE.

Anatomists, when they wish to separate the bones of a skull, sometimes resort to a very peculiar procedure. They fill the skull with small beans and place it in a vessel of water. The beans swell and rend the skull apart. The well known German Physiologist, Grehaut, measured the force which the beans are capable of exerting under these conditions, and found that it indicated five atmospheres, equal to the average pressure in the boiler of a steam engine.

GETTING OLD.

Some old people never pretend to stay in bed all night. They get up fully half a dozen times and go wandering around with lights in their hands, looking for the origin of the noises, to see what time it is and on a half dozen other pretexts. If you feel like wandering around the house at night with your night clothes flapping around your knees, it is an indication you are not as young as you used to be.

VETCH.

It has lately been pointed out that man, after all, is not the only animal who indulges in stimulants. Certain animals also indulge themselves in this manner with fatal results, the vehicle of intoxication in the case of the lower order of beings being a creeping vetch called the "loco plant." This is an inhabitant of the "Texan Panhandle" and is a source of serious danger to horses and cattle. To them it has all the allurements which are possessed by absinthe and gin for beings of another grade, only the results of the vetch are more definitely fatal even when taken in moderate measures. Animals who have tasted of it are liable to fall over backwards, their brains being affected as well as their spinal cords. They leap heights in their frenzy and dash down precipices. No rider of a horse who has thus been intoxicated is in a safe position.

PURE AIR.

The eyes will bear a high temperature up to a certain limit, but above that the difference is very marked. For instance, workers in smelting houses can look at the molten metal without trouble until it reaches 2,000 degrees Fahrenheit, but above that they are obliged to wear colored glasses.

A Hungarian hygienist has been collecting statistics in regard to the life of dwellers on various levels. He finds that those whose occupations or poverty requires them to live in cellars die first, as might readily be supposed; next come those who live on the third or fourth floor; next those on the ground floor, while the tenants of the first or second floors enjoy the longest period of existence. The purer air of the upper stories is overbalanced by the exertion of climbing the stairs, the average being a little over two years' earlier death.

REICHENBACH'S DISCOVERY.

The discoveries of Baron Reichenbach opened a new field for investigation. He found that around every substance in nature there was a peculiar aura, or atmosphere. It will be found that this surrounding atmosphere is the means by which the properties and even the existence of bodies may be known It has been a favorite idea with certain philosophers that all things are ideal and subjective only, and that unless we can think of them, they do not exist. This is undoubtedly carrying the matter too far, while on the other hand, the materialist, who believes that we only know of the existence of bodies by actual contact, may be quite as far from the truth.

The valuable discoveries in psychometry made by Dr. Buchanan and others confirm the idea that it is the aura around bodies that gives us the idea, not only of their existence, but in many cases of their qualities and properties. The doctor placed substances in closely stopped glass bottles, and without giving the sensitive person any idea of what they contained, not even knowing himself sometimes what he was experimenting with, he found that if they held the bottles in their hands the specific effect of the articles was produced, and the individual was often not only able to describe the effects, but give the name of the article. Novelists have already made the public familiar with the idea of automatons turned into living beings, and doctors have of late made many clever transfers of blood and flesh and skin.

ARTIFICIAL BODY.

It appears that the work of making an artificial human body can be carried on by purely mechanical means. A process has actually been patented in Germany for making a substitute for the natural skin for use in wounds. The muscular coating of the intestines of animals is divested of mucus membrane and then treated in a pepsin solution until the muscular fibers are half digested. After a second treatment with tannin and gallic acid a tissue is produced which can take the place of the natural skin, and which, when laid on the wound, is entirely absorbed during the healing process. Thus nature works upward through difficulties which appear unsurmountable to us. Vitality manifests its presence everywhere and always accompanied by intelligence.

As the world advances physically, mind advances; and the "power of mind over matter" becomes more palpable. To do increases the capacity of doing; and it is far less difficult for a man who is in an habitual course of exertion to exert himself a little more for an extra purpose than for the man who does little or nothing to put himself into motion for the same end. This is owing to a principle of our moral nature, which is called the vis inertia—literally the strength of inactivity. To set a common child's hoop rolling requires a smarter stroke at starting than to keep it in motion afterward. There is a reluctance in all things to be set moving; but, when all is over, everything proceeds smoothly enough. Just so it is with the idle man. In losing the habit he loses the power of doing; but a man who is busy about some regular employment for a proper length of time every day can very easily do something else during the remaining hours; indeed, the recreation of the weary man is apt to be busier than the perpetual leisure of the idle man.

MIND BUILDING.

Dr. S. Millington Miller of New York, a well-known writer on physiological psychology, delivered a lecture before the Educational club at the normal school on "Mind-Building by Sense Development." Dr. Miller said, in part, that the energizing principle that acts through the organs of sense is what is known as life, or thought, or mentality, whose principal habitation is the brain. A series of experiments recently conducted by Colonel de Rochas, the head of the Paris Polytechnic school, showed that the human brain is a burning fire, whose luminous effluvium escapes through the eyes, ears, nose and mouth into the surrounding atmosphere, filling the air for a circle of some 15 or 20 feet with a mild, hazy light. By means of hypnotic subjects it has been shown that the effluvium is sentiment, and, if a glass of water is pinched with the fingers, the hypnotized giver of the light or life complains of pain. De Rochas has it that life or light is a uniform and stable quantity. Turning to the senses; the lecture said the mutual aid society of the senses is now a well-established fact—the blind see with their fingers, the deaf hear with their eyes, the deaf and dumb and blind see and feel and hear with their fingers, or see and hear through the sense of smell..

The meaning of all this is that the vital essence is a uniform quantity and when any sense is diseased or defective it throws enough of its power into another sense to enable it to play a double function.

—CARL SEXTUS.

STAR OF TRUTH.

Oh, Star of Truth, Thou who didst shine of old,
To guide the wise men of the East,
And by thy glorious light foretold
The advent of that blessed one, whose holy life increased
The love divine in all men's hearts,
Lead thou us on.

Oh, Star of Truth, thou shining star,
So safe a guide for all men's souls to heed,
Show unto us thy light afar,
And lead us to that pasture where doth feed
Those who have found the light of endless day.

Oh, Star of Truth, Thou whose ever-mighty power
Comes with the force of Nature's unresisting strength,
Convincing and converting, every hour,
Strong minds to see thy quiet graces, and at length
To follow where thy holy light doth lead us on.

Oh, Truth, that star of hope, that light,
To which all upward tending minds do cling,
And which alone can give the blinded eyes that sight
Which looketh inward, to the soul; which flings
From off its shoulders superstition's binding robes,
And lets the soul go free.

Oh, Spirit of Truth, which God hath sent to clear
And banish every fear and sorrow from the soul—
Come dwell within our hearts, and let thy charming graces cheer
And give to man that wisdom which adown the ages rolls,
Since thou didst guide the Magi to the birthplace of the blest.

FREETHOUGHT BATTLE-HYMN

A Poem by Miss May L. Collins.

READ BEFORE THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

To be at rest? Ah! rest means emptiness,
Within these days when hearts are crushed by gold.
In Nature's realm all things that bud and blossom
Are daily throwing off the old.
No hope, no plans, no dreams nor tender fancies in it.
E'er sprung from minds contented with their lot.
The soldier-rebels in the world's great battles
Have chosen for their motto, "I will not."

The restless wave that chants a strain of music,
And brighter grows within the morning sun;
The onward swimmer up the stream of progress,
Can each proclaim a battle fought and won.
And, as in Nature's universal anthem,
No note, however sweet, is sounded o'er,
So in the broad domain of human thinking
Old ideas vanish to be known no more,

Behold the mountain peak of high endeavor,
The many golden blessings centered there!
Think not her upward paths are strewn with daisies,
With seraphs gliding past thee everywhere.
Nay, in thine own hand is the sounding anvil
That shapes each separate stroke, each tone of voice,
In cutting paths for weary feet to travel,
That others coming after may rejoice.

The way to truth is hard; the road is rugged;
Strange crevices, high cliffs and rocky shoals,
Like dread avengers, lurid flames of envy,
Heed not the anxious cry of struggling souls;
But ever widening, ever gaping sorrow,
Temptations, snares, the warrior's thirst for blood
Play havoc in the human heart's upheavals,
Poisoning the fount of everlasting good.

And from the passion-depths of bygone ages
The echoes of remorse sound far and wide;
The restless fountain of the past is singing
Of wasted opportunities that rise and glide
Like threatening phantoms down the aisle of yearning,
And tinge each burning hope with vain belief;
The throes of agitation, growing stronger,
Rush in a mighty stream and seek relief.

To cleanse anew the fount of human feeling,
To purge each drop of all its ill resource,
By that same law that garners autumn's fruitage
And guides the stately planets in their course;
This is the grand intent of evolution—
A purpose that will conquer, come what may,
Though eager incense, seeking Heaven's portals,
Attempts to check the current on its way.

So do not quell the inward impulse rising
That chills thy longing with a vague unrest,
Or thoughts that, surging in a mighty tempest,
Crowd one another in a loud protest:
Nor seek to stay the crimson, pulsing life-tide
That swells triumphant in thy bosom now;
Inertia is the bane of all true progress,
Nor bears no mighty import on its brow.

The mighty force of Nature's restless torrent
Is felt in every root and shrub and wayside thorn.
The oak draws in the air, solidifies it;
The violet, trembling with the touch of morn,
Brings forth the vital germs, that, terminating
In beauteous buds, bear honey for the bees;
The atom, bleaching white within the tropics,
Another year may flow in Arctic seas.

The tiny pebbles, drifting from the northward,
Bear with them shreds of underlying clay;
The mountain is a standing reminiscence,
Replete with relics of a bygone day:
A day when beasts and reptiles thronged its thickets,
The danger signal to a dawning race!
Primeval man, perplexed by fear and passion,
Bore all the savage instincts in his face.

As, in the ceaseless turmoil of the ages,
The water, freezing fast on Iceland's plain,
Is checked by currents from the warmer regions,
That living creatures may subsistence gain,
So in the realm of thought, the field of action,
Incentives base, that would the mind deform,
Are alternated by an upward striving,
Like gleams of lightning in a thunder-storm.

So, onward, then, each tiny impulse budding,
Each aspiration groping for the light;
Though half obscured by mists and partial vision,
Yet luminates the darkness of the night;
And from the leaden eaves of pain and sorrow
Great tears flow down to christen on their way,
Each honest aim that, clothed in simple candor,
Holds all the universe within its sway.

Oh! restless sea of life's progressive rhythm,
That makes mad music in my fervent youth,
When will thy dimpling billows surge around me,
Thou sempiternal dwelling place of truth?
My heart is panting for the liquid fuel
That circulates so freely in thy breast;
Thy trilling wavelets, fluid gems, that, cooing,
Bear momentary ripples on their crest.

Athwart the fleecy clouds the sunbeams, breaking
In mantling gold, are harbingers of morn;
A morning lit with promise for the lowly
Who, treading paths of obloquy and scorn,
Heed not undying truth's majestic warning
That cradles in its depths the joyous chime
Of freedom's song, and in a sweet crescendo
Keeps steady, animated beat with time.

And as a change of temperature, approaching,
Beats back the rapid current of the wind,
So will the march of truth chase every phantom
That clouds the inner chambers of the mind:
And wrestling bravely with life's fitful fever,
A sweet impatience chilling all our blood,
Oh! may we count one step securely planted
That upward leads to everlasting good!

THE WORK WE HAVE TO DO.

Address by Samuel P. Putnam at the Opening Session of the Congress of Freethinkers, Chicago, Nov. 13, 1896.

The work of Freethought is necessary to the civilization of the human race. We stand for liberty. To achieve liberty has been the struggle of the ages. It is that which has made glorious the pages of human history. The victories of liberty have been the victories of science and progress. Liberty is the sole condition of human advancement. Without liberty there is no shining truth for man; there is no purpose, no character, no crown, no attainment of the good and beautiful. Slavery is allied with ignorance, with superstition, with degradation, with vice and crime. What is more noble than a free human being? What is more miserable than a human being in prison and in chains?

The fall of the Bastile! What a triumph that was of human civilization! What a mighty step in human progress. It was, however, but a step. It was but one luminous gain in the long and toilsome pathway of man. Our American Republic in its beginning was a wonderful outburst of freedom; and yet today in this Republic we are threatened with tyranny and superstition. It is our work to place the Republic on its original foundations; to anchor it to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. We have been drifting away from these principles; we are repeating again the errors of the past. What we oppose is not religion in itself, but the union of religion with the State. This has been one of the greatest curses in the world's history and has caused more war and bloodshed than any other evil. It is our work to avoid this evil for the American Republic. The exemption of church property from taxation, the Bible in the schools, the enforcement of Sabbath laws—these are instances of the degeneration of our government. A great conflict is before us. A powerful effort is now being made for the enthronement of Christianity in the Constitution. A vast number of petitions are circulating throughout the country in behalf of this Christian amendment. The issue is direct and we must meet it by every means in our power.

Our platform is universal. No true American can oppose it. It is not a question of doctrine, of philosophy or a theory of science. We may differ in regard to these things. We do not undertake to settle the problem of the universe. We cannot solve the mysteries of death. We do not enter the world of speculation. We stand upon fundamental and unquestionable principles. We stand for human freedom and the rights of man. We admit the vast importance and profound interest of other questions. The human mind will forever inquire into the secrets of existence. Are we immortal or not is a perpetual question. What is the purpose of the universe? What is its meaning? These are the eternal interrogations of intelligent existence. Truth is endless. Science is forever unfolding the riches of the cosmos. But what can we do in any direction without freedom? Freedom is not the end; it is the means. It is the only path of knowledge. All the faculties must be alert. There must be no trammels on the vision or the reason. We must see all there is to see. We must have no fear. We must be hemmed in by no custom, and by no prejudice. We must have a broad outlook. We must be true to ourselves. We must have the opportunity to speak our honest thoughts; to do our best work. Without liberty there is no life. Without life what is there of happiness, of morality, of achievement for mankind. Without liberty, art, science and literature die. There are no fountains of poetry, no realms of ever fresh and inspiring truth. The stars shine in vain, the flowers bloom for naught, the glory of nature vanishes. To the mind in servitude all is dark and terrible; there is no motive to sublime action.

Let us realize the greatness of our work, and that we have a noble and a splendid mission. On this we can unite whatever may be our varying beliefs. In this we find a perfect human brotherhood. Our flag is the same floating over the camp of every reformer. It is the one true flag to which every true man and woman must be loyal. All differences are lost in this one tremendous and vital question. We must work for the rights of man; to give to each human being the same rights which we claim for ourselves.

This struggle is world-wide. In Europe and America the battle still goes on. In this immense conflict we join hands with our friends across the sea. The lines of freethought extend around the world. The flag of liberty is upon every shore. This will give us hope and courage. The solidarity of freethought is one of its noblest inspirations. Freethought is not something new. It is as old as human genius itself. Wherever has been living thought there must be the spirit of liberty. Thought must be the child of liberty. It can flow into action only through the chainless mind.

We work for freedom. We work for justice. We work for human brotherhood and human advancement. We build upon the foundations of eternal right. We labor not to divide but to unite the human race. There can be no union except by equality of rights. We do not war upon religion. Let religion be free is what we ask. Let it depend upon reason, upon science and education, but not upon the sword of the State. Let it do what good it can by the consent of mankind. For religion to use force is to destroy its beneficence.

Let us search for truth always. Let each follow the dictates of his own reason. Let us penetrate into every path possible to the human mind. Let us search the heavens and the earth. Let us rejoice in sunbeam and star-beam, in the multitudinous glories of nature, the wealth of air and land and sea. Let us exult in the sublime activities of intellectual toil. Let us become illustrious in character and knowledge, but for all these things let us be free, honest, sincere, truthful, fearless and emancipated. Freedom in humanity is the law of its ceaseless growth.

IMPORTANT WORK.

Studies in the Outlying Fields of Psychic Science.

A WORK BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

WITH FULL DIRECTIONS HOW TO INVESTIGATE SPIRITUALISM, DEVELOP MEDIUMSHIP, AND FOR THE FORMATION OF HOME CIRCLES.

This second edition, with important additions, is the second effort in the New Departure of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. It is a book which marked an era in the methods of thought on psychic subjects. It was first to take this hitherto unexplored realm, and its treatment is entirely original. It outlined a plan of study and investigation, which, new as the subject was, appears to be the only one the student can pursue, to arrive at satisfactory results.

A great many psychic clubs and reading circles have adopted it as a guide, and one college has taken it as a text book. In its field it stands alone, and is the student's only helpful manual.

Since the author wrote the "Arcana of Nature," by almost purely automatic controls, his inspiration has made no higher flight than in "Psychic Science."

Price Reduced About One-Half.

In our New Departure, determined to give Spiritualists—instead of the dearest, as hitherto—the cheapest literature of any denomination, sect or organization, we have not only enlarged the book by twenty pages, but reduced the price from $1.25 to 75 cents.

A wealthy Spiritualist purchased copies at full price and presented one to every college and academy in the New England States. We have reduced the price until no one will be prevented from possessing it, or deterred, for want of means, from sending it forth on missionary duty.

Woman, Church and State.

A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages, with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate.

BY MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE.

THE AMOUNT OF VALUABLE INFORMATION succinctly and clearly stated in this volume of 554 pages is amazing. The title, as above given, fails to convey an idea of the fulness and completeness with which the subjects are treated. The Matriarchate, or Mother-rule, is the theme of the first chapter, in which much lore, quaint, queer and curious, is brought to view in elucidation of the subject. This is followed by chapters on Celibacy, Canon Law, Marquette, Witchcraft, Wives, Polygamy, Woman and Work, The Church of To-day, Past, Present, Future; and there is not a chapter in the book that is not handled in a masterly manner, and that for quantity and quality of information, is not worth the full price of the volume. It is packed with knowledge well-arranged, and intensely interesting from beginning to end. No one can possibly regret buying it; it is a valuable addition to the library of any free and truth-loving mind.

Price, $2.00. For sale at this office.

ROMANISM AND THE REPUBLIC.

A WORK THAT EVERY LOVER OF his country should have at hand for consultation. By Rev. Isaac J. Lansing, M. A. This is a most able work, consisting of a Discussion of the Purposes, Assumptions, Principles and Methods of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy. The work contains 447 pages, and may be considered a mine of valuable information for every patriot in the land. Price $1. For sale at this office.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will be furnished until further notice, at the following terms, invariably in advance:

One year	$1.00
Clubs of ten (a copy to the one getting up the club)	7.50
Thirteen weeks	25 cts
Single copy	5 cts

REMITTANCES.

Remit by Postoffice Money Order, Registered Letter, or draft on Chicago or New York. It costs from 10 to 15 cents to get checks cashed on local banks, so don't send them unless you wish that amount deducted from the amount sent. Direct all letters to J. R. Francis, No. 40 Loomis Street, Chicago, Ill.

CLUBS! IMPORTANT SUGGESTION!

As there are thousands who will at first venture only twenty-five cents for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER thirteen weeks, we would suggest to those who receive a sample copy, to solicit several others to unite with them, and thus be able to remit from $1 to $10, or even more than the latter sum A large number of little amounts will make a large sum total, and thus extend the field of our labor and usefulness. The same suggestion will apply in all cases of renewal of subscriptions—solicit others to aid in the good work. You will experience no difficulty whatever in inducing Spiritualists to subscribe for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, for not one of them can afford to be without the valuable information imparted therein each week, and at the price of only about two cents per week

A Bountiful Harvest for 25 Cents.

Do you want a more bountiful harvest than we can give you for 25 cents? Just pause and think for a moment what an intellectual feast that small investment will furnish you. The subscription price of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER thirteen weeks is only twenty-five cents! For that amount you obtain one hundred and four pages of solid, substantial, soul-elevating and mind-refreshing reading matter, equivalent to a medium-sized book!

☞ At expiration of subscription, if not renewed, the paper is discontinued No bills will be sent for extra numbers.

☞ If you do not receive your paper promptly, write to us, and errors in address will be promptly corrected, and missing numbers supplied gratis.

☞ Whenever you desire the address of your paper changed, always give the address of the place to which it is then sent, or the change cannot be made.

SATURDAY, NOV. 28, 1896.

The Autumnal Holiday.

Some facts in regard to Thanksgiving Day, well known to the writer, probably mostly unknown to the great mass of readers, will be interesting at this time. It is presumed most of those connected with the public press of to-day have no information on the subject. Prior to about 1850 proclamations directing the observance of a Thanksgiving day were only issued by the Governors of the respective States, without any concerted action, hence they were scattered all along through October and November. Persons passing from one State into another at that season of the year were frequently greatly inconvenienced by finding places of business closed which they had traveled long distances to visit.

L. A. Godey, Philadelphia, of Godey's Lady's Book, undertook, about the time mentioned, to correct the evil, and make the day uniform throughout the nation. To that end, besides calling attention to the fact in a leading article in his magazine, he wrote personal letters to the several Governors, asking each to fix on a certain day in each year which should be devoted to thanksgiving. He suggested the last Thursday in November as one which would probably be at the close of the harvest in all the States. A goodly number of Governors the first year accepted the solicitation in the spirit in which it was offered, and directed the festival accordingly. By the third year all fell into line, and by universal assent the last Thursday in November is now devoted to general rejoicing.

It appears President Washington issued one or two Thanksgiving proclamations. Jefferson was importuned to designate a day of thanks, but he declined, giving as a reason: "Ours is a secular government, and it has no business to interfere in religious matters." In 1863 President Lincoln, without any authority of law, issued a Thanksgiving proclamation, and all the subsequent Presidents have followed his example. Save an act making Thanksgiving Day a legal holiday, we believe there has been no legislation by Congress on the subject.

The day seems to have had its origin in New England, though its parallel is found in the harvest-home of olden times.

Theology Unrelated to Veracity.

The London Truth discourses very earnestly in regard to the "stupid questioning" of children who are called upon to tell the truth in courts of justice. Many is the time the little innocents have been coached before appearing on the witness-stand, and instructed to answer to the question:

"What will become of you if you tell a lie while under oath?"

"I'll go to hell, sir!"

Such a reply always brings down the court with the judicial decision: "The witness is competent; let him be sworn."

But here is the Truth's opinion:

"In India a child is allowed to give evidence without any foolish and stupid questioning on the subject of his religious training or belief. The only matter the magistrate considers is whether the child is of sufficient intelligence to observe correctly the sort of facts about which his testimony is required. In India children, even without the sanction of an oath, are found to be the most truthful of witnesses. Here, also, the same thing may be said, and it is ridiculous in the extreme that recorders and magistrates should make the admissibility of a child's evidence dependent upon the question whether his head has been crammed with a certain amount of theological knowledge."

Razed Hell Out of the Creed.

As an earnest or indication of evolution in the Christian church, Dr. Withrow's congregation have discarded or dropped hell out of their "apostle's creed," omitting the words, "He descended into hell."

Dr. Withrow, in announcing this, said that it was the wish of the majority of the church, and explained that in this sense the word hell meant the place of departed spirits, but his views upon this point were very vague. If the reverend gentleman could devote a little time from his fossilized creed, and investigate the truths of Spiritualism, he might learn more about this abode of the spirits of the departed, and how they continue to progress even after

"They have found the blessed islands where earth's toils and sorrows cease;
Tho' they wear the sacred lotus, and have entered into peace."

Impious Bicycles.

The Epworth Leaguers, in session at Kewance, Ill., the other day, decided it is wrong to ride the bicycle on Sunday. It is stated one hundred leaguers were in attendance, all of whom will hereafter walk on Sunday. Was Balaam's donkey in that vicinity on the occasion referred to?

Criticism from Over the Ocean.

Rev. Charles Voysey, we believe, of the Church of England, has just published a work entitled, "The Testimony of the Four Gospels Concerning Jesus Christ." The book has not come into our hands, but the review of it in the Literary Guide, London, for November, is on our table. Those who do not like criticisms on what passes for the teachings of Jesus, and who are ever lauding what professes to come from that distinguished personage, will be surprised to see what radical views are now tolerated by the leading Protestant church of the world, at the head of which, in fact, is the Queen of England. We reproduce a single paragraph, as quoted by the Guide:

"I have no hesitation in saying that I disbelieve Jesus Christ said certain words ascribed to him in the Gospels; not on the ground that they are merely bad, but on the ground that they are so very bad no ordinary person, much less a professed teacher of religion, could possibly have uttered them. As examples of these outrageously impossible utterances are those wherein Jesus says he speaks to the common people to mislead them, and prevent their repentance and conversion; and that other passage in which he affirms the express purpose of his coming was not to bring peace, but a sword—was to set fathers and mothers against their children, and children against their parents, and to sow strife in the home. I only disbelieve Jesus Christ said such things because they are too bad to impute to any human being."

Without quoting verbatim further Mr. Voysey takes exception to what is called the Lord's Prayer, and says the "Ask, and it shall be given you," if practically true, "no greater calamity could befall us than be able by prayer to get our own way."

Mr. Voysey alleges with truth that Jesus heartlessly left his parents to seek for him three days; he lived on alms; he threatened reluctant cities with Gehenna; he was egotistical in his references to his own importance; he spoke rudely to persons who treated him politely; he violated the rights of property; he snubbed his kinsfolk; his transfiguration encouraged gross materialism; he needlessly interfered with the temple traders; he favored an abusive style of polemic; he blasphemed, and, says the preacher, extended his gloomy catalogue to a yet greater length.

But the English divine did not stop with these numerous counts in his indictment. He enumerated six meritorious points in the teachings of Jesus, but alleged "five of them are systematically neglected by his professed disciples."

There is hope for the world when the pulpit is free to express its honest thoughts.

Forged Books and Coin.

Robert Hooke, M. D., in his Posthumous Works, published in 1705, quotes from a Discourse on Earthquakes, written in 1668 by himself, wherein he shows that Prof. Edwin Johnson, and the Frenchman, Hardouin, were not alone in the opinion that forgers have made the old-time books which grace our libraries. Hooke was a great mathematician and natural philosopher. He was discoursing on the changes in the organic and the inorganic kingdoms of nature. He says:

"However trivial a thing a rotten shell may appear to some, yet these monuments of nature are more certain tokens of antiquity than coins or medals, since the best of those may be counterfeited, or made by art and design, as may also books, manuscripts, and inscriptions, as all the learned are now sufficiently satisfied has often been actually practiced."—From lecture February 29, 1688.

Another Liberal Paper.

The Liberals of Oregon have just established a new paper, at Silverton, with the title "Torch of Reason." Through the kindness of our occasional contributor, Dr. S. C. Adams, a copy is before us. It is published under the auspices of the Oregon State Secular Union, and is under the editorial management of Prof. J. E. Hosmer, of the Liberal University. As a means of communication between the thinkers of the State the paper will be invaluable, and should be generously sustained. We wish it success, a long life, and an abundance of advance-paying subscribers.

New University in Oregon.

The Torch of Reason says the Liberals of Oregon have just established the Liberal University at Silverton, with a board of regents, and faculty, wherein a full academic, normal, collegiate and scientific course, including law, will be taught. It is proposed at an early day to add an industrial department. The officers announce that instruction will be nonsectarian, and that only facts will be taught in the university. Such an institution of learning deserves encouragement. It is the first of its class, and it will be a blessing to the race. Long may it wave.

Causes for Thankfulness.

It is said by scholars that there is a manuscript which the Dutch have preserved at Hague, showing that the New Yorkers, in 1644, marched to Greenwich, Conn., where they shot or burned alive from 500 to 600 Indians, including women and children. They then marched back to New York and sat down to a Thanksgiving dinner. This equals the Pope ordering a Te Deum to be sung when he learned of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, wherein from 30,000 to 70,000 Protestants were slaughtered, commencing in Paris, August 22, 1572.

Seen from a more civilized standpoint, both of these occasions were causes for grief, not joy; for humiliation, not for praise; and yet they were both Christian acts fully endorsed by the church at the time.

Sunday Fanatics.

The Wisconsin Sunday Rest Association, in annual session at Janesville, on the 13th inst., took high grounds against Sunday desecration. The practice of buying meat on Sunday, reading Sunday newspapers, patronizing the postoffice, and riding and walking for pleasure on Sunday, were denounced in severe terms.

For all that class of saints, quite too good for this wicked earth, translation to a purer and better world is desirable.

When my friends are blind of one eye, I look at them in profile.—Joubert.

To be proud of learning is the greatest ignorance.—Bishop Taylor.

Mrs. Whitney's Gifts.

The Spiritualists and seekers after truth in Boston and vicinity must have been greatly moved by the presence and outspokenness of Mrs. J. J. Whitney, before the Boston Spiritual Temple, at Berkeley Hall. Mr. Saulsbury, her control, refuses to give tests (in any great measure) to the Spiritualists—preferring skeptics and strangers for his work.

Mrs. Whitney gives the name of the spirit in full; the manner of passing out, and who is with them in spirit; calls the name of the person the spirit is seeking, and tells incidents in life that it would be impossible for the medium to know. She is dignified, and has a fine stage address; her voice will fill the largest hall.

Among the tests given on the occasion to which we refer, was an intelligence who gave the name of Jane Tilton. Mrs. Whitney saw this lady. The spirit wants to talk to her daughter Etta. The woman responded. Mrs. W. said: "Your mother passed out suddenly, while doing some needle-work, and your father has this piece of work framed." Then she said: "If I was to describe your mother as she is in spirit you would not recognize her. Your mother shows me her hands. She was born with only one hand, but in spirit she has both." The lady was so overcome with surprise that she could scarcely speak. She said she had never seen Mrs. Whitney before, and that every word she said was true. It made her very happy, for she says all doubts of her dear mother's return were settled beyond question, as no one knew of her mother being born with only one hand.

This is only one of the many wonderful tests given. If there were more mediums like Mrs. Whitney, it would not take long to convince all skeptics.

Mrs. Abbie Sheets, of Michigan, was the speaker. She is a fluent orator, and one of the best.

The Concannons are drawing crowds at Ayer's Temple. So the good work goes on, and Boston is favored this month with these good workers.—William J. Fields, in Banner of Light, Boston.

The Premium Encyclopædia.

Several weeks ago we withdrew our offer to send the Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World to new three months' subscribers. We have been at great expense in sending out this premium, knowing that thousands of Spiritualists would want it without any intention whatever of becoming permanent subscribers to THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, for, as a rule, they take no Spiritualist paper. But the inducement of getting a 400-page book, worth fifty cents, and the paper also for three months, all for twenty-five cents, brought them temporarily to the front. The great good that the thousands of copies distributed will do, compensates us for the great expense we have been to in this direction, in endeavoring to illuminate the minds of those who do not choose to patronize the Spiritualist papers.

We still have a few hundred volumes on hand of this "Vol. I" of the Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, in paper cover, which we will send to all new six months' subscribers, and also to each of our present subscribers who renews for not less than six months, and who sends us at the same time one new six months' subscriber.

It is far better for the new subscriber to take the paper for six months, for, during that time he will begin to see the necessity of continuing it.

☞ Take notice that the above offer will be withdrawn after November 28.

Stone Forests.

The stone forests of Arizona are wonders to those not versed in geology. Giant trees, many feet in diameter, completely silicified, standing erect as they grew, though mostly buried in sand, are met with by the traveler in certain localities, and always fill him with amazement. Those forests of stone tell their own story. They germinated and grew to their great dimensions as forests are still produced. The regions in which they are found must have gone down, and remained for thousands, more probably millions of years; then Nature in some of her great throes uplifted the bed of the ocean and left barren deserts of sand. The rains and floods have gradually washed away the debris and left those trees eternal monuments of the processes of change which old Time employs in his wonderful workshop. The Popular Science Monthly, discoursing on the stone forest of Florissant, Arizona, says:

"The silicified trees of the Florissant basin are a marked curiosity in the United States. They are less known than the stone forests of Arizona or than the similar mausoleum of the Yellowstone region, but it is only because they have not yet been brought to the attention of the tourist. The trees are at the present time represented only by their stumps. In wandering over the green meadow the eye here and there rests upon a seemingly 'bald' spot. Over it are scattered white and yellow chips, and, for anything the eye can itself distinguish, these could easily be the chips left in the path of work of a recently passing woodman. The deception is absolute, and it belongs to the stump as well. The knots and gnarls and annular rings are perfectly preserved; the bark stands in prominent relief both by ruggedness and color, and all this not in wood, but in the monumental substance of stone. The precise manner in which the substitution of silica for wood was effected cannot now be learned, but in a general way we know it to have been brought about as a result of slow infiltration into the tree trunks of heated waters containing silica in solution.

"The remains are fairly numerous, but what strikes one with special astonishment is the giant size which some of them attain. Diameters of 6, 7 and 8 feet are by no means uncommon; and we measured three specimens which spanned 10 feet or more. In most instances the stumps hardly rise above the surface, coming up flush with it; therefore, without excavation, it is impossible to say at what height above the roots the measurements were taken."

An Ironical Fact.

Col. P. Donan, the editor of the "Utahnian," published at Salt Lake, says there is a barbarian province where one gentleman kills another on Sunday; that he is fined one dollar for a violation of the ordinance against the discharge of firearms on the holy Sabbath, on the payment of which he is set free. That "barbarian province" is said to be Missouri.

A Worthy Sentiment.

"I shall pass through this life but once. If there is any good I can do my fellows it must be now, for the opportunity will never occur again," is credited to a Quaker, but it is good enough to come from Col. Ingersoll, with whom we think it originated.

A NEW PROGRAMME.

Three Excellent Books Furnished at Cost.

The Progressive Thinker is published not alone to promote the prosperity of its editor and publisher, but it has the welfare of its numerous subscribers at heart. With that end in view we put the price of the paper at one dollar per year, and during these hard times we have been able to maintain it at that price, without begging for assistance or without having debts or obligations to accumulate to harass us. Our main object is to promote the interests of Spiritualism; to make each family feel that its members are enriched in mind and spirituality by the presence of The Progressive Thinker. And in order to continue in a measure that status, we have changed our programme somewhat.

We have just published a remarkable book, the title of which is "The Next World Interviewed." It is intensely interesting and instructive, and should be in every family. Hon. Arthur MacArthur, at one time Judge of the Supreme Court, thus speaks of the work:

"The Next World Interviewed," by Mrs. S. G. Horn, is a book of power and interest to all those who are inclined to the study of spiritual phenomena, or who desire to know something about the sublime teachings that come from supernatural intercourse. The revelations are of such an extraordinary character that the attention is not only attracted by the nature of the communications, but the mind is filled with amazement at the range of thought and the grand views that are presented of the invisible life.

The communications are varied according to the character of the communicator, and each relates an experience of his own. For instance, the poet Longfellow, when the lethargy, that for a few seconds had enthralled his senses, had passed away, heard a great chorus of voices singing words taken from his own Psalm of Life. De Quincey finds that the splendors in the visions of an opium eater grow pale before the transcendent realities that open to a spirit's sight in the Land of Souls, and Darwin affirms that could he have lived an hundred years longer, he would have been able to demonstrate the evolution of an angel from a man.

The book is composed of communications received through the mediumship of Mrs. Horn, while in a trance condition, and reveal the influence of a high order of spirit intelligence on every page. The scenes described and the vivid spectacle of the Heavenly life are full of grandeur, and recall the highest passages in our best poetry.

Nothing can be finer than the description of the homes of our departed friends. The life of usefulness they lead is very different from the current views on that subject. Instead of the supposed indolence of Spirit-life, each one is constantly employed in some work of self-improvement, or in some effort for the general good.

Titian paints in his spirit-home among the stars, where he has a studio, and his splendid color realizes the ideal in that land of love and beauty; the patriot soul of Lincoln loves and watches over the country for which he lost his life, and John Stuart Mill, who could find no proof of any life but this on earth, reveals the undying principle stamped upon his spirit that renders him immortal.

Indeed, throughout all these wonderful sketches, the mind realizes the full grandeur of its own destiny, and the great future in which it is to live forever. Scenes of surpassing loveliness and a boundless prospect of man's activities are disclosed in this new sphere of existence, and one cannot but feel that he is reading messages of plain and honest truth from those who speak, and know and see what they relate.

It is an animating thought that springs up in the mind on the perusal of this book. The beauties of life in the world of spirit are laid open to our gaze and the various changes that are wrought in the views and opinions that were entertained on earth by the greatest thinkers, show how far knowledge and science have been from grasping the laws of the spiritual spheres, and how much grander existence is when it becomes immortal. The humble and great often reverse positions, and the inequalities of earth conditions are rectified by a just and equitable balance, that has for its foundation the work and worth that have marked the life of each member of the human family. Let these pages be read with candor, and skepticism and atheism would be converted into belief, and a devotional sense of reverence and joy would take the place of hesitation; and even the professed Christian will find his doubts of the future swept away, and his views of the everlasting goodness of God corroborated by the most infallible assurances.

There is no phase of philosophical hesitation or indifference but what would be startled by this mighty blazon of the unknown and invisible universe, and if the devotees of science would read and ponder these marvelous pages, their disdain would be turned into awe and admiration at the grand world of life and wisdom which they reveal. The soul who can contemplate these messages of love and truth without emotion is not in a condition to receive the proof of one who should rise from the grave to testify to the same things, for there is an air of reality and naturalness that attracts the common feelings of our better self against all the suggestions of prejudice or tradition. The world of sense is confronted with the direct revelation of a higher form of life. Those who have lived great lives here below come back to inform us of their experience there, and to give us the assurance of their great souls that they still live, and that the world of spirit is as real as this one; they give their names, they state their views, they relate the facts, all in perfect conformity with their individual gifts and peculiarities, and call upon their friends who linger below to read and believe as if they stood with them face to face, after the manner of earthly intercourse, and this transcendent appeal is couched in terms so exquisite and appropriate as to show that only the wise, the gifted and the cultured ones are the authors of these divine passages. The philosopher, the poet, the man of letters, the orator, the statesman and the divine, the doubter, the religionist and the unbeliever unite in this grand testimonial of the eternal existence of the soul.

It is a noble array of genius, learning and character to the greatest and grandest truth that any of them had ever examined or proclaimed, and they now come from their glorious abode to communicate the glad tidings of immortality to all the children of men.

In conclusion we would say that the rare mediumistic gifts of Mrs. Horn are singularly free from every selfish or mercenary motive. She exercises them for the good of her friends, and scarcely ever appears in public work. Her gentle and lovely character is a testimony of the exalted nature of the intelligence that controls her, and of the purity and good faith of whatever appears in this volume.

The plates of the above remarkable book have been presented to us by Henry J. Horn, of Washington, D. C. One edition only had been issued, and it sold for $1.50 per copy. This book is published as "The Progressive Thinker Library," and is only one of a series to be published, to be furnished to our subscribers at a nominal cost. Just think, Spiritualists, of the great good that can be accomplished through the instrumentality of the plan!

"The Next World Interviewed" contains communications from many distinguished individuals, and they are, indeed, highly interesting and instructive. It is neatly bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and will be furnished to our patrons, post paid, for 35 cents a copy. That is, anyone sending a year's subscription for The Progressive Thinker can have the book at that price, 35 cents, postage paid.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes, containing an aggregate of 1050 pages, will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription, on the following terms:

The Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I of the Encyclopædia	$ .45
Vol. II of the Encyclopædia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

☞ Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

A PROGRAMME.

ENTIRELY NEW AND PRESENTED TO OUR MANY READERS.

The Freethinkers.

They have been in session at Indianapolis, Ind., and have done a most excellent work there. The spiritual side—the side of positive knowledge—recognized as spirit return—was ably represented by Mr. Woodbury, secretary of the National Association, and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, of this city. They constituted the spiritual leaven which had a most excellent effect on the "don't knows" who had congregated there.

Epigrammatic.

Somehow THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER cannot avoid the conviction that it is more important to know what is Truth, than to know what is popular. We live to know. When we cease to know we should cease to live.

A Word of Warning.

To the Editor:—I read in The Progressive Thinker, of November 14, of one Madam Forestyerna, an exponent of primitive Christianity through guides of the fourteenth century, platform test psychometrist, hypnotist and mind-reader, writing from Atlantic, Iowa, wanting to make engagements with societies. She is none other than Mrs. L. C. Carter, alias Anna Barton, M. D., spirit-artist, of Council Bluffs, Iowa, taking pictures from lock of hair, and who recently figured so conspicuously in the case of Dr. P. Paulson, of California, who once resided in Council Bluffs.

This madam has been pronounced by several societies as being demented. Our local society here in Lincoln would not care to be favored with her presence again. All Spiritualists should avoid this madam, as I consider her a dangerous one to have any dealings with whatever. She is of light complexion, sandy, faded hair, parted on side; age about 50 years old: not good dresser. Look out for her—fair warning. She "biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." Lincoln, Neb. Dr. P. S. George.

"Principles of Light and Color." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL.D. A truly great work of a master mind, and one whom Spiritualists should delight to honor. The result of years of deep thought and patient research into Nature's finer forces are here garnered and made amenable to the well-being of humanity. Medical men especially and scientists, general readers and students of occult forces will find instruction of great value and interest. A large, four-pound book, strongly bound, and containing beautiful illustrative plates. For sale at this office. Price, postpaid, $5. It is a wonderful work and you will be delighted with it.

"Human Culture and Cure. Part First. The Philosophy of Cure. (Including Methods and Instruments)." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL.D. A very instructive and valuable work. It should have a wide circulation, as it well fulfills the promise of its title. For sale at this office. Price, 75 cents.

"Social Upbuilding, Including Co-operative Systems and the Happiness and Ennoblement of Humanity." By E. D. Babbitt, LL. D., M. D. This comprises the last part of Human Culture and Cure. Paper cover, 15c. For sale at this office.

"Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism: or a Concordance of the Principal Passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism; together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible." By Moses Hull. The well-known talented and scholarly author has here embodied the results of his many years' study of the Bible in its relations to Spiritualism. As its title denotes, it is a veritable encyclopedia of information on the subject. Price $1. For sale at this office.

LAWS GOVERNING SPIRIT MANIFESTATIONS.

INTERCOMMUNION BETWEEN THE FIRST AND SECOND SPHERES.

By Mrs. C. E. Stevens, of San Francisco, Cal.

PART II.

At the birth of Christ, the law had been fulfilled, which from the time of Isaiah had been prophesied to come upon the earth in the form of a Messiah, who was to save the people from their sins. This child, born under strict laws of spirituality, that divine influence whose breath was so laden with the spirit of divinity as to have overshadowed the whole conception and filled its offspring from its birth with that principle so latent in every soul it is hard to be recognized, and yet is so necessary to immortal existence that the whole work of life here and hereafter is devoted to its creation in some form to be recognized, or in some way to be brought forth from the grave of materiality in which it has been heretofore shrouded. From the bodily birth to that of the spirit seems but a step, or the mind progresses in thought, and yet it is often the work of an ordinary lifetime even to open the eyes of the spiritually blind to admit the slightest glimmer of the light of truth. This being the case, Christ was crucified—denied all recognition.

Is it strange that his supposed followers of to-day, even, are looking for material good as their only hope of heaven? That churches must be built at any cost of truth, and often honesty, to send upon the future their materialistic strength, to endow the world with creeds and dogmas almost untranslatable, through sense and reason and belief of the only saving power from damnation in the future life. Such being the case, is there not absolute need of farther instruction in the teachings of Christ. "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief," has been the cry, but in seeking for bread have we not too often received but a stone and worse, even a serpent.

The blind have led the blind, and we have all been in danger of falling into a ditch from which we could never have found the means to extricate ourselves. The spiritual significations of these things have been tortured into everything but truth. The spiritually blind are not so unfrequent in common life as not to be known in the midst of churches, even, whose pillars they are, and often, too often, has some poor soul been found from whom all hope has been taken, from the very strength these emissaries of worldly belief have surely charged them, that nothing seemed before them but the hell and damnation predicted, because they could not believe the doctrine offered. Among these hungering ones, "Modern Spiritualism" came into the world as a new hope and afforded some pretext, at least, for belief in the resurrection of the body, likely to be understood, so that there is a spiritual as well as a natural body beginning to be realized. Test after test pronounced miraculous, or at least so far out of the common course as hardly to be dealt with in the usual manner, and one by one, tens by tens, and hundreds by hundreds of believers arise in the good cause, which is spreading all over the world, till even the churches open their slumbering eyes and admit into their teachings a little light, which is finally to enlighten the world. But still it is of evil, it is said, and the devil is still bruited by men given over to the belief in creeds, from which it is hard to extricate them, for having been so long acquainted with his Satanic majesty, they seem to be unwilling to rob him of his power in this way, and finally declare him the monarch of the whole. His majesty, as we have before said, has been too long the representative of ignorance not to be allowed still longer hold on the simple-minded, till at last the darkness is somewhat removed and the truth unveiled to light. Thus the rendering of the law in regard to the "modus operandi" of the connection of the spheres seems to us to be absolutely necessary to disabuse the enquiring mind of all evil, in its workings; to protect those who are suffering inquietude on the subject, and to avoid all danger of deception, which might ensue from an improper handling of the subject.

The avoidance of evil, in the midst of examination, can be controlled in a great measure by the understanding and proper application of law.

The law of attraction, the greatest law of the Universe, lies at the bottom of this, as well as of other law. It is the power that brings the worlds together in harmony, their spheres in harmony and their action together in harmony as well. This law of harmony must first be sought for in order that no disturbing element shall bring that element of all evil, inharmony, before described, in the formation of circles, with disorderly results. This, then, in the first place, each individual must forego personal desire, and look to the general result. Any spirit in this world may attract towards the circle any spirit he desires by the law of attraction, according to his thought, the quality of the spirits in the second sphere being attracted by the desire of the one asking for its influence. The custom of singing, as well as invocation, with many is supposed to assist in establishing harmony. Still, if there is but one person selfishly inclined, though not a word is said upon the subject, it helps to an inharmonious element, and confusion at least becomes the result. Let the law of love to the neighbor, the desire that equal rights prevail, and entire passivity be the result, disturbing forces are dispelled, and unless the group gathered are not balanced in physical magnetic strength, if a medium is present—and it rarely happens that among several, at least, not one is to be found responsive to the attraction called for—success follows. These laws in full action, there can be no disturbing, rebellious or discordant spirits to prevent success, though even through slight variation difficulties may occur which might, and probably would come under the head of disorderly manifestations, very likely to be thought attributable to evil spirits. The character of the manifestations, when brought to such a condition as to be recognized as such, if of an intelligent character, must be used by the sitters with judgment.

Weighed in the balance of intelligence, and not found wanting, treated with the respect that each desire for themselves, never forgetting that equal courtesy should be used toward the unseen as are extended on this side to persons, however ignorant they may be in any polite society, all come under the power of "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." There is a spiritual harmony in this which grows with its growth, and strengthens with its strength, and with such a nucleus for circles, there is little invitation for lower orders to infest the seance-room, and truth in the end must be the result. For the most part, influence is attracted to a circle according to the strength of that circle intellectually and spiritually.

Often, however, manifestations are the result of physical causes from physical conditions. Should an electric current be wanted, or an animally magnetic one, there could be no result. Vibration might ensue, and rocking of the table magnetism wanting when the end would be senseless, till magnetic force is added with the aid of the spirit-sphere, there would be less erratic results.

For the most part, vital magnetism is needed from the second sphere, to produce trance conditions and all of the higher class phenomena by highly intellectual spirits, not necessarily spiritually magnetic, or rather, higher developed spirituality, for such, unless there is very superior work demanded, do not reach immediately to earth, but through the intervention of other spirits who may desire to be brought to the level of earthly spirituality, or so near as to be able to give such assistance as the suppliant requires. In the Roman Catholic churches, where masses are said, and persons prostrate themselves before the altar, to offer supplications to the Virgin and saints, the whole is illustrated. In the fullness of their faith and in humble belief that their prayers are ascending to the throne of grace, the humble Protestant bows the head and bends his knee, and the incense of the heart, as well as the very desire of the soul, brings the applicant into connection with the links of ascension, till the highest is reached and the prayer answered.

A soulless form of words as prayer may be a substitute better than none, but the real workings of the miracles of prayer in our civilization have been so badly understood that the truth has been lost, and the cry of idolatry, or the worship of images, has followed the devotion of those who have chosen pictures or images as objects for the concentration of thought, in its desire to uplift the soul into the divine magnetism, which might thereby reach and help to strengthen that which the love of the world or life in the world so completely exhausts.

Natural hypnotism—in other words, magnetism—which produces trance or catalepsy, is caused very often by the aid of the concentration of sight upon a crystal or some other substance, as well as the action of one mind upon another, producing passivity from the action of the will-power upon the brain of one capable of reception, both brains being in action to produce the result. Spiritual conception is of the same character, with purely spiritual results. The mind is uplifted by the spirituality of faith, and desire to unite itself with the forces of the higher spheres, till the spiritual state, which has been promised a response, is reached. This, then, is the condition from which spirit circles should

SOME QUEER EXPERIENCES.

Coincidence or What?—A Drowning Man's Dual Consciousness.

In the Chicago Times-Herald of a recent date was the following collection of occurrences that will serve to interest the readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, relative to man's dual nature:

The stories I am about to relate I got at first hands, which is, perhaps, the chief merit. We read a good many things in books and newspapers that are out of the ordinary range of our experience, and which we hesitate to believe, but when a friend tells us face to face and with all seriousness of some extraordinary occurrence we are very apt to treasure it up in memory and classify it with the unexplained phenomena of the mysterious human life.

HIS FATE FORETOLD IN A VISION.

A lady of my acquaintance, who is engaged in newspaper work in New York, received a visit a few years ago from a Western friend who was about to take a Sound steamer for Boston the same evening. While they were talking the lady had a startling vision. She seemed to see the man walking on the deck of a steamer on a dark night, when the falling rain froze into sleet as it struck the deck. He slipped and fell, sliding under the guard-rail, and was engulfed in the sea. The vision came and passed in a second. The lady begged her friend not to go on the steamer that night. She told him what she had seen. He was a materialist and laughed the whole matter off as a bit of idle fancy. He took the boat that evening, slipped on the icy deck, fell overboard just as he did in the vision, and was drowned.

WARNING VOICE SAVES A TRAIN.

Three years ago I was living in a car and traveling from town to town in the State of Washington. In Cheney I had a call from a real estate man. Some way or other the talk drifted to queer experiences. My friend told me he had had one such experience in life, and one only.

Ten years before he was running a train out of Chicago as a conductor on one of the Burlington lines. One morning after heavy rains, when there were freshets in the streams, he stood upon the platform of a way-station about three miles from the crossing of a small river. He was about to signal his engineer to go ahead, when a voice spoke plainly in his ear: "Look out for the bridge!" No one was standing near at the time. He walked forward and said to the engineer: "Jim, I think you had better slow down at the curve just this side of the bridge."

"There is nothing the matter with the bridge," said the engineer, "or we would have had a wire from it."

"Perhaps there isn't," replied the conductor, "but you slow down all the same."

There was a sharp curve a short distance from the approach to the bridge, so near, in fact, that it would have been impossible to stop the train after coming in sight of the bridge, had it been running at the usual rate of speed. The engineer slowed down. The bridge was gone. It had been carried away between the time the train left the last station and its arrival at the curve. Had it not been for the mysterious warning the whole train would have gone into the river.

SEES DATE OF COIN IN MAN'S POCKET.

A prominent Chicago physician once kept a drug store in a small town in Illinois. Across the street from the store was a considerable stretch of unfenced town lots. Sitting in the shade in front of the store one summer afternoon the doctor saw a young man of his acquaintance approaching across the open lots. When he was five or six rods away the doctor, without any symptoms of being in an abnormal condition, seemed to see the whole anatomical structure of the man—all his bones and internal organs, and at the same time he saw the contents of the young man's pockets. The vision passed in an instant. When the youth came up to the doctor the latter said:

"Henry, I can tell you just what you have in your pockets. In one of the pockets of your trousers you have a bunch of string for tying up bags, in the other there is a black-handled jackknife, two tenpenny nails and a half dollar. The date on the half dollar is 1856."

The young man turned his pockets inside out and showed that he was carrying the articles described. He took the coin, looked at it and found that the date named by the doctor was correct. He was so astonished at this case of clairvoyance that he nearly fainted.

DUAL CONSCIOUSNESS.

I will add a queer experience of my own. In company with three friends I undertook to ford a slough of the Yakima river, in the State of Washington, four years ago. We had a big wagon and a four-horse team. The river was very high, and the broad slough was running like a mill race. We knew that the fording-place was narrow and the water deep, but we expected nothing more serious than to get our feet wet by the water coming into the wagon-box. When about half way across the lead horses got their hind feet over the double-trees and became unmanageable. The wagon was swept off the ford into deep water. One of my friends, W. S. Mellen, who was then general manager of the Northern Pacific railroad, swam ashore. Two others climbed out of the tail end of the wagon and managed to keep their footing in the current until rescued. I attempted the same feat, but I was the last man to get out, and before I could find any footing the wagon was swept into deep water, overturned, and wagon, horses and myself were soon floundering in the current. I could not swim, and I gave up all hope of saving my life. While under the water I had a very clear experience of what the psychologists call the double consciousness.

It seemed as if I were two persons, one a physical man, still intelligent enough to struggle among the horses; the other consciousness was entirely serene and happy, and looked with admiration at the beautiful color of the water overhead, wondered if the body would come ashore somewhere down stream and be recovered, and felt quite delighted at being released from partnership with the other fellow. How long this lasted I do not know. I did not have any of that vivid recollection of all the events of life which men restored from drowning usually tell about. This higher consciousness only felt that it was an independent spiritual existence, now for the first time released from the bondage of dwelling in a physical body. The body, in its desperate struggles, clutched the ear of one of the horses, the horse got its head above water and the man's head came up with it. The man was rescued by a boat, and with extreme regret the higher consciousness was forced to re-enter its old dwelling-place.

SAVED FROM ASPHYXIATION.

The last narrative reminds me of a little experience I had in Minneapolis a few years ago while there in the practice of magnetic treatments. The room I used as a bedroom, which of right was a parlor with a bed in, contained a hard coal base-burner, with a very uncertain damper in the pipe. I had always been very careful about leaving the stove in proper condition on retiring, and have a recollection of making the usual examination on the night of this incident, that came near being my last.

I retired about 10 o'clock feeling no concern about my surrounding conditions; in fact so clear was my conscience that I was soon lost in slumber's unconscious blissfulness. At exactly 12 o'clock I was aroused by a loud report and bright flash on the pillow close to the end of my nose. More entranced than awake, and yet conscious, I bounded from the bed to the window; threw it up; rushed to the stove, turned the misbehaved damper straight up and down the pipe and reeled back to the bed, more dead than alive from asphyxiation by hard coal gas. Just as my head touched the pillow I heard that familiar grunt of Indian satisfaction and the words, "not dead yet," followed by a hearty laugh. I seemed to realize that my spirit was flying around the room, but only remembered the body as lying on the bed and I was trying to save it from the impending danger.

seek to obtain the greatest strength possible, for development or their own growth. If they persevere in this, there is no need to dread the approach of evil in their midst; on the other hand, worldly spirits are invoked when absorbing earthly cares lie at the bottom of the desire for spirit aid, and as such only can be reached by the parties seeking help from the second sphere, the character of the communication will be tempered accordingly, and the same weight given as would be given to earthly testimony under the same circumstances. Such being the case, there is no more right in saying evil spirits lie at the bottom of the conditions, than when such cases lie at the bottom of any inharmony in life, and what is called falsehood is the result. There are spirits ready to communicate always with earth, when opportunity is offered, and as such is the case, it is rendered more difficult to discern the false from the true, when undeveloped in any way, through ignorance of the law guiding communication, or desire to say something whether true or not, if assured thereby that connection with the earth can be made—forgetting that in providing one law they are breaking, perhaps, another, and are doing harm rather than good; injuring the cause by a practical illustration of the dangers of bringing lying spirits, as they are called, to the front, and making results very doubtful. Consequently, the law, misunderstood on either side, is dangerous for this reason, that, as soon as anything is established on the basis of falsehood, the superstructure is not only unreliable and may topple over, but carries everything along with it till it has been superseded by higher law and a truer departure commenced.

This being the case, knowledge at the bottom of all things spiritual should be sought for to help the seeker of truth to discover the law of failure, otherwise the result of ignorance, till repeated trials have proved the mistake; than a little light enters and the work proceeds.

Association of Speakers.

I have been in consultation with several of the public platform workers for Spiritualism and find they are favorable to an organization of speakers. The desire is for conference more than to regulate their labors. It would not be well to attempt to apportion their fields of labor. But a mutual help to obtain engagements, and a more fraternal spirit amongst them should ensue. A public expression of the truths we espouse, made in convention of the speakers, would carry a force we do now not obtain. Many personal benefits could be enumerated as argument for the association, but they are unnecessary until we learn if the idea is feasible. Those interested should express an opinion in the Spiritual press, or may address the writer. For the good of our cause, only should we labor. By conference and association for protection and espousal, surely good will result. Fraternally,

THE ART OF MIND BUILDING.

Professor Elmer Gates (Director of the Laboratory of Psychology and Psychurgy, Washington, D. C.) has, in the course of a series of interviews by George J. Manson, unfolded the result of his studies in what he denominates The Art of Mind Building, the discovery of which, if confirmed by further experiment, promises to place in the hands of the teacher, philanthropist and reformer, a powerful lever for the moral (and to some extent physical) elevation of humanity. The results of two interviews are published in The Metaphysical Magazine for July and August. It was Professor Gates who some seven years since proved by experiment that anger or passion generated a mephite vapor which was exhaled in respiration (and since also it has been shown in perspiration) that was absolutely deleterious, and when extracted and administered to men or animals caused stimulation and excitement. Irascible, malevolent and depressing emotions generated in the system corresponding compounds, whilst pleasant emotions charged the respirations, etc. with sanative qualities But the present line of the Professor's study is in connection with the generation of good and bad brain cells, which he claims can be controlled by his system. His first experiments were with animals, to which he gave an "extraordinary and excessive training in one mental faculty—e. g. seeing or hearing"—and in depriving other animals, identical in age and breed, of the opportunity to use that faculty; he then killed both class of animals and examined their brains to see if any structural difference had been caused by excessive mental activity, as compared with the deprivation or absence thereof. "During five or six months, for five or six hours each day, I trained dogs in discriminating colors. The result was that upon examining the occipital areas of their brains I found a far greater number of brain-cells than any other animal of like breed ever possessed." These experiments demonstrated that more brains could be given to an animal, or a human being, in consequence of a better use of the mental faculties. The trained dogs could discriminate between many shades of the same color. He had also an opportunity of examining the brain of a child who had died of scarlet fever, and who had been trained for several weeks in the excessive use of the temperature senses (detection of heat and cold), and found it to possess in the temperature areas of the brain, "twenty-four times the average number of cells." Children ordinarily, the Professor says, "develop less than ten per cent. of the cells in their brain areas," and many more cells can be put into the fallow parts, so improving the brain and increasing the power of the mind; the education should commence as soon as possible after birth, or better still, before birth, through the mind of the mother. He has (he says) "succeeded in entirely eliminating vicious tendencies from children with dispositions towards cruelty, stealing, or anger." This he does by creating a greater number of opposite or moral memories as impressions, and keeping them active till the old structures disappear; in fact crowding them out, as the planting of certain kinds of grass in the soil will often drive out and supersede the weeds. The Professor then proceeds to show how alcoholism and derangements of the digestive functions may be overcome by his process, viz., creating numerous moral cells which are sanative and harmonizing. Give to people more mind, he says, "and all undertakings will be ameliorated, and better results accomplished. Give them more moral minds, and the evils of society will gradually disappear." He dwells upon the supremacy of the "mind" and its legitimate control of the body, and asserts that an evil memory promptly antagonizes the functioning of the good memories and injures both body and mind. Though speaking of the first stage in the brain building process as "enregistering the sense impression of all the senses, so as to produce sensation structures," and the second stage which "consists in causing the child to discriminate between the different sensations previously acquired and to associate them in consciousness, so as to produce what is called an integrant of the second order," etc., he does not so far give us the modus operandi, which, as we have to begin with the infant a few weeks old, is undoubtedly essential and probably will be forthcoming. The method is doubtless new, but the idea was originated by Dr. Joseph Rodes Buchanan many years ago in his admirable book on "Moral Education," and later in its therapeutic aspect in his large volume, entitled "Therapeutic Sarcognomy," wherein he demonstrates that every portion of the body is represented in the brain and can be acted upon from its corresponding occipital pole. These recent deliverances of Professor Gates should serve to call greater attention to this elaborate and comprehensive work, which is a complete system of anthropology, comprehending man in the spiritual, intellectual and physical aspects. However, we shall look forward with pleasure to the unfoldment of Professor Gates' method, which, if simple and easy of application, will be eagerly adopted by practical men in the spiritualistic ranks, many of whom are aware of the power of the mind to refine and educate the less developed, but do not know how to apply it to the best advantage.

NEW PAPER IN BERLIN.

We have received from Berlin the first number of the Metaphysische Rundschau, or Metaphysical Review, which is to replace the defunct Sphinx. It is a handsomely printed magazine of 112 pages, which is to be published monthly, under the editorship of Paul Zillmann; and the subjects to be treated of will embrace practical metaphysics, psychology, oriental philosophy, and occultism generally. Two professors and four medical practitioners are among the contributors to the July number; and the titles of the more important articles are these:—Physics, Metaphysics and Theosophy; Suggestion and Subconsciousness; On the Threshold of the Absolute; Psychology as Knowledge; The Outlook of Occultism in the West; The Theoretic Groundwork of Astrology; Considerations on Music; and Letters Which Have Helped Me. The annual subscription to this periodical in Germany is eighteen shillings.

THE CHURCH AND SPIRITUALISM

Some numbers have reached us, for the first time, of the Revista Spirita, a fortnightly paper published at Bahia, a city of 140,000 inhabitants, and the capital of a province of the same name in the republic of Brazil. It seems to be an exceedingly well conducted periodical, and is the organ of the local centre, entitled "Love and Charity." In Brazil, as in most other Roman Catholic countries, Spiritualism is exposed to rabid and venomous attacks from the Church, which is the stronghold of ignorance, bigotry and superstition; but the articles signed "Heraclito" and Antonio Pireira de Araujo, show that the brain power is on the side of those who are fighting for the cause of freedom, enlightenment, truth and "pure religion and undefiled;" which is thus defined by the editor of our contemporary:—"Faith in God and the practice of charity are the only sound and durable elements, which will always subsist, and will constitute the religion of the future."

THE CAUSE IN SPAIN.

The Spiritualist movement in Spain, as we learn from the Revista de Estudios Psicologicos of Barcelona, and the Irradiacion of Madrid, is spreading far and fast in that country. In the first of these two cities, a weekly publication entitled Socrates has made its appearance, which will be entirely devoted to mediumistic communications, and is edited by Don Alverico Peron, founder of the Criterio in Madrid, and author of La Formula del Epiritismo. At the important seaport town of Alicante, the capital of the maritime province of that name, La Revelacion continues its active propaganda on behalf of Spiritualism, with the most gratifying success; and in the cathedral city of Valencia, where there is a population of 140,000 to work upon, an energetic lady, Dona Belen Sarrage de Ferrara, has started a paper under the title of La Conciencia Libre, to advocate freedom of thought and freedom of conscience. If the women of Spain break away from the Church, the beginning of the end is not far off.

SPIRITUALISM—THEOSOPHY.

Madame Virginia Paganini contributes to the July number of Lux (Rome), a vigorously written paper on "Spiritualism and Theosophy," in which she points out wherein they agree, and wherein they differ, and exposes some of the preposterous statements made by certain Theosophists with respect to spiritual phenomena; one of these being that all such phenomena are produced by earth-bound spirits and by those of suicides who are condemned to remain for a long time in Kama Loka. These "Kamo Rupas," as they are called, are nothing more nor less than "astral corpses." It appears, "from which the immortal Ego has withdrawn its ray." It is difficult to imagine rational beings excogitating such wildly nonsensical theories, or other rational beings seriously accepting them as explanations of the sources of spiritual communications, replete with the purest wisdom, the highest philosophy, and the sublimest code of ethics it is possible to conceive.

SOUTH OF FRANCE.

The Express, a local and secular paper, circulating in the Department of Aveyron, in the south of France, reports that a great sensation has been created in that district by the mediumistic and clairvoyant faculties which have suddenly developed themselves in a little boy named Paulin Delpont, who is only nine years old, and lives at Laroque, near the town of St. Affrique. Although he has never been to school, and speaks only the patois of the province, in his normal state, yet, when he passes under control he speaks both French and Latin correctly He sees and describes spirits, divines secrets and denotes where lost objects are to be found Thus he described where the bells of the old church of St. Amans (probably taken down and buried during the revolutionary times) had been concealed: and stated that in digging for them, two skeletons would be discovered. These have been brought to light, and at the latest date, excavators were going deeper for the bells. As many as 300 strangers per diem are pouring into Laroque to see the wonderful child medium.

PHOTOGRAPH OF THOUGHT.

In the Annales Medico-Chirurgicals du Hainaut, in Belgium, some circumstantial details are given of some experiments which have been made by a certain D. Rockwood in connection with the photography of thought. These would go to prove the existence of cerebral phenomena of a more astounding character than any which have yet been brought to light, with respect to the structure and function of the brain. But although the alleged "facts" appear in a professional journal, we can only receive them with the greatest reserve.

A MYSTERIOUS VOICE.

Le Soir, an evening paper published in Brussels, devotes a good deal of space to a report of some strange occurrences which have taken place at the village of Valencean-Bric, where a house occupied by a much respected family, named Lebegue, is said to be "haunted." A mysterious voice has been heard by hundreds of persons, but neither the clergy, nor the medical faculty, nor the police have been able to trace it to any human origin. It indulges in malignant threats against Mme. Lebegue, and when she hoped to escape from it, by taking up her abode with a friend, the voice still pursued her. The invisible enemy has broken numerous windows, and some glass doors inside the house, as also chandeliers, vases and a clock in the drawing-room; has displaced furniture; and has even perforated the centre of a chimney glass, from the back, without so much as a scratch on the woodwork behind. The Abbe Schnebelin, who has carefully investigated the phenomena, declares them to be the "corollary of the discoveries of Drs. Papus and Baraduc, Colonel de Rochas, and M. d'Assakoff;" or, in other words, we presume, the exteriorisation of the motricity of some living enemy of Mme. Lebegue. This is the view of the subject taken by Dr. Papus, who asserts that the sphere within which a malevolently-minded person can project his will-power, has a radius of something like seven miles.

THE ODIC RAYS.

Dr. Kraft, writing to the Frankfurter Zeitung, alleges that the famous discovery of Professor Roentgen is in reality a discovery of the odic rays; the existence and nature of which were first proclaimed by Baron von Reichenbach, upwards of forty years ago; when Dubois-Reymond, perhaps the most famous French physiologist of his day, coolly characterized his scientific labors as "the most deplorable aberrations that had ever scattered the brains of a human being," and as "fables that deserved to be flung on the fire." And now comes Professor Roentgen, who demonstrates beyond all dispute that these "deplorable aberrations" of Reichenbach were really the revelations of a great scientific truth. In his Der Sensitive Mensch und sein Verhalten zum Ode ("The Sensitive Man and His Relation with the Od"), published at Stuttgard and Tubingen, in the years 1854 and 1855, there will be found at p. 2252, the following passage:—"Madame K. was amusing herself by bringing the back of her hand near the conductor, so as to draw forth the electricity with the tops of her fingers, when these, by reason of the odic current, became so transparent that she could distinguish with precision the veins, the nerves, the tendons and the muscular ligaments. This may prove to be of incalculable efficacy in therapeutics, especially for the purpose of diagnosis. For, given the possibility of rendering the body of every sick person diaphanous, by good sensitives, these will be in a position to discern what internal organs may be morbidly affected and what progress it is making towards amelioration or deterioration. Moreover, the physiological processess of the body in health may be examined in the same way." Here we have the X rays accurately described, and their utility to the science of therapeutics clearly pointed out, more than forty years ago, by the great chemist who discovered creosote and paraffine; who was one of the first geologists of his day; and whose mind was also of such a practical character, that, in conjunction with the Count von Salm, he established large manufactories in Wurtemburg and Moravia, which enabled him to amass a princely fortune. But the Baron von Reichenbach was a Spiritualist; and therefore official science which was then, as it is now, materialistic to its finger-tips, received his discovery of what are now called the X rays with derision, and scornfully dismissed it, as the diseased product, of a brain subjected to "deplorable aberrations!" It should be added that the very word "Od" expresses the idea of an all-penetrating force in Nature.

UTILITY OF PRAYER.

Le Progres Spirite having invited its readers to contribute their ideas as to the utility of prayer, has received numerous replies, and among others one from M. Leon Denis, the distinguished lecturer on Spiritualism in France. Want of space precludes us from quoting more than the following passage:—"The utility of prayer should be very obvious to all circles. In the practice of Spiritualism, prayer becomes a weapon, a means of action. The union of thoughts and wills by prayer predisposes to community of feeling; it concentrates the fluidic forces, repels impure spirits, and diminishes evil influences. It does more. It attracts good spirits to our side. It facilitates their action upon us by placing us in the condition favorable to the reception and enjoyment of their teachings. It assures us of their protection. It creates a bond of union between us and them, and causes us to enter into communion, if only for a few moments, with their spiritual existence."

SPIRITUALISM IN SOUTH AFRICA.

"Spiritualism in the Diamond Fields, South Africa, is progressing in spite of the uphill work we have to contend with. We have not the same advantages here as you have in the Old Country. We have to fight against the strenuous opposition of the clergy and the press. And we have not the advantage of such good mediums as you have. Nevertheless, through the kindness of a good Spiritualist, we have a home of our own; he has made us a present of the tenancy of a nice building, and through the good services of our indefatigable secretary, Mr. Judge, we hope to make it as attractive as possible. We intend to set apart one room as a reading-room, where any one may step in and peruse spiritualistic literature. If any of our friends in England should feel disposed to send us any spare literature, it will find a place on our reading-room tables. We have two sittings a week in our rooms in connection with the society, and several other private sittings are held by the members of the society in their own homes. Altogether we are, I think, making fair progress. I will occasionally send you short reports of our progress, if you think it of any interest to your readers."

THE UNSEEN UNIVERSE.

A universe unseen around us lies
From whence this visible creation came
In rushing whirlwinds of tempestuous flame,
And filled with fiery mist the throbbing skies,
In time condensing into Night's bright eyes.
This grand and gleaming constellated frame
(Weak words are all inadequate to name)
Spring into being in this wonderous wise.
When time shall be no more, into the vast
Eternal realm unseen shall all return;
For sun and star with fire shall cease to burn,
And they shall to the void again be cast.
So far as clear-eyed Science can discern
This fate shall overtake them all at last.

MEDIUMSHIP.

"The science of mediumship is the science of sciences, since it comprehends the mode whereby the material world is vitalized with a life element, which is the Creator's arm to carry on the processes of life and formation. The flower that blooms in beauty, shedding a fragrance on the air that is at once grateful to the senses and stimulating to the nerves, is a perfect emblem of a spiritually gifted person—a medium for the manifestation of pure spiritual truth. The aroma of the flower is spiritualized to the degree that it acts upon the life currents of the system, imparting nutriment to the spiritual body, of the finest quality that physical substance affords. The flower is a medium for the transmission of these finer forces to the human body—the spiritual part of it, the same as the refined, spiritualized individual is the medium for the transmission of spiritual truth, a more refined aliment still, which the spiritual man absorbs. The blossom, next to the fruit, is the climax of Nature's effort for development. For its production have been concentrated the refined essences of the plant, which, through storm and calm, through sunshine and rain, heat and cold, has struggled up to the point where the acme of its existence is so nearly attained that its fruit is for healing and sustenance, being a spiritual force. All this is emblematical of the spiritualizing process, whereby one is prepared to bring forth fruits of the spirit, which are for the real sustenance and uplifting of whoever partakes.

MAY ALL SING?

A Comprehensive Answer to the Question.

During forty-five years activity in Spiritualism I have been profoundly impressed with the importance of music as a factor in making conditions for the co-operation of spirit workers in both the teaching and demonstration of our central truth. The present method of its use is governed by habit, education and competitive strife, and results in this: that to-day Spiritualists are singing more Christian doctrine than Spiritualism. Congregational singing has proved its value in the old-time religious revival, the political campaign and in the growth of that strange sect, the Salvationists. The effect of professional effort and display is the same from church as from concert hall, and offers but little for spirit aid we recognize as connected with public work.

Yet, like all questions, this has two sides. It must be conceded that the musician's harmony is disturbed by the discordant attempts of those who make no effort save in a public assembly; and it is not "in good form" nowadays to render music save by a trained choir: this no one can dispute. Then the question remains, does congregational singing give enough to more than offset these objections. I believe it does. Judging from what we see, a large proportion of our speakers, writers, and musical committees entirely, are opposed to it, or they dare not say otherwise. It is a delicate subject. There are interests. Editors realize it and believe that "silence is golden." Moses and Mattie Hull, and some other fearless ones, say that all should sing; and make effort that they shall. The question is generally referred by societies to their musical committees. These have their personal interests in voice display, feelings of rivalry, pride of custom and other things which all come first, while the needs of the cause come last, if at all. It is a matter which should have the intelligent consideration of the societies themselves, with the committee's acting as servants and not as rulers.

The interest of the individual in a public service gives it vital life; and only when each takes a part in the singing can this be done. Intelligent and self-respecting persons do not at all times desire to sit as audience for the professional speaker or musical expert. To give strength to conviction and to aid its reception, no agency can equal the individual expression of spiritual truth in song. With music's magic power is made the condition required for the action of spirit power. Then is established the rapport between teacher or demonstrator and audience which is essential to best results.

It is not infrequent to hear persons outside of our ranks inquire about Spiritualists: "Do they believe it?" We imitate a formalism common with those who accept plain untruth that we know they cannot with thought believe, and thus cause such inquiry. Do not the same questioners say of the Salvationists, "Well they believe it, anyway?" Now, why the difference? Just this: One voices unitedly their own belief in song, while the other has sung for them doctrine they know is untrue.

And so psychologized are we with that in which the church methods have educated us, we shrink from the use of the best which man's musical genius has given because it is not sacred music. It is the excellence of the melody and its special adaption to the sentiment for which is desired musical expression—this, and not what some brainless disciple of Grundy may say, is the one thing to be considered. "Bar-room songs" lose all their associations when fitted to words which embody an overwhelming truth; and when we chance to sing such airs we wonder how the melody could ever have told anything else except that truth.

Our musical service should have first of all, an unmistakable sincerity; it should be attractive by its originality, believing as we do, that, as Spiritualism contains within itself all things necessary for its development, it has no occasion to imitate, though it claims the right to use all excellence known. This service should be educational—every song a teacher of some vital truth. In this way we disarm incredulity, and the pride that would avoid us, with the coolness we meet, would all disappear.

To sum up, if we desire a vitality in our public service which will first charm and electrify the new comer, then deeply interest him so that conviction will be sure to follow by the use of Spiritualism's truths in congregational singing, the time will be short to when no one will dare even hint of its unpopularity. —W. H. BOOZER.

BRUTUS WAS SMART.

He Knew When the Conversation Touched on His Battle with Bruin.

A writer in the American Field tells of a fight between a black bear and a mongrel cur that could boast not lineage or personal appearance. He put up a game fight, however, only to be worsted in the end by a powerful stroke of bruin's paw. When the bear was dispatched by the dog's master it was found that Brutus, the dog, was very badly used up and he presented a sorry appearance. He was carefully nursed back to health and strength again and proved useful in many a hunting expedition.

Some time after the dog's adventure with the bear one of the party—Col. B.—left home and remained away for several years. When he returned he found Brutus an old dog, bearing his honorable scars with the sedate dignity of a worthy pensioner. At first the dog did not recognize the colonel, the memory of old association seemed blotted out. One day after having been home about a week, Col. B. and his brothers were sitting together talking of old times, while Brutus lay near by apparently dozing. During the conversation the incident wherein Brutus was so badly used up by the bear was brought up; that memorable hunting exploit was gone over and the courageous conduct of the dog extolled as it had been years before. The old dog remained quiet while the events of the first bear hunt were being discussed until his fight with bruin was reached. At this point Brutus jumped up and sprang toward Col. B. in demonstrative recognition, showing that he had heard the conversation and that his memory had been awakened by the recounting of the unfortunate experience with the bear.

The Best. The Rest. The Test.

There are two kinds of sarsaparilla: The best—and the rest. The trouble is they look alike. And when the rest dress like the best who's to tell them apart? Well, "the tree is known by its fruit." That's an old test and a safe one. And the taller the tree the deeper the root. That's another test. What's the root,—the record of these sarsaparillas? The one with the deepest root is Ayer's. The one with the richest fruit: that, too, is Ayer's. Ayer's Sarsaparilla has a record of half a century of cures; a record of many medals and awards—culminating in the medal of the Chicago World's Fair, which, admitting Ayer's Sarsaparilla as the best—shut its doors against the rest. That was greater honor than the medal, to be the only Sarsaparilla admitted as an exhibit at the World's Fair. If you want to get the best sarsaparilla of your druggist, here's an infallible rule: Ask for the best and you'll get Ayer's. Ask for Ayer's and you'll get the best.

RIGHT LIVING

— BY —

SUSAN H. WIXON,

Author of "Apples of Gold," "All in a Lifetime," "The Story Hour," "Summer Days at Onset," "Sunday Observance," etc., etc.

"Living is an art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the arts."—THOMAS STARR KING.

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as older persons whom it is wisely and appropriately designed to interest while teaching them valuable ethical lessons.

The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in children's lyceums. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. It is a most excellent book and should be widely circulated.

GENERAL SURVEY

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Doings, Etc.

Bear in mind, please, that we cannot publish weekly reports of meetings. Whenever a change is made in speakers, or anything of special interest, send us a brief item, please. A great deal can be expressed in a dozen lines; but long reports will not be used. Meetings are of local interest only. We extend a cordial invitation to all speakers to send in their appointments to lecture, and general movements, which will be read by at least 40,000. We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

Wm. Emmett Coleman, the Spiritualist writer, and Orientalist, and occasional contributor to The Progressive Thinker, on November 13th delivered an address before the Library Association of California, at San Francisco, upon "The Literature and Libraries of India, Ceylon and Thibet."

Dr. E. H. Denslow called at our office, Thursday, on his way to Dallas, Texas. The Doctor would be glad to make engagements for lecturing anywhere in the State of Texas during December and January.

The undersigned wishes to correspond with the mediums that are in the field. Ella Woodward, secretary of First Alliance of Progressive Thought (Spiritual society). Address her at 1016 Adams street, Toledo, Ohio.

Dr. T. Wilkins will again devote him self entirely to giving magnetic treatments. He says he will be glad to receive the present addresses of all his former patients; to tell them something they will be glad to know. Address him at 67 Thirty-third street, Chicago.

Nellie M. Smith writes: "Friends who are acquainted in Sturgis, Mich., will be glad to learn that our society is flourishing. We were favored in having Mrs. Jackson for our speaker in the early autumn, followed, till now, by Dr. Denslow. Last Friday evening he was tendered a reception at Mrs. Hannah Bucks as he is to leave us for a season, to spend the winter in Dallas, Texas. Generous friends made up a parting gift, which was presented by one of the ladies, with a kindly little address, making it quite a ceremonious affair, to which the Doctor responded with friendly enthusiasm. Strangers who may meet the Doctor and Mrs. Denslow pray accept this introduction. We vouch for them as true and faithful Spiritualists, worthy your loving confidence."

The First Beacon Light Spiritualists, services held Sundays, 2:30 and 7:45 p. m., 617 Clark street, have organized a Ladies' Auxiliary. The following officers have been elected: President, Mrs. Glagios; vice-president, Mrs. Bloom; treasurer, Mrs. Gullacheen; secretary, Miss Struby; executive committee: Mrs. Mosher, Mrs. Bird and Mrs. Perkins. Seven are elected on the Lookout committee. A church-fund circle will be held every Wednesday at 2 p. m., at different residences in the city, 10 cents being the admission, the notice to be given on Sunday, where Mrs. G. F. Perkins attends.

F. Corden White, platform test medium and lecturer, goes to Milwaukee, Wis., December 3, for the Unity Society. He will return, December 28, to 3058 Calumet avenue, this city.

E. B. Chamness writes from Alexandria, Ind.: "We had with us, last Sunday, Bro. F. F. Hayden and wife, of Indianapolis. We find Bro. Hayden a forcible and logical speaker under spirit control. During the existence of our society we have had many mediums and speakers, none of whom have at any time given better satisfaction than Bro. Hayden, and we recommend him to all societies needing his services. His wife gave many public tests that were recognized and acknowledged."

B. T. Watson writes: "I am glad to be able to send you a new yearly subscriber to The Progressive Thinker. There are a few staunch Spiritualists here in Jonesboro, Ark. President Barrett called on us and gave three splendid lectures, on his missionary trip to California, which were highly appreciated by all who were fortunate enough to hear him. On a close canvass of our town we have about thirty Spiritualists, and we would like so much to have good test mediums call and spend a few days with us. There could be a good, strong society organized here with a little work. We have some local talent, but not sufficient to build up the cause as it should be. We have a town here of five thousand people, and I see no reason why we could not have a good, strong society, and we can if workers will come over and help us, and they need not be afraid to come for the people are anxious to investigate. One medium staid here two weeks and took in about $120, which I think amply satisfied her."

Mrs. G. Partridge returned last Sunday, and will be pleased to see her patients and patrons, for treatments and readings. Address 67 Thirty-third street, Chicago.

Mrs. S. C. Scovel has closed an engagement of nearly two months with the Spiritualist Research Society of Mitchell, S. Dak., where her work has been very satisfactory to the society. After the close of the last meeting, a local paper says: "Members of the society gathered at the residence of F. E. Clark and witnessed some very fine spiritual demonstrations, which were truly remarkable to those who saw them. A rebel soldier and a Mason, who was captured by a party of Union men, scouting under the command of J. B. Wolgemuth, came to Mr. Wolgemuth through the medium and made known his presence by referring to war incidents during his capture and before leaving the medium gave several Masonic signs, among which was the Masonic grip. A grandfather of Mr. Clark, who was a Methodist preacher for forty years, controlled the medium and gave an interesting religious talk, recalling incidents in Mr. Clark's and his own life which were reliable and true in every instance. The sickness, death, funeral journey from Sanborn to Milwaukee, and burial services of Mr. Geo. Bryan's nephew was described to him in an accurate manner." Mrs. Scovell has returned to her home in Elgin, Ill.

Dr. P. S. George, secretary of the State Spiritualist Association of Nebraska, writes from Lincoln, Neb: "It is with pleasure that I report to the many readers of The Progressive that Mr. Amae Wheeler, the medium for physical manifestations, is now in our city. Mr. Wheeler is one of the best mediums that has visited Lincoln for many years. His trumpet seances are of an excellent character. He usually sits with three trumpets, and during the seance the manifestations are heard at the same time through all the trumpets, by different intelligences. I consider Mr. Wheeler an honest medium, working in a way that cannot help carrying conviction wherever he goes. I have sat in his circles and know his work to be genuine. He has numerous phases—trumpet, materialization, independent slate-writing, etc. Anyone wishing to correspond with Mr. Wheeler can address him at 'General Delivery,' this city. Mr. Wheeler recently spent four weeks at Broken Bow, Neb., where he gave great satisfaction."

Prof. N. H. Eddy writes from Rochester, N. Y.: "Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates are holding meetings here in Odd Fellows Hall for this month and doing good work through their inspiring forces, and ministrations of same, elucidating the truths and philosophy of Spiritualism. Mrs. Kates, through her fine medial powers, is demonstrating the facts of spirit return, giving cheer to many hearts by her convincing tests which are acknowledged as correct."

Mrs. Virginie Barrett would like to make engagements with societies for 1896 and 1897, at reasonable terms; also with camps for next season. For this month, address her at 12 Purdy street, Bath, N. Y. Permanent address, 479 Seventh street, Indianapolis, Ind.

E. W. Sprague, the well-known lecturer and test medium, writes as follows in reference to The Progressive Thinker: "I shall do all in my power for The Progressive Thinker in the future, as in the past. No better paper was ever published in the interest of any reform than the grand old Progressive Thinker; and it, like the cause it represents, stands for all reforms, and panders to no sect, denomination or creed. Long live its editor to carry the banner of truth and justice, that the time may sometime arrive when all shall see the light of immortality as revealed in Modern Spiritualism."

Dr. P. J. Barrington writes from Strawberry Point, Iowa: "The people of Strawberry Point have just been favored for two weeks with the presence and labors of Mr. and Mrs. Kayner. Mrs. Isa Wilson-Kayner is an excellent platform test medium, and as such should be kept busy demonstrating to the world the proof of immortality. She gave good satisfaction here. Myself and wife did considerable missionary work in and around this place earlier in the season. Spiritualism is an uncertain factor here as yet, still it is gaining ground slowly. We find here many excellent people, and some earnest investigators. Mrs. A. Treadwell and family, and E. L. Gages and wife are staunch Spiritualists and honor their sentiments fearlessly everywhere. Mrs. Gages is rapidly developing into a good all-round test medium, and will soon be ready for public work. Mrs. Kayner can be addressed at Independence, and myself and wife either singly or together can be addressed for engagement on easy terms, at Manchester, Iowa."

J. L. Kruse writes these words of appreciation: "I have been a constant reader of your most valuable paper ever since it was started, and consider it the best of all papers; and as for the 'Encyclopaeia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World,' it is far ahead of any work I have read on that subject."

"Cor." writes: "The Church of the Spirit, of Springfield, Mass., is the name of a new society recently organized and incorporated. The president of the State Association, Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, assisted in the new movement, of which the following are some of the officers: President, H. G. Hawkins: vice-president, H. A. Budington; clerk, D. N. Sackett; corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. A. Cummings; treasurer, C. J. Leonard. The society proposes to build a church. Mr. W. H. Bach is speaking here each Sunday, and is well liked. He has assisted in organizing a lyceum."

T. C. Jefferis writes from St. Joseph, Mo.: "We had five spiritual meetings in this city yesterday: Two at 8th and Francis streets: two at 6th and Edmund streets, and one at the Crawford theater, All had large audiences. A wonderful spiritual awakening is taking place in St. Joseph."

C. C. B. writes that for a number of years, in pursuing his business he has worked in the homes of from four to ten families in a week. He is able to tell what church they belong to, the moment he enters a house. He has found the happiest families and most reliable among the Spiritualists and the advanced Christian Scientists. "Since I have investigated Spiritualism, I have not met a man whom I could not convert to Spiritualism, had I the means to prove it. I hope in the near future to develop some spiritual gift whereby I can prove to the poor, hungry souls, that there is a life after death. That is all they ask. My heart aches when I enter some of the poor families where there isn't a spark of spirituality visible. I have seen some strong mediums who seemed utterly unconcerned to spread the light or teach the ignorant who really needed, and suffered from the want of it."

Entertainment, social and hop, given under the auspices of Students of Nature, Merrick Hall, 1739 Milwaukee avenue, Saturday, November 28. Tickets 15 cents. A good time promised. Refreshments served.

Henry Hubbard, of Painesville, Ohio, writes: "Mrs. Lucetta Curtis, of Mishawaka, Ind., has just concluded a course of lectures here on 'Occult Science," and has favorably impressed her class as one who understands the philosophy she teaches, and also has the faculty to impress her teachings upon her pupils. When she left us, a shadow passed over our lives, but was replaced by a recollection of the beautiful philosophy she teaches, the holy aspiration she stimulates by her pure presence and pronounced individuality, and a desire to follow her to a higher moral and spiritual development. We hope to meet her again."

Mrs. Allie Lindsay Lynch, Chicago, writes: "Mrs. Lamon is from Cincinnati and Miss Taylor from New York, and these ladies will hold regular musical seances on Monday nights at 8 o'clock. I have attended one of these seances and passed a pleasant evening, listening to fine music and an address by the guide of Miss Taylor. Emma Abbott sang through the organism of Mrs. Lamon, and a friend who was with me remarked that he would have judged the singer to be some fine prima donna—which was true. For myself I only know I enjoyed it all, but am no musical critic. But I can say that Miss Taylor's guide gave descriptions of spirit friends that I recognized, and Mrs. Lamon's guide addressed an impromptu poem to me, regarding my personal work for humanity, which was both beautiful and encouraging, and I may be permitted to acknowledge as being true. I trust these workers will find a welcome in our city. For this reason alone, I offer these words."

Dr. Dean Clarke writes from Grand Rapids: "Although the weather and counter attractions, and a much-to-be-regretted division of the Spiritualists of this beautiful city have prevented large audiences from hearing me, I am slowly winning public attention, and if, as is probable, I continue after this month, I may reasonably hope for a full house, as I have received congratulations from competent judges who assure me that as soon as my gifts are known an intelligent public will patronize them. Twenty-seven years ago I was State missionary in Michigan, but a new generation is now carrying on our work, and it seems I must make a reputation all over again. As age and experience and study have better qualified me, and my inspirers can better use my psychical powers, I look for success. Address 178 Ionia street, Grand Rapids, Mich."

A correspondent writes from Allegheny, Pa.: "Mrs. Mattie E. Hull, of Chicago, is serving the First Church of Spiritualists in this city. She follows Mr. Hull, who was with the church last month. Mrs. Hull's work is entirely different from that of her husband, yet in her line she is as interesting and efficient as he is in his. The audiences have increased from the beginning of Mrs. Hull's administration until the present, and her discourses, always interesting and instructive, are delivered in a manner that holds the rapt attention of the audience. Mrs. Demorest, an old and valued medium, supplements Mrs. Hull's discourses with readings and tests at nearly every session. This, of course, attracts many who are investigating and prepares them for the philosophy."

W. H. Bach is meeting with excellent success at Springfield, Ohio.

J. J. Morse, who has shed an excellent intellectual light in California during the past year, is now on his way to London, Eng. He is an efficient worker in the cause of truth.

A reader writes from Elgin, Ill.: "Mrs. Lee Norie Claman, of Chicago, came into our midst a few days ago, and favored us with a fine lecture and some beautiful tests. The mayor of our beautiful city threw open the council chamber in the city hall, free of charge to this talented woman to hold the meeting. A very large crowd gathered; the seating capacity being taxed to the utmost many had to stand. Mrs. Claman is doing a wonderful work in the missionary field, and we feel Elgin needs a revival in spiritual philosophy."

Mrs. Ida P. A. Whitlock has just closed an engagement at Salem, Mass., the society regretting her inability to serve them further this season. She would like to correspond with some societies west in reference to engagements; also with camp associations with a view of making a route of the Western camps between June 20 and August 1. She may be addressed for the present at 27 Atlantic avenue, Providence, R. I.

HELL, PARADISE, GEHENNA

Their Significance as Used in the Bible.

To the Editor:—Not long ago I received a letter from which the following is an extract:

"Will you please tell me where I can find Paradise, where Christ and the thief went from the cross? Some time ago you wrote something in The Progressive Thinker about Paradise being Hell. One of our preachers here disputes it."

In answer to this, I will say I do not remember what I wrote for The Progressive Thinker, but I think that no minister who knows anything will dispute that Paradise is one department of Hades, rendered Hell in our Bible. Peter, in his sermon on the day of Pentecost, in Acts, ii, 27, quotes from Ps., xvi, 10, as follows: "Because thou wilt not leave my soul in Hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption." In verse 31 he comments on this as follows: "He (David) seeing this, before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in Hell, neither did his flesh see corruption." The orthodox people and the orthodox creeds all use this text to prove that Christ went to Hell. But when he went to Hell he went to Paradise. See Luke, xxiii, 46.

At this writing I am without a library, as mine is on the road from Chicago to Boston, but I have a Lexicon of the New Greek Testament with me. In that I find the following definition of the three words—Hades, Gehenna and Paradise.

"Hades—The invisible abode or mansion of the dead; the place of punishment, Hell; the lowest place, or condition. Luke, x, 15."

"Gehenna—The Valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem, once celebrated for the horrid worship of Moloch, and afterwards polluted with every species of filth, as well as the carcasses of animals, and dead bodies of malefactors; to consume which, in order to avert the pestilence such a mass of corruption would occasion, constant fires were kept burning; hence, Hell; the fires of Tartarus, the place of punishment in Hades. Matt., v, 29, 30; x, 28; xviii, 9."

"Paradise—Paradeisos, (of Oriental origin)—A park, a forest, where wild beasts were kept for hunting; a pleasure park, a garden of trees of various kinds. Used by the LXX for the Garden of Eden; in the New Testament, the celestial paradise."

It seems to me that this is enough to make the matter plain, and to show that I had authority for the statement I made. As I before said, I do not remember what I may have written on the subject, but I know myself so well that I know that I did not write anything contrary to the above. On the positions here taken, I also know the world so well that I know no one will dispute me to my face on this question.

MOSES HULL.

SPIRITUAL MUSIC.

A Critique on President Barrett's Views.

To the Editor:—It is not pleasant to differ with one who says so much truth and so inspiringly as does Bro. Barrett in his address. But I should be false to the truth we both so dearly love, were I to pass its incorrect portions unnoticed. He says: "The right kind" of music is what is needed, which is "good music." The latter term is invariably employed by writers and speakers when they mean music by a trained choir, as the elements in congregational singing are not "good;" and thus the question comes up: Shall the public presentation of our gospel of consolation in singing and speaking be delegated to an ordained few, or shall all, cultivated and crude, take part?

If Bro. Barrett wants good music for the trained choir, I think we will have to wait a long time before we have better inspirations than have been given by Prof. Longley—their excellence having already immortalized them through use by societies and camps.

Bro. Barrett says "the melodies do not catch the public ear and fasten themselves on the public heart." The history of our popular melodies proves this is not so; as their accorded popularity is due to their simplicity and excellence. But he says that our vital truths, which touch so deeply through the spoken words, are lost through the memory of some past use of the same air. Has Bro. Barrett tried it? Has he heard our gospel unitedly sung by a congregation, to old melodies thus spiritualized and vitalized? If not, he cannot know this, and the statement is an opinion only. If our good and gifted brother had the mediumistic experience of others in this matter, the opinion would be reversed; for the process of their production would of itself prove it is not so. Through inspiration truth in measured words can most certainly be specially fitted to simple airs, so that all trace of the past association of these airs with other words is entirely lost in the rendering.

I would sum up the difficulties of the situation in the general apathy of Spiritualists on this important subject, shown in their neglect to intelligently investigate what is already in their possession, and in the inherited prejudice and bias from habits religiously formed as to the Sunday use of secular music; and this is why we are generally to-day singing Christian doctrine instead of our own loved gospel.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

THE LARGEST SPIRITUAL PAPER ON THIS EARTH

It has the Largest Circulation by far, and Presents Each Week the Largest Amount of Reading Matter, Treating upon Spiritualistic, Scientific and Occult Subjects. Those who do not take it are left in the rear o the Procession.

Dr. J. M. Peebles will soon start again to make a tour around the world.

E. W. Sprague is serving the First Society of Spiritualists of Rochester, Ind., for November. His engagement at Erie, Pa., for the month of December has been canceled on account of the "practical disbandment" of that society. He is open for engagements for December and January. He goes to Philadelphia, Pa., for February. Address him for November at Rochester, Ind., later, 965 Grove street, Meadville, Pa.

Dr. T. Wallace will hold free circles for healing and development at his house every Wednesday afternoon at 2 p. m. 754 62d street. Station O.

Omega writes: "The forecasting of national destiny by the position, form, formation, features and other material conditions, appears to be rapidly conforming into a science as illustrated in the progressive lectures of Oliver M. Babcock, of Philadelphia. These lectures embrace history, geography, philosophy and prophecy in one grand theme, which has proven very attractive wherever delivered, as they are illustrated by novel and unique charts, on which are pointed out the course of empire, the laws which govern its movements and how this law is operating to produce results in this country; where the great cities of the future will stand, and rule the destinies of commerce, is clearly pointed out. In its full application the subject embraces also the formation and government of worlds and the operation of mechanical energy in the hands of man. The professor is intimately acquainted with Mr. Keely and has been authorized by this noted inventor to represent him in public discourse. His explanations of Keely's wonderful processes are heard with rapt attention and enthusiasm."

A STATE CAMP IN PROSPECT.

To the Spiritualists of Missouri.

It has devolved upon the undersigned to announce that the temporary organization of a State camp for Missouri and neighboring localities has recently been effected. The organization should be made permanent as soon as possible. To that end a meeting of all who are disposed to encourage and assist is hereby called, to be held in the city of Springfield on the — day of December. The meeting will adopt a permanent organic basis; elect an executive board; take steps toward legalizing the association by chartering as a branch of the State Association (which latter is now chartered with the National); consider reports, propositions and suggestions as to the best locality for the camp; decide, if possible, and appoint a purchasing committee to secure the tract; raise funds; arrange for a thorough canvass of the State in the interest of the camp, and take any other steps desirable and feasible.

Let every person, reading this call, who feels an interest in the development of Spiritualism in this part of the continent, immediately address the present secretary. You will receive in reply printed matter of importance. Do not delay, as time presses.

It is proposed to organize a stock company and to place the shares of stock at the very lowest denomination, namely, one dollar each, so as to enable each person interested to secure at least one share, and thus become, to that extent, a proprietor. Each shareholder to have one vote.

The exact date of meeting will be made known through correspondence.

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records," Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional." This book, by the well-known Father Chiniquy, reveals the degrading, impure influences and results of of the Romish confessional, as poved by the sad experience of many wrecked lives. Price, by mail, $1. For sale at this office.

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. W. M. Lockwood. Prof. Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents an succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. For sale at this office. Price 25 cents

"The Philosophy of Spirit, and the Spirit-World." By Hudson Tuttle. A most able and interesting presentation of a most important subject. Every Spiritualist and every inquirer into the proofs and philosophy of Spiritualism should have this excellent book. Cloth, $1. For sale at this office.

MIND AND MATTER.

Failure of Scientists in the Investigation of Psychic Phenomena.

A Philosophical Discussion of the Subject

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

The old methods of psychology have shown themselves profitless and have become obsolete. Science in its merciless conclusions from the data furnished by matter has ruled spirit out of the world, and replaced it by the potentialities of the atom.

It must be confessed that the discussions of the metaphysical school have been little more than a conflict over words, and a classification of definitions which were idle rubbish. When this investigation has assumed a theological aspect, there was no reason given for the existence of the spirit other than for the pleasure of its creator, and his pleasure rested on the arbitrary will of that being. Creation became a miracle, and the life of every human being a constant miracle of divine interposition.

This interpolation of spirit cannot endure in an age when everything is submitted by science to the control of law. We must admit either that spirit is sustained by as fixed and unchanging laws as control the physical world, or that it has no existence except as a phantasm of the fancy. It must be studied as a positive reality, or given over to the vain speculation of those who believe they are able to explain its phenomena by definitions and metaphysical speculation.

The scientists have never approached the realm of spirit, which they have regarded as the peculiar province of religion and of the theologian. They have returned the admonition of the priest with the scorn of contempt, for beyond their senses they granted nothing. They came to the study of man from the physical side, and saw not the other aspect of his twofold nature. Even his physical being they approach from different ways of study.

develops the form. He says that life began in protoplasm, in the unrecorded ages of the past, and step by step, through mollusk, fish, saurian and mammal, has arisen by the "struggle for existence," and "survival of the fittest," until the mammal, by strangely fatuitous chances, has become a human being. As the human body is a modified animal form, so the intellect is a modified instinct, the highest conscientiousness being only the result of accumulated specimens of what is for the best. There is no indication of a creative intelligence, and if he possess an immortal spirit, so does the fish, the mollusk and the speck of protoplasm.

has his method, that of analysis. He takes the vital tissues and resolves them into their elementary parts. He tells us that there is so much hydrogen, carbon and nitrogen in the muscles; so much lime and phosphorus in the bones; so much phosphorus in the nerves and iron in the blood. He separates these elements in retort and crucible, and weighs them with nicety to the thousandth of a grain. He has made the ultimate analysis, and this is all he has discovered. Life is the result of the union of these elements; mind the burning of phosphorus in the brain, and as for spirit it is quite unessential.

The chemist has finished his work and placed in the museum the result of his analysis of a human body. In a large glass jar is the water it contained—clear, crystal water, such as flashes in the sunlight of a rainbow-arching shower, or a dewdrop sparkling on the petal of a lily. There are about eight or ten gallons, for the body is three-fourths water. There is a small jar of white powder representing lime; another, still smaller, the silex; another phosphorus. There are homeopathic vials containing a trace of sulphur, of iron, magnesia, potash, soda; vials great and small containing almost all the elements. Here we have what was once a human being. We have everything that went to make him, except one, which lacking, these elements are lifeless and of no more value than water from the river and earth from its banks: the vital, or psychic principle.

Place the contents of all the lesser jars in the one containing the water, shake, dissolve and manipulate—dead and inert they remain, and will remain. The living form had its origin in the remote past, and its atoms were brought into union by a vital process thus began, which must traverse a certain path. Phosphorus may be essential to give activity to the brain, and a given amount of thought may correspond to a fixed amount of phosphorus burned in nerve tissue. To call the ingredients of these bottles a human being would be like calling a pile of brick, mortar or lumber a house.

The anatomist has another method, with the knife, by which he cuts and carves his way into the temple of life, and because he finds nothing in the dead shrine, triumphantly declares nothing exists.

WHAT IS BEYOND THE STRIFE FOR EXISTENCE.

What, O, Science, is there beyond the grave which shuts down with adamantine wall between this life and the future? The answer comes: Beyond? There is nothing. Do not dream, but know the reality. What becomes of its music after the instrument is destroyed? Where is the house of the bee when the insect has passed on its busy wings? Where is the light of the lamp after the oil is burned? Where is the heat of the grate after the coal is consumed? Given the conditions and you have music, light and heat: when these conditions perish you have nothing. Destroy the brain, and mind disappears as the music when the instrument is broken. This material conception of nature is into which, by some unknown process, matter and force were placed. The pot seethes, and out of the seething conflict foams up to the surface life in its infinite changes. The savants stand around its brim, like Shakspeare's witches, and chant a technical gibberish about laws; pre-existence and correlation of force; the indestructibility of energy; eternity of matter; the potentiality of the atom; the struggle for existence; the survival of the fittest, lauding each other's profundity of sight, while the sharpest-eyed see nothing beneath the foaming scum.

At the threshold of the discussion of the problem of mind and spirit we have that of life. Life is the gateway to the realm of spirit, and beyond that gateway lie the questions we seek to solve.

The brain is the point of contact between spirit and matter, and as far as the manifestations of that spirit are related to the material world while connected with the physical body, it must be by and through that organ. Whatever the material scientist may say, the fact of mind, of intellectual powers, remains unexplained by their theories. There is absolutely no proof of the transformation of heat or electricity into thought, which they maintain as self-evident. As Tyndall eloquently expresses, a chasm exists between mind and matter which cannot be passed.

Passed to Spirit-Life.

Kate Osborn, the estimable wife and companion of Chas. J. Osborn, passed out of the form on the last day of October. From childhood she was deprived of mortal sight, but was rewarded with that spiritual vision that enabled her to see and know of the presence of her spirit friends. In inspirational states she often delivered poems of beauty and worth, some of which adorned the pages of our Spiritual papers.

For months she has been unable to leave her room, and feeling it was to be her last physical sickness, she suggested the manner of conducting funeral exercises, which were touching and instructive to Spiritualists as well as to those not educated in our faith.

Her friends were many; her enemies, none; and the Spiritualists of St. Louis will miss her physical presence at their meetings, as well as her inspirations often voiced in the mediums' meeting and other gatherings.

M. S. BECKWITH.

Proposed Camp for Texas.

We are still working for the good of the cause of Spiritualism in this section. After the lecture on Sunday, 15th inst., a call meeting was had for the purpose of organizing a permanent camp-meeting, to be located at or near Fort Worth, Texas.

The meeting was called to order by Allen Franklin Brown, our present lecturer. On motion he was elected temporary chairman of the association and J. L. Bushong was elected temporary secretary.

On the whole there was quite a little interest manifested in the meeting. The plan of the association was discussed, committee on constitution and by-laws appointed, and several hundred dollars of stock subscribed. The plan as discussed, is to make it a joint stock company, and we hope that our brother Spiritualists in Texas will come forward and help us to make a grand success financially as well as spiritually. While it is proposed to locate it at or near Fort Worth, it is not proposed to make it an exclusive local association. We want the co-operation of the entire State, if we can get it.

It is proposed to run it on strictly business principles; to have ample funds on hand when the camp opens to pay all lecturers and mediums, and to employ only the best talent for our platform.

We trust that we may have the hearty co-operation of the Spiritualists of the State and the good wishes of our more favored Northern camps.

J. L. BUSHONG,
Temporary Secretary.

TRIBUTE TO E. B. RUGGLES.

Another Worker Gone to Her Reward.

Many friends and co-workers of Emily B. Ruggles will be grieved to learn of her passing to Spirit-life, on the 20th of October. The cause loses one of its most faithful and efficient workers.

Mrs. Ruggles was born March 14, 1830, in Dutchess county, N. Y., of Quaker ancestry. This, in a degree, may account for her keeping in the van of all reformatory and humanitarian movements. She had been a Spiritualist for forty-four years; and during that period had occupied a very prominent place in all that could advance the interest of Spiritualism, During all the time her home was the center of all phases of phenomena. In the course of her active life she has become personally known to most of the prominent lecturers and mediums that have been before the public. Many who have taken a prominent part in literature and occult matters were her personal friends and have enjoyed her boundless hospitality—A. J. Davis, Stephen Pearl Andrews, S. B. Brittan, and many others too numerous to mention in this notice. Madam H. P. Blavatsky and Col. Olcott originated the theosophical movement while living with her. She was a friend and co-worker with Victoria Woodhull and Tennie C. Claflin, and stood bail for them during the famous Beecher trial.

The last fifteen years of her life have been passed in Brooklyn, N. Y., where she has taken a prominent part in all the various Spiritualistic societies. Her home has always been open to all Spiritualists. Mediums were afforded an opportunity to demonstrate their various gifts, and recommended when worthy, and many have been in this way assisted to fields of usefulness that would, perhaps, never have had an opportunity otherwise.

A boundless charity and kindness of spirit characterized her life. She was a friend to the friendless—a physician to the mind and spirit of many unfortunate and unsuccessful spiritualistic workers. No one ever sought shelter and was refused—all were served alike—the rich and the poor all found a cheerful word and sympathetic ear. The Advance Conference was organized in her house, Mrs. Helen Walton and Mrs. Ruggles being the two founders, and its subsequent success has been mainly due to her untiring energy and intelligent supervision. She was also a prominent worker and leading spirit in the Woman's Progressive Union, and her place will be very difficult to fill.

Memorial services were held by the Advance Conference, many prominent Spiritualists being present, many old friends speaking words of eulogistic prose, and the following poetry was read. G. Sterling Wines.

LINES TO E. B. RUGGLES.

The voice has said:
"Oh! priestess of the upper shrine,
The truth you tell is all sublime,
The work you do anears divine,
Your life is real."

In after years,
When all that now alive are dead;
Whose joys and suffering long have fled,
And all their words of life are said—
Forget their tears.

Some perfect day
A clear, full voice the air shall fill,
Of earthly deeds done with right will,
And which you've wrought all quiet still
In earth's sad way.

Wherever be
That group of mortals passing meet,
On broad highway or public street,
Shall to each other kindly greet
Thy memory.
In love abide.
When no more human hearts are wrung
By cruel slander's wicked tongue,
Then will thy history be sung—
There justified.

Beyond life's sea,
Where angels trail their robes of white,
And every soul hath its requite
Within the book of love and light,
Her name will be.

Through many a snare
She passes onward, calm, serene;
Her thorny road, with grief and joy between;
While by her side walks now the Nazarene—
Her cross to bear.

In time to come,
When evil hearts in silence sleep,
And thoughtless ones have cause to weep.

Cold ingrates, too, their dues shall keep
With palsied tongue.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE.

For the Home, the Lyceum and Societies.

A Manual of Physical, Intellectual and Spiritual Culture.

COMPILED BY EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

A COLLECTION OF MUSIC AND Songs, Golden Chain Recitations, Memory Gems, Choral Responses, Funeral Services, Programs for sessions, Parliamentary Rules. Instructions for Organizing and conducting Lyceums, Instructions for Physical Culture, Calisthenics and Marching; Banners, Standards, the Band of Mercy, etc.; a book by the aid of which a Progressive Lyceum, a Spiritual or Liberal Society may be organized and conducted without other assistance. It supplies the wants of Spiritual Societies for fresh Spiritual songs, with music free from the dismal tone of the old hymnology. It furnishes a unique selection of choice readings and responses such as no other selection contains. It gives a practical system of graceful calisthenics, every step of which is made plain by engravings. It gives instructions how to make the badges and banners and instructs in marching. It shows how to establish a Band of Mercy as auxiliary to the Lyceum, and has all the most beautiful songs which have been gathered up by that movement.

The author and compiler of this Guide is eminently prepared for the task by years of devoted labor in the Lyceum. The book is the result of practical work and tested by the interest awakened in the actual session of the Lyceum.

While intended for the working Lyceum, the guide is admirably adapted to the needs of the family, supplying 76 pages of new spiritual music and words found nowhere else, except in sheet form at many times the cost. The book has been placed at the remarkably low price of 50 cents, sent postpaid.

The distinguished author, Hudson Tuttle, requires no introduction to the readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, but the following headings of chapters will show them what they may expect from the book:

CONTENTS:—An Idyl—Fordham—Building the Church—The Evangelist—Blood—The Saloon—The Lost Daughter—Law—The Harvest of Souls—Jane Grey—The Mother of Cain—Evolution—Stella—The Cell—Death—A Step Forward—The Home Circle—The Double Role—Heresy—Annette The Bank Robbery—Liberty—All Is Well That Ends Well—The New Church—The New Way; Led to the Light

Every chapter is devoted to one idea, and the whole presents so many tableaux moving onward to the climax. The fiendish career of the revivalist is contrasted with the character of the honest minister and the thinking agnostic. The steps by which a preacher emerges from the church, and the difficulties he meets are graphically presented. The new church and progressive lyceum evolved out of the old, form an interesting study to those seeking new methods.

It is a beautiful volume of 223 pages, and the price in accordance with our new departure, is 80 cents, postpaid, or five copies for $1.25. For sale at the office of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

THE UNKNOWN LIFE

—OF—

Jesus Christ

—BY—

NICOLAS NOTOVITCH.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

Since the writing of the New Testament no book has appeared of as great importance to Christianity as the UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST.

This volume, written by the discoverer of the manuscript, contains a thrilling account of the privations and perils encountered in his search for it, a literal translation of the original manuscript, and lastly a critical analysis of what it contains.

This work contains 185 neatly printed pages, and is published on the basis of combining cheapness and excellence. Price, neatly bound, one dollar. Paper cover, price 25 cents, postage 5 cents.

LIFE IN TWO SPHERES.

A Fascinating Work.

The readers of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will remember the story under the above title, by Hudson Tuttle, which was published in its columns. At the time, constant inquiries were made as to its appearing in book form. This wish has now been gratified. It makes a volume of 243 pages, in style and form like the "Convent of the Sacred Heart," with a finely-engraved likeness of the author on the cover. The scenes of the story alternately shift from earth to the spirit spheres, and the philosophy of Spiritualism, the occupation and modes of life of spiritual beings, are presented in the pleasing form of narrative.

The following are the chapter-titles: Introduction; The House of the Sage; Home of the Miser; The Low Societies; Hades; Christmastide in the Spheres of Light; Christmastide and the Golden Gate; The Unhappy Marriage; Easter Day in Heaven; A Visit to the Earth; The Change Called Death; Coming to the Knowledge of the Light; The Society Again Visits Earth; The Forsaken and Despised; Discussion; A Visit to a Distant Globe; Reunion in the Spirit-world; Contentedness Not Goodness; Address of the Sage.

It is a book the Spiritualist will be delighted with; a book in which the investigator will find answers to ever-recurring questions; a book which will interest the church member, nor repel the most prejudiced. The price in paper is 50 cents; muslin $1; postpaid.

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES.

A New Edition, Profusely Illustrated.

"I choose that a story should be founded on probability, and not always resemble a dream. I desire to find nothing in it trivial or extravagant; and I desire above all, that under the appearances of fable, there may appear some latent truth, obvious to the discerning eye, though it escape the observation of the vulgar."—VOLTAIRE.

CONTENTS: "The White Bull," a Satirical Romance; "Zadig, or Fate," an Oriental History; "The Sage and the Atheist;" "The Princess of Babylon;" "The Man of Forty Crowns;" "The Huron, or Pupil of Nature;" "Micromegas," a Satire on Mankind; "The World as It Goes;" "The Black and the White;" "Memnon, the Philosopher;" "Andre Des Touches at Siam;" "Babaec;" "The Study of Nature;" "A Conversation With a Chinese;" "Plato's Dream;" "A Pleasure in Having no Pleasure;" "An Adventure in India;" "Jeannot and Colin;" "Travels of Scarmentado;" "The Good Brahmin;" "The Two Comforters;" "Ancient Faith and Fable."

One volume, post 8vo, 480 pages, with portrait and 82 illustrations. Extra vellum cloth, $1.50; postage, 15 cents.

"Voltaire's satire was keen and fine-pointed as a rapier."—Magazine of Am. History.

"A delightful reproduction, unique and refreshing."—Boston Commonwealth.

THE AGE OF REASON.

By Thomas Paine. Being an investigation of True and Fabulous Theology. A new and complete edition, from new plates and new type; 186 pages, post 8vo. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PEN-FLASHES FROM OHIO.

BY C. H. MATHEWS.

"What mad lover ever died
To gain a soft and gentle bride?
Or, for a lady tender-hearted,
In purling streams or hemp departed?" —Hudibras.

Here is one: Albert Barton, of Oil City, Pa., met Miss Sadie O'Brien, at Niagara Falls, and as she was a charming and pretty young girl, he fell in love with her. The course of true love didn't run smooth, and "he was jilted most unceremoniously." He became despondent and wrote to the chief of police: Oct. 10, By the time this letter is received my body will be at the bottom of Niagara's roaring rapids. My last words are that I may met the girl in Hell that ruined my life; curse her until death. I care no more for life! I care no more for any one! I hope her stone heart will bleed if she ever hears the contents of this letter, From A. H. B., Pennsylvania.

Now, if this poor, ignorant young man hadn't attended Sunday school and church, it isn't likely he would ever have learned there was such a place as Hell, and might have found some maiden who would have requited his love, and he might have lived many years.

A lover's quarrel and loss of employment caused Miss Lizzie Mary Colville, of Alleghany, Pa., to commit suicide. She went to the gates of the Bethel Lutheran church, of which she was a member, Oct. 8, and swallowed a six ounce bottle of carbolic acid. She was in love with one of the male members of the choir and was willing to die for his sake. She died almost immediately after taking the deadly draught. She probably thought it was "better to have lived and loved than never to have loved at all," and while the prayer-meeting was being held she gave up her youthful life, and all for love.

"Man's love is of man's life a thing apart,
'Tis woman's whole existence: man may range
The court, camp, church, the vessel and the mart;
Sword, gown, gain, glory, offer in exchange
Pride, fame, ambition to fill up his heart,
And few there are whom these cannot estrange;
Men have all these resources, women but one,
To love again, and be again undone." —Byron.

THE LORD'S LAMBS.

"Wild Tumult in a Church," is the modest head-line in the Pittsburg Post, of Oct. 26, as to what occurred Sunday 25th in the Welsh Congregational church. It was caused by an effort to elect a pastor, Rev. J. Twyson Jones, who, it was alleged, "had confessed to the board of deacons of gross misconduct against the moral law;" and yet we are told "the feminine portion of the congregation are his staunchest supporters." The women shouted: "We want Jones; Jones is our man!" While this was going on, "a man with a voice like a double action foghorn, shouted; Let us sing 'Lord, in this vale of peace.'" But the women gained their point, and Jones was employed again at a snug salary of $1,500 a year. One of Jones' opposers said "it was the most disgraceful thing in the annals of church history in America." An attempt was made to exclude the reporter, but it failed, which is why I get the news of how the Lord's lambs disported themselves at a tumultous religious meeting, in Pittsburg, Pa.

OUR MOSES.

I see by the Pittsburg Post of Oct. 5, that "Rev. Dr. Moses Hull tells all about the spirits of the other world and combats orthodox theories." He took for his text Job 15: 14, "Shall a man live again?" He said: "The ecclesiastical idea of immortality has been proven false. Indeed, the churches are in a quandary; they are in a state of unrest and doubt on this question, and are afloating around in a sea of perplexity. Spiritualists have destroyed faith by direct evidence, and through our mediums have brought back to this world departed souls." Mr. Hull is fluent, says the Post, "his voice is well modulated, and he held his audience by his charming style." The writer has heard Moses Hull in debate and testifies that there are no better missionaries in the Spiritualistic field than Moses and Mattie E. Hull, his good wife.

INSIDIOUS PROSELYTERS.

Mrs. S. C. Adams, of Salem, Oregon, has expressed some very cogent thoughts on the Turkish government and religion, censuring "the insidious proselyters," who are meddling in matters that ought not to concern them. The article might be studied by our government officials and even the President might profit by it.

JEW AND CHRISTIAN.

What is called "a remarkable scene," is that which occurred in a Congregational church at Columbus, Ohio, Oct. 11, when Rev. Gladden lectured: "Can a Jew become a Christian?" Reciting the persecution the Jews have received in the name of Christianity, he "thought it not strange the Jews did not readily embrace the Christian religion." Rabbi Wise, a noted Israelite, being present, "rushed down the aisle and grasped the preacher's hands." The rabbi was invited into the pulpit, and said, "it was not Christ, but anti-Christ, in the nations that had persecuted them." Rabbi Wise then pronounced the benediction. When it is known that some of the most enlightened and best educated Jews, such as Rabbi Schindler, of Boston, Mass., have lectured at Spiritualist camp-meetings, it looks as though the Christian clergy had caught on, and were becoming slowly liberalized. "All's well that ends well." Many years ago Christian England, by statute, removed the disabilities of the Jews; and some of the most eminent men in England and the United States have been of that downtrodden race.

PAY THE PREACHER.

The Presbyterian University at Wooster, Ohio, Oct. 15, indorsed the president's report "prohibiting intercollegiate athletic games on account of their demoralizing influence. Yet "there was a strong feeling in the synod in favor of the games." The students will kick. Rev. John A. Bower, an aged minister, has sued the synod for $150, back pay, for filling charges at Caldwell and Olive, O., from November, 1893. He got only $50 and now he wants the bill paid, according to agreement. The scriptures say "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and I think so too. Perhaps that church is one of the "soulless corporations" so numerous in these latter days? Pay the preacher and make him happy.

Witteburg College, Springfield, Ohio, is par excellence a Christian institution, and if I mistake not, is under the patronage of the Lutheran church. At any rate, Oct. 7, 1896, it was the scene of a terrific battle between the sophomores and the freshmen classes. Over fifty students participated, some using clubs. One of the combatants was so badly injured that he had to be carried off the field and taken to bed. The sophomores had posted placards calling the freshmen "babies." The trouble began in the chapel, where the president was compelled to dismiss the exercises. Here is where the young men are supposed to be trained to become ministers of the "Gospel of Jesus Christ." A pretty set, truly, these, to be sent out into the world to teach the ethics of religion. A healthy public opinion should frown down such "heathenish" practice, and swift punishment should follow.

WELL! WELL!

In spite of the poverty of the times and the efforts of the parties to reform political grievances, the orthodox churches keep pounding away. Dedicatory services were held in the Church of God, College avenue, Pittsburg, Pa, Rev. Geo. Sigler, D. D., preached on "The Sword of the Lord and Gideon; thousands have overcome the combined powers of the world, the flesh and the Devil and have gone to heaven." Rev. J. R. Henry, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, "emphasized the unity of purpose among denominations, and he said that none of them cared how one another got to heaven so they got there." "Everybody for himself and the Devil take the hindmost," seemed to be the motto of this orthodox preacher. Well, well!

CREATED A RIOT.

The U. S. is only nominally a Christian country, and Sabbath observance is compulsory in only a few of the "benighted States;" yet the Sunday Observance League at Portsmouth, Ohio, created "a riot Oct. 18, by attempting to break up a ball game between the Portsmouth and Chillicothe teams. Over 150 arrests will be made on the charge of rioting." Those who desire to amuse themselves playing base ball on the seventh day of the week, or the first day, ought not to be interfered with, provided, of course, they do not disturb the goody-good religious folk in their devotions. This is one of the "unalienable rights" of the people, secured 120 years ago; "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."—"There are no necessary evils in government; its evils exist only in its abuses."—Jackson.

SOMETHING NEW.

The telephone line running from Rochester to Rock Dell, Minn., was broken about Oct. 1. Two young men of the latter place thought they would try a curious experiment and see the capacity of the human body to transmit sound. Lindale took the ends of the wire in either hand, while Anderson, having previously compared watches with his companion, went to a station four miles distant, and taking down the receiver, rang up a town on the line beyond where Lindale was stationed. The latter received a somewhat severe shock, but held the lines and the message was conveyed through his body. The dispatches, Oct. 1, from Minneapolis, convey this somewhat novel piece of intelligence, contradicting the assertion that there is nothing new under the sun.

EXPENSIVE LUXURY.

Old Trinity church, Pittsburg, Pa., after being closed four months for repairs, was reopened Oct. 4, grandly decorated. The Rev. Dr. Arundel spoke of sacrifice, and urged his congregation to raise money to wipe out the debt incurred in repairing the church. He reminded them that the communion vessels were almost worn out, and pleaded that donations of jewels, old silver and old gold be made, in order to get a new communion service. The church realizes the tightness of the times; but it must have all this costly paraphernalia, even if some of the flock are compelled to graze in very bare pastures. Religion is a very expensive luxury; but we must have it, at whatever cost. That is the opinion of the clergy.

WANT MORE MONEY.

The Presbyterian synod of Pennsylvania met at Bellefonte, Oct. 15. The report on church sustentation and home missions showed that $30,000 was needed to carry on the work. The amount contributed last year was only $19,500, $367 less than the year before. To general missionary work the synod has contributed $972,502 in the last ten years and to the home work only $147,890. "It was recommended that all assist in raising $31,000 this year." When the churches tax their members in this lavish manner, and send the money out of the country and for no useful purpose, it is no wonder they complain of the scarcity of money and demand more of it coined.

STRICKEN DOWN.

The archbishop of Canterbury, the primate of the "Established Church of England," was stricken down, and died, while kneeling in prayer, at Hawarden church, on Oct. 11, shocking many good, religious souls, while wondering at the "inscrutable providences of God." The church people, however, will continue to hug their delusions of salvation, in the belief of a vicarious atonement in "the blood of Christ that cleanseth from all sin." What a colossal delusion.

JUBILEE OF SPIRITUALISM.

To be Held in March of the Year 1898, S. E. 50.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF THE WORLD, GREETING:—At the late Convention of the N. S. A., held at Washington, D. C., President Barrett, in his annual address, recommended that there be held at Rochester, N. Y., in March, 1898, a ten days' celebration, to commemorate the Fiftieth Anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism.

The Convention referred the matter to the incoming Board of Trustees, with power to appoint some one to take charge of the organization of the Jubilee.

The undersigned was chosen by the National Board to fill that position; to report at their January meeting a plan of organization by which the celebration can be made a success, and at that time to decide whether to accept the permanent management of the same or not.

The writer has since received from President Barrett and Secretary Woodbury his commission as general manager of said Jubilee. The acceptance of said appointment permanently will depend very much upon the response to this appeal by the Spiritualists throughout the world, showing their interest in the event and willingness to co-operate and generously support the undertaking in a way that will provide for its ultimate success.

If a jubilee is to be held to commemorate that august event, there must be no failure, therefore all Spiritualists should resolve to give their best thought and energy to make it a grand affair. No doubt the railroads will give greatly reduced rates, as thousands of people will wish to attend.

Everyone who reads this notice is earnestly requested to write to the undersigned and give any practical ideas or suggestions they may desire, as to the scope of the celebration, what it should accomplish, and how to make it a success, that the writer may formulate from his own and the larger experience of the many older and abler workers, a plan that will crown the semi-centennial anniversary of the spirit-knockings heard March 31st, 1848, in the humble cottage at Hydesville, through the mediumship of the Fox sisters, with a halo of spiritual light that shall spread over and illumine the world, thereby giving a new impetus to our glorious cause, that humanity may be greatly benefited.

Money is and will be needed—a large amount of it—to carry forward the work. It is hoped that wealthy Spiritualists will contribute liberally, and everyone interested according to their means; even if it be only ten cents, send it!

Do not delay in this important matter, but please send in your contributions and suggestions at once, as no time can afford to be lost, if we are to make this celebration one worthy of our cause. If you cannot send the money now, send in your subscription, stating when to be paid.

Receipts will not be sent for small donations unless return postage accompanies the same, though a correct list of all subscribers will be kept.

Every society ought to take up at least one collection for this purpose now.

All speakers and mediums are earnestly requested to urge their audiences to assist, also to make personal appeals for aid to this enterprise.

The Spiritualistic journals throughout the world, to whom this appeal has not been sent, are fraternally requested to call attention to the celebration, to copy this in their columns, and kindly send a marked copy of the issue to the writer, together with their suggestions and offerings. The secular press also are respectfully asked to notice the coming Jubilee, and to state to whom subscriptions and inquiries are to be sent.

Address all communications, and make all donations payable to the undersigned. All hail the coming Jubilee!

SOULS AND BODIES.

Their Relation May Be Likened to That Between a Violin and the One Who Plays on It.

BY GEORGE H. HEPWORTH, EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK HERALD.

That ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God. —Romans, xii., 1.

He shall give delight unto thy soul.—Proverbs, xxix., 17.

The relation between a man's body and his soul may be likened to that between a violin and the man who plays on it.

A skillful player can bring good music out of a poor instrument, but he cannot do his best work unless the violin is capable of expressing the harmonies he has heard in his dreams.

In like manner the best instrument in the world produces poor music in the hands of a tyro. He handles something which he does not appreciate, and which, to a certain extent, loses its value because he cannot make it do what it is capable of doing.

The ideal music is made by a skilled player with a perfect violin.

So the soul and body must work together if the best results are to be attained. As God made it, the body is the noblest conceivable residence for the soul during this preliminary part of its career. It was not His intention, it was not a part of His plan that the ailments of the body should interfere with the normal development of the soul. If they do, it will be because some natural law has been broken. It is impossible to think of God as responsible for a body that is imperfect, and equally impossible to believe that a body could ever become imperfect or defective if God's wishes had been observed and His commands obeyed,

We have fallen from the grace of physical wholeness. The mere animal is better off than man in this respect. It follows its instincts, which make no mistakes, while we follow, not so much our reason, which would keep us from going frr astray, as our passions and appetites, which are capricious and reckless. The lion is perfect within his limitations. He lives without worry and dies without pain. He is like an exquisite piece of machinery, which does its work with ease until the power that drives it is checked. That will sometime be true of the human race. When we learn what it is that produces our maladies, and have strength of will to avoid it, we, too, shall live in health until the body, like an old house, tumbles down and the soul seeks a better home.

But the reform must commence in the mind and the heart. We have already begun to see that a man with impure thoughts cannot have a perfect body, and that there is a preservative element in high and holy thinking. Perhaps I may venture to go still further and say that when the mind has a vision of the perfect life the body will be somewhat affected thereby, and that the physical functions will make an effort to repair themselves when the soul consciously and practically lives and moves and has its being in Him whom no evil can touch.

I mean simply this, and the truth of what I say will be recognized by all—that disease is wholly abnormal, and that the only natural state is a state of health. We are not physically what we ought to be because we are not morally what we should be. The lower part of a man's nature has caused every malady from which the world suffers, and no effectual remedy can be found until the lower is made subject to the higher When men come to be more faithful, more loving and tender and charitable, the inheritance of nobler qualities will slowly obliterate our present heritage of physical evil and the perfect man will be seen on the earth.

The spring of all issues, good and bad, is in the heart and mind. Give me a perfect body to begin with, and if God's laws are my laws I shall keep that body perfect to the end of life's pilgrimage. Feed me on unworthy thoughts, stimulate my animal passions, make me selfish and greedy of forbidden pleasures, and the crooked mind will in time make my body crooked, for in the long run the mind is the body's master.

As I take my place on this standpoint and look abroad on human life I am oppressively impressed with the fact that what men need more than anything else, more than all things else, is the religion of the great Master of our souls. Give me no man's creed as a substitute, do not ask me to drink of the painted river on the canvas when I am thirsty, but give me that living water—the water of life it is significantly called—which is the secret of Christ and His power. I want to know Him personally, and care little to know simply about Him. I must have that which He had, must live the life He lived, must share His thoughts of God, His trust in the Father. Then my faith will make me whole, body and soul, and keep me so. If God dwells in me there is no room for evil there.

The religion of the day is too formal and perfunctory. It is not real and genuine, but adulterated with all sorts of notions and theories. It is the Christ we need, who could say, I and my Father are one, and who prayed that we might be one with Him in a like fashion.

God is willing, but man is unwilling. There is a conduit that leads from the mountain spring into the home, from God to the human heart. So long as the conduit is in perfect repair it will furnish all the spring-water we can use. But if the conduit is broken and the refreshing water escapes or only falls a dripping stream, drop by drop, the generosity of the spring counts for nothing.

In very truth, I think our formalism and folly have broken the conduit between us and God's great love. Our religion consists of only a few drops. Mend the conduit and all the love of heaven is at our service, Healthy bodies and noble souls will be the result when we accept the Christ in his fullness.

MORAL MEDIUMS.

Some Reflections Theron by C. W. Kates.

Considerable discussion of this subject dominated at the camp-meetings of this year. It is universally agreed that all mediums should be moral persons. There are others who think that a medium (being controlled or used by spirits) is a sort of demi-god and should not be criticised for personal habits and shortcomings. Some would drive out of the ranks of Spiritualists all who do not observe every moral propriety. Others would welcome, into every possible gathering, they who are called by any spirit (good or bad) to be a phenomenal medium.

Are not these both extreme views of the subject, calculated to express the idea of fanaticism? No one will decry morality—and everyone will never cease to hope for it amongst mediums.

And there is not a medium but would like to see a higher standard of morality amongst the Spiritualists at large. The public always bring to a medium the doubt of honor. Every investigator fears and talks of imposition. No test medium has yet been before the public but has been told: "You could easily be posted by some one to give the facts you do."

Are not mediums continually surrounded by dishonorable doubt? Is that conducive to more spiritual controls? Is it not one cause of why the medial controls are frequently of a lower intellectual order?

I have not observed that the Spiritualists very frequently consult the spirits for other than worldly selfish purposes. And how many local societies employ mediums to be spiritual comforters to their members? As a rule it is which one will draw the largest audience. Very little effort is made to hold members by making membership personally valuable and useful. Societies do not pay mediums a living price to work for them. The private circle and sittings must be given to support the medium properly. If all these were given, under associated jurisdiction, to prove spirit life or to afford spiritual comfort to members or properly interested parties, a higher form of mediumship would ensue and a better standard of morality would come as a natural sequence. A prominent slate-writing medium, a few years ago, was terribly addicted to strong drink and was seldom sober. He never gave a sitting without taking a drink of whiskey. Of course he had attracted a whiskey fiend who had entered spirit life and used the medium better than any other spirit could under the circumstances, and thus satisfied the craving of an appetite which spirit-life had not yet cured. We greatly condemned the medium at the time. Spiritualism was not made attractive by his personality. Meeting the medium some years later I observed a vast change. I saw a robust, ruddy, clear-minded and well-dressed person, quite to the contrast of his former self. I bluntly asked for the cause of the change. He replied: "I have quit giving private sittings." Not comprehending what that had to do with the form, I so queried. He said "Everybody brought me only selfish desire; and forced me to submit to extreme tests born out of doubt of me. And they would return again and again for just one more test. It made me hard-hearted—I learned to doubt that honor or justice lived in any human breast. I overtaxed myself; and I sought for narcotics and stimulants to supply the wastes I was forced to undergo. Hence I attracted a drink-loving spirit, and my habits were forced upon me. I only broke it by engaging my services to a positive employer who uses my psychic powers for proper and convenient investigation, or use, and I no longer am at the beck and call of all sorts of people with all sorts of magnetic forces." Does that not teach a valuable lesson to mediums and Spiritualists? Of course we want moral mediums!—But we must make it possible to have them. Let us give what we demand. A certain little city once fell in the way of Mrs. Kates and myself, and we wrote asking to arrange for a meeting. They replied: "If you will behave yourselves like a lady and gentleman we would like to have you come." As we had never killed any one, never stolen, never borrowed a dollar, and could not think of any very bad deeds done by us, we wrote: "Yours is just the place we want to visit." And we went there at an expense of about ten dollars, but the people donated seventy-five cents for our services at the meeting.

Now, I am justified in saying, if Spiritualists want honest and upright mediums, they should pay for their services. As a rule the dishonest fakir gets the good pay. I have heard all through my tour, since leaving Denver last May, that So and So have been here and swindled us, and behaved so immorally that we have no longer a local support for mediums. And we were asked to come and help them to build up again. Of course that meant poor pay or no pay. Our personal pocketbook cannot always afford it.

I have already said the Spiritualists should all read the Spiritual papers and be posted as to who are honorable and legitimate workers. That would be an easy mode to protect against unknown charlatans; for, as a rule, it is an unknown person who poses as a medium in order to swindle.

Mediums with reputation do not swindle! They are usually more free from immorality than the great body of people who pose as Spiritualists, and also than they who wear the livery of Christian ministers. We do not want to condemn any medium; but they should not be publicly employed unless a moral life is measurably observed. It should not be hypocritically expressed, neither should it be demanded in perfect expression. Mediums are human, and should be allowed many human foibles. But the medium and the Spiritualist should each embody in their lives honor, integrity, sobriety and justice, that as exemplars we may rear higher standards of virtue and plant the banner of truth upon higher pinnacles of thought and achieve greater human good.

THERE ARE FRAUDS.

Not All Mediums Are True.

Interesting Address of Dr. Fuller Before the Spiritualists Association.

The quarterly convention of the Massachusetts State Spiritualists' Association, at Springfield, was attended by a large number.

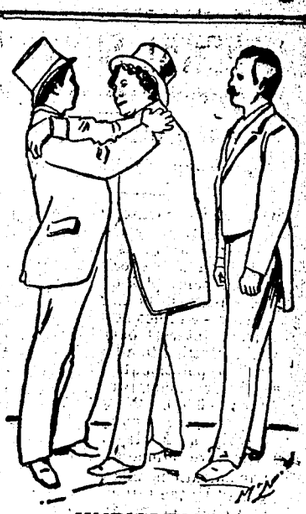
Following the opening remarks by Dr. G. A. Fuller of Worcester, president of the State Association, were the reports of the different officers and committees for the last quarter.

Mrs. Carrie F. Loring gave an exhibition of test mediumship. She told the names of spirits with whom she was conversing, and gave incidents in their lives. All these names were recognized by people in the audience as belonging to some of their deceased friends, and the incidents given of their lives were also remembered.

At the evening session Dr. George A. Fuller made an address defining his position in regard to clairvoyants and magnetic physicians. He said in part: "I do not wish to do any injustice to any honest people in those professions. At the same time there are very many reputable physicians who have been very nearly driven out of their business by a host of quacks, which has sprung up within the last few years. There are certain principles of medicine which it is absolutely necessary to learn by the study of books. I have taken a very different position from that of the regular practitioners, who, however, are always ready to meet me in consultation because I have studied the science of medicine as thoroughly as they. It is necessary to learn the principles which underlie all medical science.

"There are also fraudulent mediums and it is not best to claim that Spiritualists are all pure, for like all other forms of religious belief they have their black sheep. Spiritualism rakes all the way from hell to heaven and includes men of the most despicable character as well as the purest. The time has come when the mask must be thrown off and every man be judged by his life. There must be a cultured and enlightened mediumship, and while those who have worked for Spiritualism in the past deserve all honor, the work which they accomplished is not enough.

"Spiritualists must not fall behind the great liberal churches, the Unitarians and the Universalists, in their work for social progress. Let us come forward and establish grand educational institutions in the name of Spiritualism. I believe our body should have a religious as well as a financial organization. I have always held to that idea in the face of great opposition, though I was accused of having gotten it from Jesuit spirits. I am not as afraid of dead Jesuit spirits as I am of negligent Spiritualists. There are too many who are ready to shout at the camp-meetings, but who never do any work at home."



Dr. Hawkins advised all Spiritualists to form church organizations to get charters from the State and to connect themselves with the National Association.

Mrs. Carrie F. Loring approved of an educated mediumship. She said there is much diabolical nonsense afloat, and told of one lady who claimed to have had 527 Jesuit devils driven out of her. She said that a thousand such ideas cling to Spiritualism today, but that they must be driven into oblivion by education to a higher plane of thought.

After a revelation by Miss Lelianne Thall, Mrs. Juliet Yeaw, pastor of the Greenwich Independent church, delivered an interesting lecture on "Organization." She said in part: I am the oldest worker in the field—old enough, perhaps, if the angel world were willing that I should do so, to go on the retired list. The best we can do in return for the many favors that our angel friends have done for us is to make this earth a fit place for them to come and commune with us. Spiritualism now has a helpful past,—a history and a literature. It has been proved to rest on a scientific basis. Its truths are perfectly in harmony with natural laws. It is truly a religion, and one founded upon a basis which no other religion ever claimed to be built upon,—a sound, scientific basis. Contrary to other religions, it first got facts and then formulated its theory,—one accurate and reasonable. Its growth is marvelous—but it has been in a measure haphazard, and we need systematization. There is already a strong tendency to centralization and conservation. It is harmonization and equalization of the two great present-day thought and spiritual forces—conservation and liberalism—that Spiritualism seeks to accomplish. It should, and does, harmonize the intellectual and spiritual forces. The work before us is to more thoroughly systematize Spiritualism. We want our belief to become the property of the masses. We must look to other religions, whose sectarianism we scorn, but whose business methods and systems we admire. In those other faiths the heaven is one which has no attractions—because it is one of idleness; and a punishment that is less rational than even the world's material punishment, because it has no development and no object. If evangelical religion holds the place that it does today, it is not that it is so dear to those who profess it, but because they have builded not wisely but too well. It is essentially humanitarianism, and along that line does much good, in a material way. But there it ends. Not so Spiritualism—which inspires and warrants hope, love and memory. It is a voice which has broken in a night of superstition. It is our duty to make Spiritualism respectable, and the way to do so is for Spiritualists to be respectable. There is too much tendency to place Spiritualism on a legal basis. In view of the fact that, as we believe and know, thoughts make their impress upon their surroundings, upon walls and ceilings, I think it would be best to have consecrated halls and places of meeting.

"History of the Inquisition." Every citizen of our country should read this concise history of that Romish churchly institution known as the Inquisition. The animus of Romanism against all institutions, beliefs and parties not in conformity with the ruling powers of the Romish hierarchy is plainly shown in these statements of veritable history. The devilishness and murderous malignity of the "Holy Inquisition" is scarcely paralleled in all the world's records of inhuman atrocities. It is for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid for 25c.

"Cosmian Hymn Book." A collection of original and selected hymns, for liberal and ethical societies, for schools and the home; compiled by L. K. Washburn. This volume meets a public want. It comprises 258 choice selections of poetry and music, embodying the highest moral sentiment, and free from all sectarianism. Price, 50c. For sale at this office.

HYPNOTISM;

Its Facts, Theories and Related Phenomena, with Explanatory Anecdotes, Descriptions and Reminiscences.

BY CARL SEXTUS. THE BOOK IS largely a record of the facts and demonstrations which the author has seen, heard of or presented in his own experiments. The history of the various phases of the science is succinctly presented, and the various theories clearly stated. Many of the experiments described occurred in Chicago. The pictorial illustrations add much to the interest and value of the book, which will be found very interesting to the general reader, as well as helpful and instructive to the student. The work is a handsome volume of 300 pages, bound in cloth. Price, $2.00. For sale at the office of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

Researches in Oriental History.

BY G. W. BROWN, M. D.

One Vol. 12mo, 407 Pages, Cloth, $1.50.

GENERAL DIVISION.

1. RESEARCHES IN JEWISH HISTORY.
2. RESEARCHES IN ZOROASTRIANISM.
3. DERIVATION OF CHRISTIANITY.
4. WHENCE OUR ARYAN ANCESTORS?

The whole comprises an earnest but fruitless search for a Historical Jesus.

In this volume the Jews are clearly shown not to have been the holy and favored people they claim to have been. The Messianic idea is traced to the Bactrian Philosopher, 250 years B. C., and its history is outlined, following the waves of emigration, until it is fully developed into Christianity, with a mythical hero, at Alexandria, in Egypt, soon after the commencement of the Christian era.

The book demonstrates that Christianity and its central hero are mythical; that the whole system is based on fraud, falsehood, forgery, fear and force; and that its rites, ceremonials, dogmas and superstitions are but survivals of so-called paganism. It shows vast research among the records of the past; its facts are mostly gleaned from Christian authority; and no person can read it without instruction and profit, whether he reaches the same conclusions with the author or otherwise. THE PSYCHOGRAPH

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE . .

CURES CONSTIPATION!

And Many Liver and Kidney Troubles. It is a Most Pleasant Drink.

Among thousands of testimonials we receive, the following from W. H. Morse, Therapeutist and Consulting Chemist, of Garwood, N. J., speaks for itself:

"Let me commend to your notice the GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE, manufactured at Ayer, Mass., by the company of that name. It is not only a grateful, refreshing and stimulating beverage, relished by all, but, as well it is mildly laxative, health-promoting and thoroughly scientific in composition; in these essentials altogether unlike any other beverage for this purpose. It is well worthy of being brought before the public. W. H. MORSE."

A small package will be sent to any address for 35 cents, and a larger package containing twice as much, for 50 cents. This package will go as far as four pounds of coffee. All can drink this coffee that pure coffee will not agree with, and it DOES cure constipation. State rights for sale to manufacture and sell this coffee. A great money-maker!

Golden Laxative Coffee Co.,

An Old-Time Seance with Dr. C. E. Watkins.

To the Editor:—"Is that the house?" I inquired of the hack-driver, as there came in view a large house with a veranda running around it on all sides, like one of the old southern mansions.

"Yes, that's where the doctor lives; fine place, is it not?" he replied, and indeed it was, surrounded by large old elms.

"He calls the place Brookside Farm. A lovely brook runs along the side of his place, and it is full of trout. The doctor lets me fish there sometimes," said the driver.

This much I heard—the rest he was saying I heard not, as I was busily thinking of the years long ago, when the Doctor had no home, when he was a wanderer and home and all its meaning was not his, because he was a medium; and his own family disowned him. And now, before me was a home, and a most beautiful one, that was the Doctor's at last.

As we drove up the driveway I saw a young man mounting a pony that seemed to be so full of life that it looked for a moment as if the young man would have to give up his contemplated ride; but with a leap he was in the saddle, and with a hurrah he was off in a cloud of dust.

"That's the Doctor's son, Claude," said the hackman.

"Claude, Claude, why, he was but a child when I saw him last"—and again my mind went back to the time when the Doctor was without a home, and Claude was a baby, and I walked and walked the floor one night with Claudie in my arms, who then was sick unto death almost.

But the carriage has stopped, and I am ringing the door-bell. Soon the door swings open and the servant shows me into the library. Soon I hear foot-step and a moment more and I have hold o the Doctor's hand.

"Well, Charlie, how are you, old chap?"

"Harvey, old man, is it you?" and thus we meet after years of separation.

But I must not make this article too long. After chatting, and after looking over the Doctor's home, office, laboratory, and the Golden Laxative Coffee factory, we returned to the house for tea. After tea I said: "Doctor, I wish you would give me a seance."

"Not for love nor money," said the Doctor.

"But why?" I asked.

"Because I give seances now to no one. I use my gifts wholly for the benefit of my patients. Giving seances unfits me for the control of my medical guide."

We then went to the Doctor's den, as he calls it, and I wish to say right here that I found in that den pipes and tobacco, and the Doctor and the writer each took a pipe and filled it with tobacco, and we each smoked, or the pipes, or the tobacco; and although it is a vile habit—at least so considered by some, and by nearly everyone as at least a foolish habit, yet I am glad I smoked that pipe of peace with the Doctor, because soon he said: "Wait a moment." He reached back of him and off of a shelf took two large slates. I should think they measured about 11x14 inches.

"Now," said he, "let's see what we can get."

Breaking off a bit of pencil in the usual manner, he put it on one slate and placed the other slate over it. In a few moments we could hear the pencil at work. Soon, three tiny raps. On taking the slates apart, there was the message, filling the inner sides of both slates. To my surprise it was for me, a message from a dear friend. I saw that Charlie was Charlie and not the Doctor, so I asked him to excuse me a moment, and I went out and got my gripsack, and got two slates that I brought with me.

I came back and found Charlie still Charlie the medium and not the Doctor. I said: "Now, Charlie, let him (speaking of my spirit-friend who had just written me on the Doctor's slates), write me a message as he promised."

Well, to make a long story short, my spirit-friend wrote me again on my own slates, and then again on the Doctor's slates. I received in all fourteen messages, all from those who were known to me. Then, to top off the seance, the lights were put out and, I sitting and holding the Doctor's hands, my spirit-friends came and touched me all over my head, patting me on face and hands, and the dear mother putting her arms around my neck and kissing and blessing her boy as of old, then showing me her face, bringing her own light—and I do wish I could describe that spirit-light, but I cannot. I know that the doctor and I could see each other plainly, and the spirit mother all at the same time.

I think I hear some skeptic ask: "What test conditions did you have?" To such I would say, the slate-writing in the light, and as the spirit-light was strong enough to allow me to see it was my mother, I was satisfied. It would have made it no more the truth if I had had the Doctor in an iron cage.

Well, the seance was too soon over, and apparently we were alone. I relighted my pipe, the Doctor did the same, believing it is not what goes into the mouth that defileth a man, but what goes out of the mouth sometimes.

Going back into the sitting-room, I asked: "Doctor, what about those wonderful cures that you are making? Are you meeting with the success that I hear you are?"

He replied: "Well, I do not know what you have heard, but I will say this much: I do not claim to cure all who are sick, but I am more than pleased with my success, and I feel that greater powers for curing the sick are given me each day."

Then he went on speaking of Dr. Banks, who is now connected with him, saying Dr. Banks is a true, honest healer, and no make-believe.

Dr. Banks treats such of the Doctor's patients, magnetically as require that kind of treatment, Dr. Watkins treating such patients of Dr. Banks' as need medicine. In fact, I hear constantly of most marvelous cures being made by these two gifted men.

Dr. Watkins' power of diagnosing and curing disease is known the world over, yet I cannot help wishing he could find time to give a few seances, for they carry conviction every time. Yet others believe the Doctor is doing the most good as a physician—and I desire to say that Dr. Watkins is a regular graduate of two reputable medical schools, and has a perfect right to the M. D. after his name, and he also holds a State medical certificate. Yours for truth,

—C. W. HARVEY.

THE FAMOUS SPECIALIST

Who is so successful in treating Chronic Diseases, devotes his whole time to his practice. This is one reason for his great success.

ANOTHER REASON is that he does not try to run down other doctors.

ANOTHER REASON is he is acknowledged by all to have the most wonderful psychic powers by which he can locate the cause of disease.

ANOTHER REASON is that he has his patients write him each week, and he sends them weekly instructions, thus showing that he watches each case closely.

ANOTHER REASON is he gives only the purest medicines and in the smallest doses that will produce the desired result. Some cases are cured without any medicine.

ANOTHER REASON is he makes the price of treatment right to all.

MASSACHUSETTS NEWS.

The State Association of Spiritualists.

To the Editor:—The State Association of Spiritualists held a convention at Grand Army Hall, Springfield, Mass., November 12, of three largely attended and intensely interesting meetings, which were presided over by Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, of Worcester, president of the association.

At the morning session Mrs. H. G. Holcomb gave an invocation; Dr. Fuller an address of greeting. Remarks followed by J. B. Hatch, Jr., and Mrs. J. D. Storrs. W. H. Bach gave the address of welcome, after which H. D. Barrett, president of the National Association, spoke upon the work which has been accomplished by organization.

At the afternoon session, after fine music by the choir, which was a specialty at each meeting, invocation by Mrs. C. F. Loring. Mrs. Laura A. Cummings, of this city, gave an address. Recitation by Miss Thrall. Mrs. Juliet Yeaw, of Greenwich, gave an interesting lecture on "Organization." Mrs. C. L. Hatch read a letter from Mrs. Longley, formerly State secretary. Mrs. Holcomb gave an address. President Barrett spoke of the coming jubilee, March, 1898, and of the recent convention, also of the lyceum system. J. B. Hatch spoke of the new Spiritualists' Home near Boston. Mrs. Loring gave tests.

Evening session: Invocation by Mrs. Yeaw; Miss Lizzie Harlow spoke upon organization and co-operation. T. M. Grimshaw, of Pittsburg, Pa., who was unexpectedly present, gave an account of some former work in England, and advocated schools for mediums. Short addresses were then made by Dr. Fuller, Mrs. Loring, Mrs. Holcomb, H. D. Barrett, W. H. Bach and Mrs. Yeaw. The convention closed at a late hour in the evening. Great enthusiasm was manifested, and it is felt that much good will be the result.

A session of the State Association of magnetic and other healers of the new era was held. Cor.

TOPPLING ORTHODOXY.

Orthodoxy is getting shaky,
Hell is losing half its charms,
Beecher stole the Devil's brimstone,
Churches all are in alarms.

Hell was once a lake infernal,
Past redemption, past all names,
Where the damned must roast eternal
In the lurid brimstone flames.

Hell of late is getting shorter,
Cooling off, too (beats the deuce),
Likewise brimstone, once so plenty,
Now is nearly out of use.

Not long since hell swarmed with infants
Damned to burn by God's decree,
Just because Eve stole some apples
Off the Devil's knowledge tree.

Later the divines went searching
Hell all through with anxious care;
Gave the hunt up quite discouraged—
Wa'n't the first damned baby there.

Fact is, hell's a grand old humbug:
Poor old Satan's most played out;
Orthodoxy's out of brimstone,
Hell's fast going up the spout.

A passing acquaintance of mine composed these uncouth, but certainly humorous lines. I am aware that your valuable space is fully taken up with contributions from able writers and workers in the cause of Spiritualism, but I am of opinion that the cause may be advanced by a few words from those who have recently become Spiritualists and who are humble workers in the vineyard.

My wife has developed as a medium, clairvoyant and clairaudient, in the last eighteen months, and has been doing a great work in that time, a great many having become investigators and Spiritualists through her instrumentality, and many of them are now mediums.

We hold circles twice a week, one being for development. My wife gets the most striking and beautiful symbols with impressions as to their meaning, also full names of friends passed on. Her main control is "Mohawk," a young Indian girl; also a spirit who designates himself as Stranger, and who gives us some beautiful and inspiring talks; and another, "Morning Star," a lady who states her occupation in Spirit-life to be that of a teacher and guide of the young who have passed on to the better land.

My wife also plays upon the organ inspirationally at times, and also gets words for music. Her control, Mohawk, is quite a prophet, one instance in particular being of general interest. She gave out that there was to be the smashing of a locomotive near Spokane, which was verified on the following day.

Very many people have said that they have received the best and strongest tests through my wife's mediumship. I think it just to mediums recently developed, etc., that our papers should give their work to their readers, both as an encouragement to the medium and also to the investigators. The old-time mediums are so well known they do not need (I think) to be so repeatedly eulogized. I am doing all in my power, as circumstances permit, to spread our beautiful philosophy, which is the mainstay of my life.

I consider your excellent paper the best exponent of Spiritualism now before the people, and therefore do my best to spread its circulation. It is mental food and refreshment to me at all times. —A. C. PRIEST.

ROME AND DARKNESS.

Protestant Alliance and Catholicism.

A paper published in England contains the following:

The Protestant Alliance conference at Shrewsbury concluded to-day. In the afternoon the Rev. Hunt Painter, Shifnal, presided, and said the Church of Rome had in England, in the person of Cardinal Vaughan, a man full of energy, and a capable man who was bending all his energies to subjugate the people of England to Rome and darkness.

The Rev. Alexander Rodger, of Putney, said the consecrating formulas of the Church of Rome were "hocus pocus." The Church of Rome was a regular penny-in-slot religion." You had to put your money in before you could get anything out of it."

In the evening a crowded meeting was held. The Rev. W. R. Thompson, M.A., Presbyterian Church, Shrewsbury, who presided, said Romanism was not merely a religion, but a political system which brooked no rival.

Other speakers deplored the progress of Ritualism, and said that all the Romanizing Ritualists should be drummed out of the Church of England as traitors and disloyal men. Pastor Chinquy said the Protestants were, according to Thomas Aquinas, already condemned to death as heretics by the Pope, and Rome was only waiting till she was strong enough to execute the sentence.

Healing powers are being repeated over and over again through the mediumship of MRS. DR. DOBSON-BARKER, who, for the past year and a half has of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards very truly,

NEW BOOKS.

A Spiritual Tour of the World, in Search of the Line of Life's Evolution. By Otto A. De La Camp. Boston: The Arena Publishing Company. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

A careful examination of this volume shows that it is written for thoughtful minds who would search into the mysteries of being and ascend the higher mounts of spirituality. The author writes as one who has studied both physics and metaphysics, and has become familiar with the various ideas concerning evolution of body and mind.

Philosophical consideration is given to the world's fundamental principles: space, substance, and motion; the diversification of the elements; the establishment of organized life; nature of the primitive organisms; plant life; development of the animal body; life of the animal soul; formation and nature of the human body; constitution of the human soul; origin of the races; unfoldment of the human soul; in the life of the community; variety of fates and characters on the human plane; the reason for our sufferings; our relation to the evil; the inequality of our fates; the soul's immortality and necessity for reappearance on earth; evolution beyond the human plane; concerning the higher form of life and the way in which it is attained; our relation to the world of the disembodied and to one another.

One needs but to note the character of these subjects to perceive that with even the most ordinary treatment of them, the book must be rich in useful thought; but the author ascends far above the ordinary, and the appreciative reader will find in this volume a fine repast that will tend to his mental and spiritual unfoldment. It is of the class of books whose tendency is to make mankind wiser and better, and as such, though we may not accept all of its ideas, it is worthy of commendation.

Three Lectures on the Science of Language. With a Supplement—My Predecessors. By F. Max Muller. Open Court Publishing Co., Chicago. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 25 cents.

There is no higher authority in linguistic studies than F. Max Muller, and none more gifted in the faculty to render a very deep and necessarily scholarly subject clear and interesting. The science of language comprehends a vast deal more than the mere technical department of ordinary grammar as taught in our common schools, as these three masterly lectures plainly show.

The inceptive origin itself of language, its beginnings and evolution, when properly studied will be seen to comprise the history of the human race. The tracing back into the deep past, to its root, of a word now in common use, is to trace the history of the race, and that as it can be by no other method.

Prof. Muller discards the idea of anything supernatural or miraculous in language, though, as he says: "Next to the great miracle of existence, there is no greater miracle than this translation of all existence into human thought and human speech." But "nothing is more miraculous than its simplicity."

Under his scholarly guidance, his readers take an excursion full of pleasure and mental profit, extending into the farthest ages of humanity's past and reaching to the present.

Review of the Seybert Commissioner's Report. With Addendum. By A. B. Richmond.

Whoso would enjoy a feast in clear-cut logic; fine irony, keen analysis and trenchant criticism, joined with lucid statement of facts pertaining to Spiritualism proper, and especially to the doings of the Seybert Commissioners in their investigation—so-called—of spiritual phenomena, should by all means read this book.

The readers of The Progressive Thinker have enjoyed many a taste of Mr. Richmond's qualities as an orator and writer, and with great appreciation of his eminent abilities. His showing up of the very peculiar performances of professional dignities in their labored essays of "how not to do it" is worthy of a place by the side of Charles Dickens' account of the celebrated "Circumlocution Office," in "Little Dorrit."

The volume comprises a masterly presentation of the evidences of Spiritualism, its basis of unanswerable and indisputable facts and phenomena, and plainly shows the incompetency or dishonesty—or both—of the Seybert Commission in its purported investigation. The serried array of facts and proofs set in vigorous, earnest battle against the whiffling Seybert "professors" makes an interesting study to one who is in search of truth.

Every Spiritualist should have it, and keep an extra copy to lend for missionary service among doubters and skeptics.

"Human Culture and Cure. Marriage, Sexual Development, and Social Upbuilding." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL.D. A most excellent and very valuable work, by the Dean of the College of Fine Forces, and author of other important volumes on Health, Social Science, Religion, etc. Price, cloth, 75c. For sale at this office.

Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1. For sale at this office.

Address by Wong Chin Foo.

Wong Chin Foo, who publishes the Chinese News, was one of the speakers at an afternoon session of the Secular Union. He said he was walking down Adams street, saw the notice of the congress and came in. He was evidently not in touch with the opinions of those present, for he said that Robert G. Ingersoll was to the United States what Confucius was to China and Jesus Christ to the Jews. He said that he did not believe in worrying about the future state. The golden rule was all right, but it was the enunciation of Confucius and not of Christ.

Franklin Steiner, a young man from Des Moines, followed Foo. He said that for some months he had not been engaged in freethought work, having been stumping the State for free silver. This experience had shown him that there was work for the freethinkers in American politics. Something must be done to head off the great Christian conspiracy against free American institutions. Its present form was in the Sunday laws. The robberies of State and national treasuries would follow. He closed with the statement that the church was the enemy of law and order and should be put down.

New York Temple Organized.

To the Editor:—I wrote you some time since, of the inauguration and dedication of the New York Spiritual Temple. Brother and Sister E. W. Sprague were with us during the entire month of October, and in spite of many adverse circumstances—such as a new, unknown hall; cold, rainy Sundays, etc., they laid a foundation, by their superior and faithful work, for what now promises to become a most successful movement. I would say that they have so well-pleased their audiences that are considering their recall when we get stronger.

Owing to financial weakness this month, we were obliged to recede from our engagement with Brother Edgerly, but hope to call him again during the season. Next month we are to have Mrs. Abbie E. Sheets, of Michigan, who is now serving the First Spiritual Temple, of Boston, and her address will be at No. 238 W. 25th street, New York.

During the present month we have depended upon local talent, and have been assisted by such mediums as G. A. Stryker, Mrs. Henderson, Florence White, J. H. Rushton, Miss Nellie Barnes and others.

The undersigned has delivered two automatically written lectures, one "The Devil's Carnival," the other "The Emancipation of Humanity." We have excellent music—Mrs. L. B. Pike, a professional pianist and operatic singer, and Miss Emma Penniman, a pupil in one of our conservatories, and several other excellent soloists have volunteered occasionally.

On Thursday evening last, we effected a regular organization, retaining the name—"New York Spiritual Temple"—adopting a constitution and by-laws, voted to incorporate under the State laws, and to take a charter from the N. S. A.

The following officers were elected by ballot: I. Ransom Sanford, president; Mrs. Lorette F. Hurty, vice-president; Henry C. Underhill, secretary; E. C. Leonard, treasurer; Mrs. H. C. Underhill, Mrs. W. F. Varcoe, Geo. W. Miller, trustees. I. Ransom Sanford, Pres't.

WARNED BY TELEPATHY.

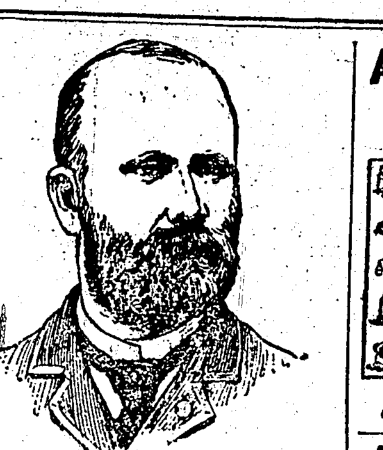
Mrs. Gulick Informed in a Mysterious Way of Her Husband's Death.

At 8:25 o'clock Friday evening, November 6, at Atlantic City, says an exchange, Mrs. Peter Gulick, a deaf mute, rushed into the room of Mrs. Peterson, with whom she was stopping, and seizing a pencil and paper, excitedly wrote: "Something has happened to my husband!"

At that time Gulick was supposed to be well and on his way home from a tour of the New England States, where he had been selling pictures.

Mrs. Gulick became hysterical, then unconscious, and soon died.

Next morning came a telegram addressed to her. Mrs. Peterson opened it and read:



Yonkers, N. Y., Nov. 7, 1896.

Mrs. Peter Gulick, Somers Point, N. J.: Your husband was killed on the railroad track near here last night.

William Jameson.

The Gulicks were a most devoted couple. They had four children, one of whom is in the United States Navy.

A new edition of "Three Sevens," by the Phelon's, is just issued. The May Arena says: "The gist of such books as Dr. Phelon's "Three Sevens," and other works descriptive of or alluding to the various occult societies, which seem to have existed for ages, has never, until recently, been said so openly and plainly that 'he who runs may read.'" ORIGIN OF THE SOUL.

A Revelation from the Masters of Wisdom.

A Search for the Key to Individual Immortality.

Let those who desire to discover the key to their immortality ponder the disclosures made in the ensuing article. The Masters of Wisdom are those celestial intelligences who teach esoteric truth in its highest interpretation; they are philosophers of the most advanced spiritual cult and preside judicially over the mental conditions of Earth. It is to this order of spirits that all true revelation must be traced. They have acquired a prescient power which qualifies them to legislate over the spiritual interests of men; as a matter of fact they are the agents of those deific hierarchies whose progress is so sublime as to preclude the possibility of direct communication with our sublunary planet, but who still exercise supreme provident control.

What I have written is an inspiration from these immortal masters. It is a succinct illustration of what actually occurs in supernal realms, embellished by metaphor, since metaphor is the only analogy by which sublime laws can be impressed upon human intelligence.

Every reader must apply the lesson to his own understanding; it contains truth to satisfy the aspirations of all.

THE REVELATION.

Souls are launched upon the sea of individual being as germs or embryos. Their origin is in primordial realms and the power which gives them separate existence is the deific complemental sex-force, the positive and negative energies of the Infinite. They are literally differentiations of the All-Soul, and as they spring forth from the ineffable womb where absolute purity nurtures absolutely pure conceptions, they appear like minute stars of supernal brightness. They radiate a celestial light and scintillate a transcendent brilliancy.

They leap from the Omnipotent reservoir in pairs, one positive or male, the other negative or female. The positive germ is of a vivid ruby hue and generates an aura of ruby flame from which rhythmic undulations pulse and vibrate; these centrifugal pulsations are created by a throbbing in the infant soul which propels it gently through space just as a feather floats tremulously and gracefully through our atmosphere, propelled by fluctuations of a breeze.

The negative germ pursues an identical course actuated by the same law, only its movements are much more zephyr-like, because of the surpassing delicacy of its construction. Its color is a translucent azure, exquisitely ethereal and superbly brilliant. It is enshrined in a transparent aura of the same cerulean hue, inconceivably serene; emits a shimmering luminosity in the form of volatile sparks.

These sparks are so minute and subtle they elude the most powerful psychic vision, and can never be seen by a carnate intelligence, however cultured its understanding or keen its visual perception.

These incandescent particles diffuse and illuminate the ether in which myriads of soul-germs float, borne to and fro by inherent momentum, and commingling as snowflakes commingle in the winter air.

This ineffable region is the nursery of Omnipotence, and these fragile stars of being are babes of immortality. Streams of deific vigor flow steadily outward from the eternal heart into this pure zone which encircles it like an aureole; vitalizing currents of seismic energy throb and course within its boundaries; divine fervor pours a perpetual flood of incubating warmth to its outmost precinct, and the celestial fountain-head embraces it with overshadowing providence.

Viewed from without this supernal realm presents a prismatic appearance, not vividly iridescent, but prismatically toned and tinted where the luminosity is most intense. This peculiar brilliancy is due to the electric character of the creative force which, for the sake of illustration, may be compared to a stupendous orb. Not an illuminating orb such as our solar sphere, but an electro-magnet orb of inconceivable magnitude, occupying limitless areas of space, and blazing with a fierceness so prodigious as to escape the comprehension of the most far-reaching thought. Any attempt to describe this indescribable variety, to locate it in the fathomless abyss of the universe, or to enter into a perceptive relation with its sublime attributes, would be arrogantly futile. Infallibility is as remote from the dim horizon of human thought as our diurnal measurements and mathematical hypotheses are from the majestic scales of formulation by which the immortal masters estimate the verities of infinitude.

Each investigator must bridge the hiatus for himself and open his understanding to receive an impress from these celestial educators.

Words are human inventions whose purpose is to point the way for thought, as signboards guide travelers over a foreign course. They can never accomplish more. In this primal zone variations in luminosity occur where germs are magnetically attracted or repelled, and the iridescent splendor fluctuates accordingly. Groups congregate in sections where the magnetic affinity is pronounced, just as snowflakes cluster where wind-eddies sweep over them. Paradoxical as it may appear, these embryonic souls are endowed with intelligence; not the intelligence of reason, for while the entire intellectual equipment is centered latently in each, the conscious faculties are dormant and remain so until a subsequent period of evolution. Mentality is generic in the intrinsic construction of each, but awaits specific conditions to develop.

An electro-magnet quality characterizes them all, a quality as impeccable and immutable as the source from which they sprang and which guides the germ life throughout its infantile career. Volition is also latent, and conscience not yet awake in these crystalline organisms. Imbued with infallible integrity, erraticity is impossible, for erraticity is a result of volitional liberty and comes only with the dawn of reason, when individual responsibility crowns the virgin soul. Until this advance in evolution has been attained, free agency is nonexistent and morality a term with no pertinent significance. Germ-souls are absolute of the Absolute. They possess no independence whatever, but live and move, expand and magnify contingent upon Omnipotence; eternal in constituent attributes, infallible in the passivity of their purpose, untinctured by bias or option, unalloyed with materiality, and wholly dependent upon the impacts which flow upon them from Deity, they represent in the inceptions of immortality that God-like purity which will be more magnificently achieved in the ultimates when complemental energy has culminated in seraphic beings. The beginning prophecies the fulfillment, and the passivity of these volitionally-void entities is an antithesis of that mature volitional passivity which awaits every human entity as the summum bonum of existence. Physical organisms are ephemeral embodiments for soul, gradations in the ascent of life which each soul must traverse in its detour of growth. They are material accessories only, mere appendages which ally the soul to the circumstance and environment in which it is temporarily placed; transitional incidents too obviously insignificant to create an enduring impression upon the immortal ego within. And here the question naturally arises—of what practical use, then, is incarnation? what purpose does it serve? To which esoteric philosophy replies: A single incarnation could serve no divine purpose whatever; it is only by the aggregation of carnate existences that evolution is advanced, Human life is placed before each soul as a problem which must be solved; step by step its intricacies confront him, lesson by lesson he cons its abstruse meaning, thought by thought he measures its responsibilities. In a primary incarnation a virgin intellect could no more compass the exalted equations of justice than a child could solve the equations of algebra in a primary kindergarten course. What the vicissitudes of daily life accomplish for the human faculties the concatenation of incarnations accomplishes for the immortal soul-faculties, and seismic law provides intervals of rest during which the liberated spirit may recuperate, just as cosmic law provides night for physical recuperation. A chain of days makes up a human life; a chain of incarnations makes up a soul's terrestrial career. But to resume. The most remarkable feature in the automatic activity of these pristine immortals is their duality. The fact that they spring into being in pairs, invariably positive and negative, is an oracle in itself, declaring the deific estimate of complemental forces. Each parturition of the Immaculate equalizes the life-currents as they differentiate in the seismic laboratory; a negative factor is provided for each positive factor in order that eternal productiveness fall not of equilibrium. All reasoners who investigate analytically the decrees recorded in natural laws, know that conformity to sex or polar principles produces the maximum of power. Either of these principles in solitary activity is abortive; perfection along any line of life-manifestation crowns the junction of the dual energies.

The Eternal makes arbitrary provision for this essential in the pristine realm where infantile souls are nurtured into individual symmetry, prior to their ascent of volitional life. Here the supreme choice is made and the supreme incentive bestowed. Here marital predestination is ordained for each soul by an edict from which there is no appeal, and in the consummation of which supreme beatitude is attained.

The twins born simultaneously are not connubial soul-mates, as would at first appear; they are literally of one vibration and therefore too entirely alike to produce the sublime results designed. Junction must be accomplished between germs of diametrically opposite attributes, not from the standpoint of polarity alone, but from the general character of the intellectual construction, of which Deity alone can determine. Let us follow the movements of a single primitive germ in the incubating zone: it must be a positive one if literal accuracy is desired. We see it dart into individual being in close conjunction with its twin germ. Ubiquitous energy lifts it into the heights of its fostering home, closely followed by its companion; one impulse severed the twain from the Infinite-Soul, and on it they float aerially, blazing like jewels in the ambient glow. See how they thrill and soar, borne onward by the electric momentum of deific impact! Steadily they move—side by side—still under the activating throb which set them free. Now they waver; sway from a direct course; rise and sink with graceful oscillations; swerve amid the throng of embryos about them, and finally detach themselves from the attenuating impulse and drift tremulously apart. Following the positive germ in its diaphanous course we read the history of all, for prescient wisdom guides them all identically. See it approach an azure spark; observe its tremor and momentary rest; now it soars away, drawn thither by another serene azure germ, but it does not pause, a quiver passes over it and it floats away, anon it advances and recedes as if searching amid the brilliant throng for a congenial soul: many attract it by the lambent splendor of their auras, many repel it gently with the unerring precision of hostile vibration. To and fro it moves, ever ardent, ever vivid in its ruby hue. Back and forth, in and out, weaving spiral paths in graceful convolutions as it winds mystically amid the mazes of creation's nursery. Behold how vibrations impel it airily! No jar—no haste— no discordant undulation—no passionate celerity! Tranquilly it obeys an unrecognized purpose, searching with rhythmic grace its eternal destiny.

Lo! a crystalline spark invites it now! Spontaneously they approach—tremors pulse from azure to ruby heart—thrills lift them in close proximity—a moment's pause tests the integrity of the affiliation—a magnetic flash encircles both—a potent impulse energizes each, and swifter than thought they unite. A quiver succeeds the electric shock of union—a celestial impact flows upon them from the Omnipotent heart to ratify the bond, and instantly the pair are launched into remote depths of the ecstatic zone where, with other mated germs, they remain in rapturous unison until their entrance upon separate carnate existence. To dwell at greater length upon a mystically profound theme is useless. Ages of evolution serve only to develop the fervor of this primal incentive, to magnify its possibilities, and to augment its scope. Here the first emotion of true happiness is tasted, and the divine appetite never wanes. The vicissitudes of carnate life will impair its manifestations temporarily, by reason of the fallible physical organism through which it must operate, and the physical intelligence will be scarred by the conflict with temptations that assail the flesh, but the immortal ego is incorruptible, it cannot be contaminated; it repels evil as the sun dispels moisture; it is infallible because it is a part of God.

PAUL AVENAL.

TRUE JESUITISM.

Guayaquil, Nov. 12.—The government of Ecuador has ordered the Jesuit fathers settled in the eastern part of the republic to leave the country. It is alleged that they have been fomenting revolutionary movements.

Such is the nature of Jesuitism, that if it finds protection it immediately sets about formulating some plan for the overthrow of its protector. History tells us that the members of that society have been expelled more than half a hundred times from the European countries, and we know that a fight occurs every year in the German reichstag over the question of the readmission of the black-coated villains to that country. Yet in spite of the warning that comes to us from Germany, in spite of the warning that comes to us from France and Spain, two Roman Catholic countries, and in spite of the warning that comes to us from Italy, from Rome—the home of the papacy—this government goes on sleeping in fancied security, while those bloodthirsty inquisition lovers swarm our State and National capitals and plot and scheme for the advancement of the interests of the papacy, and against the usefulness and efficiency of our State institutions. Our people forget that the history of Jesuitism is written in the blood of millions of Protestants, that its praise is sung in the agonized groans of victims tortured by the rack, the thumb-screw and the stake; and that its beauties were pictured only in the horrid phantasma of death, rape, rapine and arson, that, like a pall and mantle of death, spread over south-western Europe during the Dark Ages.

The question that may soon confront this country, may be similar that which confronted the French Huguenots, the Albigenses and the Protestants who made war under the banner of William of Orange, whether any but the Romanists shall have the rights now accorded to Protestants and Romanists, Jews and Gentiles alike. All of Rome's energies are bending in an effort to foreignize and Romanize this country, and it has been her boast for years that in 1900 she would take this country and keep it.

The question for Protestants to decide, and that at once, is whether Rome shall realize her ambitious boast. One thing is certain, they cannot longer remain inactive. They must watch her and work to overcome her hellish purpose and design, or they and theirs will suffer with those who have openly opposed her in her struggle for supremacy. —AMERICAN.

EVOLUTION OF A SYSTEM

Our Solar System from an Attenuated Atomic Mass to Sun and Worlds.

A Lecture by Prof. O. H. Richmond, of the Grand Temple of the Magi, Chicago.

THE "CREATION" IDEA UNTRUE—THE REIGN OF LAW—INFINITE DIVERSITY, YET UNITY—MOLECULAR VIBRATIONS—THE WONDERFUL ETHER—THE ETHERIC BALANCE—CHEMICAL AFFINITY—THE "WALTZ OF ATOMS" A UNITED FAMILY OF WORLDS.

No scientific person can conscientiously put off the question: "How did that come to be?" with the old stereotyped answer: "God made it," or "God created it."

That time has gone by, with the childish conditions which originated it; and the man of science of to-day answers the question as a man of knowledge, and does not attempt the evasion of it in any "Santa Claus" style.

During the ignorant, barbaric ages of the past, that makeshift, "God created it," was very convenient, especially for those who pretended to be direct purveyors to the people of the Almighty's wishes and orders.

It saved such a world of trouble and perplexing study to assume that a thing is "created" instead of having been evoluted, that it is not so much to be wondered at that would-be teachers, Who were nearly destitute of that scientific knowledge, should adopt the creation theory.

Lately, a well known lecturer in New England scouted the idea as "wild and untenable," that soul force or spirit has its dawnings in the vibrations of atoms and their attractions and repulsions. He assumed that notwithstanding that material forms were products of evolutions, souls must be created or god-given. The learned gentleman, however, wholly fails to explain, on any kind of a theory, what souls are made of; how they are made; or where they are manufactured. It is one thing to pooh-pooh a great truth, but it is quite another to antagonize it by a valid agument. We leave our work to the world, not fearing the verdict of the future.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.

That the Universe, both physical and energetic, is a constant and infinite series of cause and effect, with no possible beginning and no ending, no limitation in bounds and none in ultimate evolution, is a grand fact which every new discovery only tends to strengthen.

No scientific writer of to-day says a word about "creation" of forms and matter, except it be to truckle to the church, and thereby get religious patronage. No work which tells the plain, unvarnished truth can be gotten into our public schools, and hardly into most public libraries. Such institutions are usually controlled by old fogy boards, and men of science know this to be a fact.

Thank the stars, the undersigned is not obliged to cater to ignorance, and can afford to state facts as he finds them, without fear or favor.

EVOLUTION.

In starting this series of lectures on general Evolution, I shall not look for a "beginning." We can in no place put down our stake and say, "Here is the starting point." I firmly believe that millions of sextillions of ages ago worlds and their satellites, suns and clusters of suns, systems and universes of nebulae were going through their great periods of evolution—not the same as to-day, for Nature possesses infinite powers of transformation, but under the same general laws as to-day and subject to the same gigantic ever-acting forces.

If we should examine a million maple trees we would not find two alike in the entire million; but all of them would be found to possess certain characteristics appertaining to maples.

Just so if we should examine a million clusters of suns, we should find no two exactly alike; but this would not prove that they formed under different laws, any more than in the case of the maple trees.

It is now generally admitted by science that the primary constituents of all that is in the universe are ultimate atoms and their motions. And I cannot see, after years of study of the subject, that we need anything more. The non-creatable, ever-existent atom furnishes all that we need to account for matter, and the vibration of the atom furnishes all we require to account for all the manifestations.

INTER-PLANETARY ETHER.

Attraction and repulsion, light and heat, chemical energy and affinity, electricity and magnetism, mind, spirit, soul force, sound, odor, and every conceivable manifestation can be fully accounted for under the law of motion, or atomic and molecular vibration. The entire universe is full of vibrating atoms. The fact that light, heat, and other numerous modes of transmitting energy, come to us across tremendous regions of space, proves that there is no such thing as a vacuum anywhere. Science has accepted the existence of inter-planetary or inter-molecular ether as a fact, attested in a thousand ways. It has even computed how much its pressure is, and from proportional ratios, as compared with sound vibrations, it is believed that the ether exerts a pressure of six thousand million tons to the square inch. Why does not this inconceivable pressure crush everything? Simply because it is exerted on all sides, in, out and between. The only thing it cannot penetrate is the atom, and that cannot be crushed or destroyed by outside pressure, for it is indestructible. But if we displace the etheric balance ever so little we find what a giant we have awakened. The silent force which occupies yonder trolley wire, which is capable of sending a vibration down through the car which shall actuate its wheels and drive it along the track, loaded with passengers, is nothing but a slight displacement of ether which is made to vibrate through a space of less than one-twentieth thousandth part of an inch. Even this small displacement of the etheric atoms shakes every atom of copper in the wire from one end to the other. Shake the atoms composing a man's body in this violent manner and he falls dead instantly. His body can stand higher vibrations even than that, but they must be vastly shorter in range.

The ether does not possess its enormous power and exert its pressure from the closeness of its atoms so much as it does from their enormous normal vibration. The normal vibration is perfectly frightful to contemplate and beyond the possibilities of belief. This is the reason that the ether is the most elastic medium in all the universe. It is so elastic that some scientists have supposed it to be a "perfect gas," or one possessing the highest possible elasticity. The vibrations transmitted to the cosmic ether by combustion, magnetism or electricity are wholly distinct from the normal vibrations belonging to the ether.

In the same way the vibrations of the voice in a telephone superimpose electric pulsations in the line wire entirely distinct from the normal vibrations of the electricity in the wire.

VIBRATION OF ATOMS.

It need not be matter of surprise to us that the world is slow to comprehend the wonderful truth that vibrations of atoms of various characteristics constitute all there is of life, energy, mind, soul, together with a thousand other manifestations, when we consider that even light and heat were held to be otherwise than vibratory until lately. The researches of such scientists as Tyndall and others finally set at rest the last lingering doubt as to the vibratory nature of the so-called imponderable forces. But there is a very vague idea to-day, in the minds of even believers in the vibration theory of life, that "nothing" can vibrate. This is wholly erroneous. There can be no vibration except there is something to vibrate. There is no "something" except matter, and no "matter" except it be of conglomerated atoms.

So we lay down the law, which we shall refer to again in this series of lectures, that "atoms and their motions constitute all that is in the universe."

But it is not my intention here to go into the law of vibration, as fascinating a subject as it is, as I desire to call your attention more particularly to the evolution of peopled worlds.

EVOLUTION OF A SOLAR SYSTEM.

Let us suppose that in some particular part of the universe, covering a space roughly averaging some fifty-four thousand millions of miles in diameter, there exists a quantity of atoms, mixed with and suspended among the much smaller and more numerous vibrating atoms, constituting the ether. We might compare this condition to a vessel of water, in which is dissolved many kinds of salts. The atoms of salt are suspended among the much smaller atoms of oxygen and hydrogen composing the water; but the salts are free to change position, stress, motion, and combination, while the water, like the ether, retains its normal stress and combinations intact. This is but a crude representation, but it may serve to make my meaning clearer. The part of the universe which we have under consideration contains enough of these atoms to make a respectable sun, like ours, and to furnish material enough for a complete outfit of planets and other attendants. These little invisible atoms would be so far apart that the density of the entire mass would be less than one eighteen hundred thousand millionth that of hydrogen gas. If the whole lot should be brought down to a ball, with a diameter equal to the orbit of Mercury, it would then have a density thirty times less than hydrogen gas.

Now, when we come to consider the extreme tenuity of hydrogen gas, a form of matter which will shoot upward in common air, as cork shoots upward in water, we can form a small idea, at least, of the marvelous tenuity of the "veil of matter" which constituted our embryonic universe. I am not certain but that the believers in the "nothing theory" of creation would be satisfied with so thin a substance.

It is not a "fire mist," as some have supposed. The most powerful telescope would reveal nothing of its presence. It cannot be seen, or in any manner detected by the finest instruments.

THE WORK OF ATOMS.

We have here latent conditions for the making of a solar system, but it consists of multitudes of separate atoms, held far apart by "atomic repulsion." What is that? says one. Just this: An atom possesses the property of movement. It wants to vibrate in a little orbit of its own, and it will do this whenever it can find enough room. If it can get large elbow room it will occupy a large space. If it is crowded by other atoms it will vibrate in a smaller and smaller orbit, until it gets so crowded that it will have to join forces with other atoms in order to have any room at all. In this manner chemical action is started. But our little entities have wills of their own, for when they are obliged to choose a partner in this great "waltz of atoms" they pick out those which are most agreeable. This is "chemical affinity"—the lowest form of "mind" or soul-energy known to us in all the universe. The condition which we have assumed in this mass of attenuated vapor would go on eternally without any particular change were it not that each atom has still another quality which is inherent and always active. That is the quality of gravity. That mysterious but well known force is all the time exerted on every separate atom or molecule of matter. It constantly tends to overcome all other forces, for others are more or less subject to change from environment and position; but gravity is always on the watch; it never lets up an instant. Under this gentle but persuasive force, our little friends—the ultimate atoms of hydrogen, carbon, oxygen, nitrogen, and so on—begin to draw in toward the point where there is the most company. At first they hold aloof from the dance and hang upon the outskirts of the crowd; but the vibrating throng soon produces too great an attraction for them to resist, and they join in. This is going on all over the vast mass, and soon little centers of more condensed matter are formed here and there. These little circles possess more power and draw still more atoms to them. It is not yet necessary, nor for millions of years to come, for these atoms to unite in the close embrace of chemical union. They are not near enough. The closest of them are still hundreds of thousands of times their diameters apart. They belong to the same society, but are not acquainted yet.

After a time these little clusters begin to revolve about other clusters, and those, in turn, about others, and the condensation goes on thus, we will suppose for a billion of years, and our matter has been so drawn in together that it now occupies a space about six thousand millions of miles in diameter.

Now, what would we naturally expect to find, as the net result of all this motion? Turn a pail of water into a funnel, and see how the water naturally begins to turn about on itself as it "condenses" toward the point of escape. This is because all masses of matter coming toward a center must produce currents, and these currents cannot be uniform in direction. They cannot proceed in radial lines direct toward the center of gravity, but must slide off and spread over the outmost layers of matter in order to obtain room. The well known circular character of storms and cyclones is a manifestation of this same property in an element millions of times more dense, atmospheric Vapor or air.

So far, our little atoms, in their whirling clusters, have been falling gradually in, all the time moving in a great spiral toward the center of gravity. But they have, by this time, generated such a motion of gyration that they begin to feel the counteracting effect of another force. Everything tends to move in straight lines, and the more rapidly a given thing moves, the harder it tries to go straight ahead.

Fasten a lead ball to a string and begin whirling it about your head, and you will soon realize that the faster you whirl it the harder the ball pulls to get away from you, until it breaks the string. Now take a rubber cord, say ten feet long, and try the same. You will see that at given velocity the leaden ball will stretch the string out to, say, fifteen feet, and there stop stretching it, and will remain at that distance until the rate of motion is changed. In other words, the tendency to go straight ahead just balances the elastic force of the rubber cord in holding it to a circular orbit. This has been called centripetal and centrifugal "forces," but they are not "forces" at all, as far as I can see. But if this property of inertia did not exist there would be no worlds or suns, such as we now have.

Now, a large ring of the uttermost parts of this mass of matter has gotten to that point where it has no more tendency to fall in or out, so it rushes on in a non-contracting circle for a long period of time. But the first tendency was for a ball of matter to flatten itself out into a disk, because all the matter at the poles of rotation would, as its velocity increased, have a tendency to get away from the center of rotation as far as possible, while yet prevented from flying off by the attraction of the rest of the mass.

Finally the time came when our outside atoms, pursuing their orbit, drew from the nearest ones within the circle all who would yield allegiance to the new dynasty, and the central disk, still shrinking, drew with it all who would go, and a split occurred, which left our outside circle independent, with nothing to do but whirl on and on at a velocity of about 209 miles per minute. This is rapid for earthly motion, as we move on its surface, but slow for cosmical motion.

Our circle once formed, would go on forever, were it not that disruption always will come, in time, to all circles. Contentions will break up all circles and organizations of men, and the same thing holds good with atoms. In this case the "contention" is the pulling and hauling of other masses of matter at a distance, and waves of motion and aggregations of matter set up in the body of the ring. A ring will resist these outside influences a good while before breaking up, as witness the rings of Saturn, yet intact. But the rings of Saturn have progressed, from their great density, caused by proximity to the immense body of their primary, to a point where the matter has condensed into masses of meteoric character, so it has become visible. Just as soon as the large ring of matter, which we have been considering, broke in one place, the ends would rapidly fall toward the central part of the ring. The rear end would be drawn forward and the front end would be gradually retarded, until the matter, in time, would fall into a lump, ready to go through the same process by itself, resulting in the formation of another smaller ring. As the inside of the large ring would be all the time retarded by the proximity of the inside ball of matter, that side would be retarded so that the outer part would have a greater velocity.

The effect would be that the resulting planet and ring, or rings, which were destined to become satellites to it, would have a revolution in the same direction as the orginal mass.

This is just what we find in our solar system, for the planets revolve in the same direction as the sun, and so do their satellites.

The satellite of Neptune has a retrograde motion, but that is easily accounted for under another law of motion. As the sun is what there is left, after all the planets had, in turn, been made from rings left behind, it, of course, shows the direction of the motion. As the disk of matter concentrated, it naturally gained a greater velocity, as all falling bodies do, and we see this most beautifully illustrated by the time of revolution of all the bodies. The sun revolves in 24 days; Mercury moves around it in 88 days; Venus, in 225 days; the Earth, in 365 days. Each of these planets illustrate exactly the rotation of the parent mass at the time the ring was cast off which formed it, and the sun shows the motion left at a diameter of 850,000 miles. All these bodies in our solar system are connected by an exact mathematical law or laws; all connected as if they were one family, as they really are—a family of heavenly bodies.

Mathematical co-ordinations and geometrical relations exist between all the bodies in our solar system, which unite them in one family as closely and as clearly as the atoms composing a given compound are united in a crystal. We first saw Neptune born. We could go on and watch the birth of each planet in succession, but it is useless. When we see one we see all, for that is the general process.

What have we learned from the facts set forth thus far? That with the ultimate atoms in any conceivable state of diffusion in space, Nature has the power of going on and making worlds, and the residuum left in the center when concentrated to the point where intense chemical action can unite the atoms, as it is bound to do, will be a hot and shining sun, to heat and light the worlds.

If some great comet should come crashing in from outer space, made up of "left-over" matter from some odd corner of the universe, and should plunge into our sun and again turn him to gas, and cause that gas to expand until it took in Mercury, Venus, Earth and Mars, and they all became melted in "fervent heat" until they were all again diffused as gas, that disk would go right on revolving, and go to forming new planets again, as serenely as if nothing had happened. Nature was not made for us. We were formed to fit Nature as she is. Remember that.

Many tremendous ages, as we understand time, passed between the birth of Neptune and the parting of the Earth ring. We shall not fill in this great space, but shall, in our next lecture, start with our Earth in a gaseous form and watch her in her onward progress along the great path of evolution.

The Blight of Selfishness.

Write? Who bids me write? The spirit of loneliness, a hungry soul pent up in its narrow house, like a prisoner watching for the moment when the key will be turned in the lock and the shackles that have so long been a burden, are rent asunder, and the poor, tortured soul, so long a prisoner, steps forth into the bright sunshine, but feels as though he were trespassing even to breathe the pure, fresh air so abundant. The law of man's making having deprived him so long, he wonders if he even has a right to enjoy the blessings which Nature, in her unselfishness, supplies to all alike.

Earthly conditions—we will say, man's selfishness—is the great blight that falls on humanity, dwarfing body and soul, hurling them into the valley of death, misshapen shapes, tortured out of all semblance to what God intended they should be. Nor does it stop here; no, its cruel hand falls mercilessly on the poor dumb creatures, who have not the privilege of crying out against their wrongs.

Is there a remedy? Yes—through education and the help of the unseen world, peopled by those who have passed through the experiences we are now passing through.

They are waiting and watching for the opportunity to help us drive ignorance and selfishness from our midst; and until those two oppressors are vanquished, so long will humanity suffer. There are those among us who know the way, who have many obstacles to overcome, and who need all the assistance possible; and I would enjoin every true Spiritualist to lend a hand to the good work which, I am happy to say, is progressing. I have read The Progressive Thinker from its infancy, and think it worthy of support, as a promoter of a worthy cause.

MRS. FRED WHITE.

Dr. Stanley Pounded.

Dr. Stanley, formerly a lecturer of this city, got severely handled lately at Amesbury, Mass. A dispatch to the Chicago Tribune says:

"The entertainment given by Prof. Stanley, the 'Spiritualist wonder,' formerly of Chicago, in the town hall at Amesbury, Mass., last Sunday evening, ended in a row and expose not down in the announcement. The lights were put out and Prof. Stanley and his assistants were roughly handled by the crowd, who declared the performance a fake. Officer Bradley endeavored to protect the Spiritualists, but not until they had been considerably pounded."

This man Stanley is an ordained minister of the Gospel (was ordained in Ohio), and about as fit as a pig to preside over a body of Spiritualists.

FINDING MY SOUL.

And Finding My Father in Heaven.

A Chapter of Psychological Experience.

May 14, 1896. This morning I grew very dissatisfied with our work. The spirit was bound and the hungry cry seemed to emanate from my soul—"O, let the spirit be free."

I asked, "O, what did they want?" My mentor and guide replied: "Let them show you, dear:" and the answer came from his soul: "You want love—love such as you have never known." I replied: "Thy will, not mine, be done."

A dreamy quiet stole over my senses and lay like a cloud around my physical body. I watched it grow until I saw my body lying there at my feet, so cold, so senseless, and almost repugnant to my sight. Then my guide enfolded my yet trembling spirit in his arms. I was bathed in the warmth of love. I breathed it into my very soul. We seemed to be floating in space, and he said: "When your vision grows clearer you will see the beauty around you: now you only feel."

I looked at my body, then turned to my guide and knew that only in his love could my woman's soul find completeness. He had been my teacher and guide through life, always overshadowing me with a spiritual light, but never had shown me this warmth and light before.

He tells me now, since this morn, my soul has just seen itself. I have hungered and thirsted after love all my life but have ever found it, when possessing it, to be bitter fruit; but he tells me it is because I did not know my own soul and its needs.

"Come, darling," I had always been "child" before, "bid farewell to the old body for a time—it is only a senseless piece of clay—and wander with me in the elysian fields of love." Still softly bathed in love's sweet light, we floated on; his face was still as pale and cold as I had ever seen it in earth life, but the warmth of love seemed to emanate from his whole being.

I wondered how I looked, for I had only that cold clay to gaze upon, now fast receding in the distance, and it did not seem possible it could feel all the glad warmth and beauty which was breathed over me. We floated through an atmosphere which seemed to be full of sweet perfumes and soft music, until we came to a clear, deep pool of living water, and, with his arm still around me, he bade me "Look." We both knelt upon its brink and, gazing in nature's mirror, I saw reflected there a face and form familiar, but still unlike the heavy, dead, white one I had left behind. "A light seen not on sea or land" shone from my face and whole body. I seemed to be luminous, and I turned to my guide, pleased to think I was so fair, and I was lost in wonder and delight, for his stern, white face was gone and a golden radiance shone all over him. He gently drew me to him and I knew we were looking upon each other's soul, with all the taint of earth washed away. Then for a moment we seemed to float on the surface of this clear pool, with its flowery banks, and flowers seemed to spring up all around us, and we were pelted by unseen loving hands with their sweet fragrance.

Then, "Come and away," the bidding was given. O! how strong I had grown. I spurned the old form of clay. I could see it in Mother Earth, food for the worms, and I sang a glad cry that the spirit was free. On we floated, a perfect delight in motion.

We next came to a garden or world of flowers I should say, for it was flowers—flowers everywhere. There was a forest of great snowy-capped trees, that were heavy with bloom and fragrance: lilies that reached to our shoulders, and their soft, white bells kissed our cheeks in loving caresses. We ran and sang, like unto a couple of children hunting wild flowers, in the first blush of spring. My love, amid all the luxuriant beauty, found deeply imbedded on a green, mossy bank, the modest little forget-me-nots. He gathered and handed them to me, saying, with a smile, that will lighten me when I meet him here, never to return: "Now, darling, forget me not. You have seen your own soul; you know what are its needs, take nothing less. You know what love means to-day; now, whenever less is offered thee than has been given unto thee to-day, clasp closely to thy woman's heart these forget-me-nots, and you will never be led astray."

I pressed them to my heart and crushed their sweet fragrance into my very soul, never to leave me. They seemed to say: "We will heal all the wounds the thorns of life have made in your poor, weak body."

With my hand in his, we found a broad, white path which led to a pavilion, or court, in this world of flowers. We stepped down two or three steps, and I drew back—the scene was so radiant, so beautiful, I felt we would be a shadow in their midst. A vast fountain seemed to spring from a deep basin, throwing its bright, sparkling drops all through the lambent air. Beautiful beings were swaying and dancing in perfect time with the sweetest music, which seemed to emanate from the sparkling water, which fell all over them in a perfect rainbow of colors.

He saw my hesitancy and smiled, a though he knew we were welcome guests, and drew me gently forward into their midst. Their smile of welcome seemed to flow through my whole being, and as the gentle drops bathed us with their caressing touch, we seemed to grow more radiant, and when gazing into the clear basin at our feet I saw we were not dark shadows in that bright throng, but one of them. O! how beautiful the soul when bathed in the waters of love and light.

"Come," the gentle voice said. "Love and light are divine love." We seemed to be now floating under the great dome of heaven's blue, only the stars and he and I alone.

The warm, rosy light had gone, and a faint, blue veil enveloped us. We came again to a pool of water, clear, deep and still. We stood upon its margin, and he said, "Look." I gazed first upon his face—it was pale and white, as I had ever seen it when looking through the windows of my earthly body. He seemed to be trying to show me the path of duty in earth life: he, and he alone, knew the conflicts of the poor, caged spirit.

I cried out in agony: "Oh! make me see clearly, and I will follow as I would my God." As I sent out the hungry cry he was gone, and standing in his place was my [I am not permitted to give the name given me], clothed in robes of living light, his long, silvery-white hair and beard forming a crown of glory.

He took me in his arms and called me his daughter. "Father," and I was at rest. He told me he had been my father, as I had never had a father in the true sense of the word, all my life.

O! he told me so much that I am not permitted to give out; that the soul, to be complete, must have every longing satisfied; that my earthly father had never fulfilled that, because I was born of him only from the flesh, but that I was his soul child; that his love had created me: that the ties of flesh are only food for the worms, unless forged by love; that thousands of parents to-day are called father and mother that know not the meaning of the word. "You, daughter, want to know your duties; follow me, your Father in Heaven."

The great dome of heaven opened and a bright light descended upon him and bathed him in living glory. "I will, Father, follow you." Softly to my side stepped my guide. "Come, the watcher by the side of your body calls." "But, Father, why need I go? You say I may follow you; cannot I do it better here than in earth life? What is for me there? Here is my father and my soul's completeness."

With my hand in my guide's hand, he, my guide, with a soft, reproachful look, whispered: "Your child."

In agony I cried: "But, Father, is she my child?"

"Now, daughter, the great solution of your life is before you. Answer, O, soul! was she born of love? If so, return."

Unveiled I stood.

Once more I gazed upon that form of clay, and begged to wait a moment—I so dreaded to return—earth looked so dark, so cold and so loveless.

"But," with the old white look I knew so well, "we must not betray a trust, child; the watcher has well fulfilled his duty; he trusted us, we trusted him; now, without one backward glance, return once more to earth, and we will come again for you. Forget me not, and follow your father in heaven."

NOT CHRISTIAN.

She Quotes Bible Like a Preacher.

Thinks Ingersoll a Better Teacher Than Jesus.

To the Editor:— While reading your estimable Progressive Thinker, of Oct. 17, I saw a plea for Spiritualists to take the title of Christian. I for one emphatically say; No, I will never bear that name; neither will I endorse all of Jesus of Nazareth's teachings. Whether my foundation is sand, time will tell.

I think Col. Robert Ingersoll's teachings are superior to the teachings of Jesus as found in Mathew 10:34, 35:—"Think not I came to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law." Then that wonderful Sermon on the Mount is some more of the teachings of the greatest teacher the world has ever known, as our Sister Ida C. Hawkins calls him.

Read Math. 6: 31:—"Therefore take no thought saying what shall we eat, or or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed." Verily, I think we would all come under the class called tramps, to follow that rule.

Then turn to Mark 11: 13. 14: "And seeing a figtree afar off having leaves, he came, if haply he might find anything thereon, and when he came to it he found nothing but leaves, for the time of figs was not yet. And Jesus answered and said unto it: No man eat fruit of thee hereafter forever. And his disciples heard it." Surely the tree was not in fault; that looks very unjust in a great teacher.

The good things ascribed to him are well known to have been given by teachers that antedate the Nazarene. If she will carefully read her Testament that was voted to be all right at the Council of Nice, she will find other objectionable passages; but I think, to a Christian Spiritualist, one would have to believe in the blood atonement, the water baptism, and a burning hell. We think the baptism of the Holy Ghost is all-sufficient, and we have as good, perhaps far better teachers.

And furthermore, be it understood, I disclaim Christian as a distinguishing title, and am just as positive about it as the good sister is that she must have it. I refer her to Volume II. of Brother Francis' Encyclopedia, which tells of a few of the horrid murders done by Christians.

I investigated the Christian religion until ten years ago, when I struck Spiritualism, and, I am as sure I have found a truth as old as man gives us any history for, as I can be. I am 63 years of age, and I have studied the Bible as few working women have done, who have eleven children, and can give almost anything in the way of Christian mythology, but for pity's sake don't tack that onto our true, our beautiful philosophy; let it be free of the mistakes of our ancestors, the Gorillas of the Dark Ages. I claim to be honest and honorable, and now and forever a Spiritualist, and could not be anything else if I wanted to.

THE TURKEY'S PRAYER.

O, thou Lord of misery and of love,
From hades below or heaven above,
Thou hast prospered this nation so well;
Hast built high churches of stone and of wood,
In thine own name, to shelter the good
Who murder thy broodlings their cravings to quell.

It does seem so hardened, O, Infinite One,
To see my chicks slaughtered with hatchet and gun,
By thy children—so thankful—who buy and who sell,
Who revel in plenty, in luxury live;
But never a penny to poverty give—
It makes my old bosom with sorrow to swell.

If this is religion, and Christ died to save
The people who killed him, no wonder they crave
To kill and devour a creature like me.
So in tenderness, Lord—adieu to my flock—
A ransom I offer myself on the block—
My body to sinners—my soul unto thee.

How thankful, O, Father, I am that I am,
So fondly they'll love me with cranberry jam;
Forgive them for killing—'tis all that they know—
To pray for their neighbors who haven't enough,
And cruelly murder, their stomachs to stuff,
For thine be the glory, amen—I must go!

PROPHECIES.

A Remarkable Vision of the Future.

Some Wonderful Discoveries and Inventions Foreshadowed.

I became intensely interested while reading of Prof. Bell's Radiophone catching the sunbeams and talking through them. For years I have been told that great discoveries were coming to the people of earth; that there was a race of psychic men and women upon the earth through whom these discoveries were to be made; that this planet through the ages has been evolving higher and still higher races, and through the coming of higher entities with their advanced thoughts the atoms of the earth have also evolved a finer atmosphere, purer and free from crude, dense matter; and through inspired intellectual thoughts have drawn from the great realm of Akasa, or Nature's storehouse, finer forces, thus preparing the world for the remarkable discoveries and inventions that have come and are to come.

The telescope, the telegraph, the telephone, the phonograph, the photophone, the radiophone, the Roentgen X ray—all these are wonderful, beautiful and useful discoveries, and amaze the world with the possibilities of the human mind. But I wish to say right here, they are nothing compared to that which is to come. We are just in the vestibule of this Temple of Science.

The unknowable is to become knowable, and the unknown seas of science are to be thoroughly sailed with charts and compasses and every known device to gain information and knowledge; for a new era is coming—indeed, it is here; a new schedule has to be made—a new time-table must be issued to meet the demand of that power that is calling: "Come up higher."

But who and what is making these marvelous discoveries? Is it the physical man? No; it is the psychic, spiritual man. The psychic realm that wraps this earth in a rose-colored light (this is why it is called the pink star), is filled with thought substance, pictures, essences, as a French chemist has proved in his laboratory; he has through a chemical process brought from this atmosphere that which would take the place of bread, fruits and meats, thus proving that Nature's storehouse is filled with everything to feed us—filled with light, with fire or heat, in fact it is a world that, did we understand or know what was coming, it would read like a fairy-tale—we would not, we could not believe it.

Now the psychic man that is bringing forth all these grand manifestations through the law of concentration and vibration is far more marvelous than all else—the discoverer is more wonderful than the thing discovered.

This thinker in man that takes these crude substances and brings forth living principles and formulates them into entities, is the wonder-machine of the great cosmos; he is the epitome of all life from first to last, and this thinker can pull on any of these invisible wires and produce the effect—that is, working from cause to effect.

Franklin sent up his mighty thought and brought down the fiery beam, and it has been tamed for man's use, and now does his bidding in almost every department of life. All these invisible, subtile agents can only be utilized through the invisible thinking man, who bends all his energies to reach that acme of life, and to bring into visible use those marvels of scientific discoveries.

But, as we said, this psychic man has but just entered the vestibule of the temple—this temple is the universe and is filled with infinite knowledge and wisdom, and man is also filled with the same infinite possibilities, and as he unfolds a higher state of consciousness he will find an unexplored region so wonderful, he will stand amazed and silent at its grandeur.

The time is coming when this psychic man can read the heavens with accuracy, even without a visible star or telescope; when, with marvelous power, he will photograph mysterious substances, bringing forth visible results; when he can write with a pen of fire in the air—writing that can be read from long distances; so that "a man that runs may read;" when he can, with unerring aim, throw the searchlight of truth into men's minds and there reveal the marvelous workings of the brain in its lower as well as higher evolution; in fact, nothing can be hidden under its powerful ray. It will dissolve material substances and they will be made to disappear through the subtle force of will, and be as naught.

Man has been unconsciously preparing through the ages for this coming of a higher civilization when he can subserve all these forces for his use. Fifty or a hundred years from now railroads, telegraphs, telephones, phonographs will have served their purpose and will be a thing of the past, for these invisible forces, through the psychic, spiritual man, will become so utilized and useful, we will not need these cruder forms of transit, or talking machines; for as the new cycle dawns upon us, the focalized light of past centuries comes with it, and the illumined soul sees and hears the attuned vibrations that come from higher spheres of life; their perceptions are quickened, the brain is sensitized, the whole man becomes a sensitive plate upon which impressions are thrown. And hence discoveries are coming that will appall the people. Soon we will have our flying machines, auraphones—a sensitive machine to show what a person's vibrations are, and if they are in harmony and rhythm with those singing, vibratory ethers, sufficiently to go into higher classes of learning.

We will also have our spectrophones to detect and discern the colors that radiate from this psychic man, that will show how highly evolved he is.

A new force is going to be discovered, whereby through inbreathing, these forces become intensified within us and we overcome the law of gravitation, and through the law of levitation we will be able to go at will from place to place—time and space will be as naught, for man can compass them.

He will be able, from his own home, to communicate with friends at a distance without visible means; he will be able to control the elements and work a revolution in everything.

All this is coming and not very slowly. But before it fully comes, man is going to evolve into a finer, more complete, God-like man. He must come into harmony and rhythm with the universe to such an extent that he will understand how to connect with those finer currents of ethers that we know little about as yet. But will know more about as we unfold the higher attributes of the psychic or spiritual man.

And he must learn to be a law unto himself—to be master.

Now, this is all coming slowly, but if we wish to hasten this good time, the God-like man must predominate, instead of the animal fighting man. He must learn to live right, think right, act right, for "as a man thinketh, so is he." He will not want to war against his brother any more. If he has malice, envy, hate, jealousy or uncharity in his heart he cannot call to himself these higher forces. He must have love, peace, charity and good-will to man. He must become unified in all these graces that belong to the true soul; and thus it is within his power to bring this condition to earth, sooner or later.

Then, all hail to the new era!—to the new man—to the new force. We are marching on to a more glorious life, to a grander civilization, to greater achievements. Brotherhoods are springing up everywhere. The time is coming when men that have great wealth will not call it theirs, but only loaned to them to do good with. His heart of stone will be gone and man will have a great sympathetic heart that will want to bless all mankind by trying to put his more unfortunate brother in a way to help himself, not to bestow riches upon him, but to give him plenty of work, good pay and few hours of labor; giving the worker more time to read and improve his mind. Of course we are supposing that all are willing to work.

Now this is a true prophecy of what is coming; and this is only a beginning. Then let man begin to-day, reaching toward the light. The wisdom spheres of truth divine are always open, and ever from this unseen source cometh light to all who seek it. In melody or verse it falls on all alike, but some are more ready to catch the blossomed spray of love's divine bequest.

No single soul the truth can have complete—vast stores of knowledge lay completely frozen in a thought, that aeons takes to warm to life its sealed empyrean, whose tabulated energy lies souled within.

The Book of Nature opens for one and all alike; this consciousness within can reach to finer consciousness afar in realms of light and gather to itself the power to prove its Godship. Then reaching for the light of truth should be our constant aim, for only as we reach can we this light obtain.

NATURAL LAW.

A Christian's Christ, or a Christless Christian.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL AND SPIRITUAL UNFOLDMENT.

To the Editor:—There seems to be a natural desire in the human mind for wisdom, and there must be a natural cause for that desire, and there must be a natural law by which that desire can be fulfilled. Material science has failed to find what satisfies that desire, and the Christian religion has tried to satisfy it by teaching the people to have faith in a Christ that lived on earth some two thousand years ago—more or less—and that doesn't seem to satisfy the cravings of the human spirit. They have tried all kinds of faiths and creeds to save humanity in their ignorant, undeveloped state of mind, and left out the only possible way by which the human family can become wise and happy—and that one way is to obey the voice of Nature's divine law that evolved their present state of intelligence; no matter what teachers have taught in the past, or in the present, in or through their holy Bibles, or what the Bible gods and Christs have said, or what the spirits may dictate to us through our unconscious mediums.

It seems to be the delight of an undeveloped spirit—in the material body, or out—to control others, in the room of controlling themselves, and that accounts for our spiritual philosophy being run in the line of a Punch and Judy show. But don't be discouraged, my friend, if you are a true Spiritualist you can send out the white-winged messenger of love to those in the body or out, and become a ministering angel while in your body. This is the mission of the heaven-born philosophy of true Spiritualism.

But in order to carry the power of the spirit with us, we must unfold our own moral and spiritual natures first. This is why the Christian religion has failed to satisfy the thinking and reasoning minds of humanity—because they depended on an outside Christ—hence Christless Christians.

If Spiritualism is going to be the modern Moses to lead people out of the wilderness of creeds, the leaders will have to become morally developed, and spiritually unfolded, in order to succeed spiritually, or they will be imitating the Christless Christians by saying thus saith the spirits. Spiritual science is coming to enlighten the world, but not in the shape of Punch and Judy shows. If Spiritualists intend to enlighten the Christless Christians they will have to become morally and spiritually unfolded, not by being controlled by spirits, but by controlling themselves, by unfolding their own spiritual natures.

This will require an effort. Each one has a work none other can do.

Is wasted—mingled with the dust,
Staining the earth, and lost to man,
While the poor vase is broken. It holds
Not even a drop—unfit for aught
Save most ignoble use—preserves
Perhaps a crust for mendicants
Who come after the feast. I mourn
The wasted wine. The fountain flows
Always with water. Nature is kind;
But only in a generous mood
She unbends her law and gives Celestial wine.
The narrow brain
And feeble hand should not be chosen.
The dull bacterian has nerves
That may be played upon; but Science
Nor Nature try Experiments
With him and thunderbolts.
Angels behind the veil!
Had you no noble savage you could train
To heavenly uses? Even a scholar
Might be coerced to read his dreams,
And tell his visions in a tongue
Simple to all mankind. Laughter
And scorn would not have followed them
Who spoke truth unadorned, and lived
A life unblemished by dark Sin
And Ignorance.

IN SPIRIT-LIFE.

Our Homes Over There.

The human heart yearns to know what can be known of the homes that exist for us in the hereafter. A lecture on the subject by Mr. J. J. Morse is crowded with interest in an adequate exposition of it. It has been argued in days gone by, said he, that all the priceless treasures of earthly home-life were sacrificed at death, and a man had no need to remember them when enjoying the greater blessings of the country beyond. But if he was the same person after death that he was before, the memory of the dearest place in all his life could not be effaced from his consciousness. The Spiritualist learns from those benign beings who come to him from the heavenly world that death has not destroyed the identity and consciousness of life, that man still lives, and that all that made man in affection and consciousness have gone with him ever there, and that he still remembers. And if he still remembers, he will not forget that dearest spot in all his life on earth called his home, and he will ask: "Where is my home here in this new country?" It would rob him of one of his dearest and sweetest privileges to deprive him of a home beyond. It is not possible that he can be so cheated of his joy. One very simple reason stands against it. If he lives as himself, so will they who made the domestic joy and happiness of his mortal life.

They are over there, too, and he and they still live; and wheresoever they are will be a home again, purified and exalted because immortal, but home in the sweetest sense that home can be to man on earth. Why should man have a home beyond? How sad it is to think that people entertain the thought that the life of home that makes the present life so blessed, and lifts us so high, is to be considered as low and poor and useless in the world beyond! We take with us the hopes and desires that we possessed on earth. And if there are homes, there may be houses, and they must be made of something. Hence they will be material, objective things, and thus can hardly be spiritual things. Hence arises the suggestion that there cannot be homes in the hereafter in the sense that there are homes here. But suppose this is met by saying that all things are spiritual things; that this world is as much a manifestation of the divine spirit as the so-called spiritual world; that the whole universe is but a manifestation of the divine in Nature, varying in quality, character and degree with the grade or plane upon which the manifestation transpires. Thus we recognize the essential proposition that the universe is a spiritual manifestation, and therefore homes are possible, probable, and may be actual wheresoever they are found.

What kind of of homes shall we find over there? How are they builded? We build them ourselves in part. Our angel friends contribute their quota, and such as is our life in this world will be the corresponding kind of home and its furnishings that will be ready for us over there. If we have lived a debased and degraded life devoid of spirituality and refinement, the probabilities are that to a certain extent we shall find ourselves homeless on the other shore. If we have made no effort to provide for that future, we shall land on that shore spiritual paupers, and be dependent on the benevolence of our more fortunate friends. Each one of us, and every one, finds some kind of home and shelter over there, but the character and quality of that home depends almost entirely upon the character and quality of the individual, though there are certain exceptions, as, for instance, some persons may have been unfortunate in this world, suffering all their lives under bitter and troublous circumstances, and rendered weak and poor. When they die the angel-friends receive them, sustain them in homes that are gladly opened to such poor sufferers, and in such sweet nursing they win back strength and spiritual health, and begin to grow in mind and soul, realizing the growth which harsh circumstances denied them here.

We may divide the homes of the hereafter into three classes: those of the extremely good in the highest and broadest sense, people who were good simply because they were good, and not on account of any association with church, class or community; those who drifted along, without any particular attempt to stem the torrent; and the homes of those who were not only good but were positively evil. We go to the other world neither better nor worse than we were here. If we have made evil our good here, it will continue to be our good till we can rise beyond it. It is a great mistake to think all wicked persons are sorrowful persons, miserable, unhappy. So long as a man delights in doing evil he will be as happy in doing it as another man, who delights in doing good, is happy in doing good. It is not until conscience asserts itself that the sorrow, anguish and pain begin to reveal themselves. It is to be remembered that the conditions of this world are too frequently so favorable to wickedness and so unfavorable to virtue, that it is no wonder people do live evil lives in this world by force of circumstances. A man is not to be judged by his act, but by the light of the causes that led to the act. In his sty of evil the wicked man is at home; in the courts of heaven he would be out of place. So he finds his companions on the same plane of spiritual and moral development as himself.

With them he finds a companionship and home. It would be the best home that that man could find. It is what he is fitted for, and he is entitled to what he is fitted to enjoy. He is in the spirit-world, but at present his soul is not attuned to its glorious harmonies. He only sees and feels and hears the discords in himself repeated in the world around him. Why, therefore, make such efforts to save men's souls or convert them, when their souls can never be lost, and they will work out their salvation for themselves? The time to offer sympathy, and help is when the process of conversion begins—the quiet, wise, brotherly, sisterly sympathy that utters only a word, gives but a handclasp or a passing smile, which are a revelation and an inspiration to the recipient. In process of time the wicked emerge from the lower conditions of homes in which they have lived, cease to suffer from the peculiar affliction which makes them see the record of their own evil lives and thoughts reflected in their own mental atmosphere. It is always the unhappy man who becomes the reformer. If Jesus had been content with the good things of life, and had not felt the woes of the world, he would never have been nailed on the tree. The spirits are charged with not being reliable authorities in describing their conditions. People of various grades of development belong to this class of homes in the spirit-world.

On the spirit-side, even more than on earth, the character of the persons living in the home is comprehended from its conditions, circumstances and furnishing. There are some people in whom the instinct of home is not well developed, being subordinated to other tendencies. All kinds of people in this respect exist on the spirit-side of life. Those tenderest and dearest to us wait for us and are with us in that happiness which makes life so beautiful even on earth. But none can describe the glories of that higher realm of spirit-life where dwelt the exalted and the advanced. Who can paint the beauty and the sweetness of the homes, temples, and even palaces that exist there, the grandeur of the peoples, the wonder of their homes, the splendor of their surroundings? Who can tell of the happiness and peace, the treasures of knowledge and wisdom, the fountains of love that are there? Words fail here. The homes of the hereafter meet every condition of mind and soul and character, and have within them the possibilities that ultimately vindicate the innate goodness of human nature, and assure the eternal progress of every individual soul. Serenely and sublimely poised, there shall float in the everlasting realms of Being these spiritual homes, and the tasks and trials that baffle our weaknesses here shall there be triumphed. The universe may pass, but God remains. Sweet homes, royal souls, noble lives, grandeur and beauty beyond words to describe—this is what the gospel of Spiritualism offers, these the homes awaiting us in the hereafter.

HOME AGAIN.

Some Reflections on the National Convention.

Thinks Some Beneficial Changes Might Be Made.

To the Editor:—Home again, home again—not exactly from a foreign shore, but from the magnificent capital of our united country, where I with thousands of others in years gone by marched through its streets to the music of the fife and drum, in 1861, to take the positions assigned us to guard its buildings and property from an internal foe trying to fasten the curse of human slavery upon this fair and heretofore prosperous nation. I went into that conflict young, well and strong, weighing 163 pounds and leaving a dearly beloved wife and two little innocent children behind me, and after two years service as 2nd Lieutenant, 1st Lieutenant, and Captain, I was sent home to die of maladies contracted in the army, weighing but 90 pounds. But the invisible forces surrounding me saw fit to preserve my life on this sphere of existence, thinking that I might be made an instrument for the uplifting and elevation of humanity out of the creeds and superstitions of orthodoxy. I hope I have been able to do so—have faithfully tried to for the last twenty years, and shall to the end of my earthly existence.

But, pardon me, please; I took my pen in hand to write you of the National Spiritualists' Convention. Mrs Aspinwall and I were sent as delegates from the Northwestern Camp-meeting Association. We arrived at the Ebbitt House in time to attend the reception given to the delegates, Monday evening, which was largely attended by as intelligent, thinking, brainy people as you would desire to meet. The largest parlor in the hotel was designated as our's for the event, but it was entirely too small for the great number attending, and the hotel management kindly gave us the use of the beautiful parlors on the second floor.

We met many old and valued friends whom we had not met for years, and it was a great pleasure to recall and talk over again the events of former work and trials. We also made many new friends and acquaintances, who are engaged in the work, who will take the place of those who through age and physical infirmities are forced to give up a life-work which has had its many trials and troubles as well as its pleasures and joys.

The convention was called to order the next morning by our talented and well beloved president, H. D. Barrett, who is one of the best presiding officers in the United States, and whose address was a marvel of completeness, giving the amount of work done by him in the last year (which was a seeming impossibility for one human being to accomplish), outlining the work before the convention, making recommendations in regard to ordination, half-fare rates, mediumship, and fakeship, all to the point and so strongly impressed upon the members of the convention that they must have a lasting effect.

I was very glad to note, and proud of the fact, that the Northwestern Camp-meeting Association over which I have the honor to preside, was the banner organization in contributions to the National Association, having given President Barrett while here over $200. The next highest contributor was the Mississippi Valley Association, the amount being $185—both Western organizations; and others that were supposed to be wealthier and stronger in members, from that amount, down to, I think, $25. I was sorry to see that less than one-half of the societies belonging to the N. S. A. were represented by delegates—the reason, as stated by myself and others, was that the expense was more than most people could afford, and I think that if some arrangement is not made to accommodate the Western delegates, there will be less attendance and less contributions each year. I think the promoters of the N. S. A. will bear me out in saying that the first convention was made possible by the contributions of Western men. $700 was called for, and I was the means of furnishing $100 of that amount; and the delegates were largely Western and Middle State men and women. I do not recall any New England delegates, and am under the impression that they opposed the movement. I tried hard to introduce a resolution to hold the convention in the different large cities yearly, but was told that it was impossible—Washington was the only place possible. Time will, in my opinion, demonstrate the fact that the West as well as the East must be accommodated. But I see, Mr. Editor, that though not through, I must close this lengthy screed. More anon.

THOUGHT PHOTOGRAPHY

Mental Pictures Transferred to Sensitive Plates by Will Power.

Faithful Likenesses of Those Thought of Appear.

A new fad has seized upon society, says the New York Herald. Thought photograph clubs have been formed, with surprising and sometimes startling results. By fixing the gaze upon an undeveloped photographic plate, or even holding these plates in the hands, figures of persons and forms of a very extraordinary character have been produced when these plates were developed.

This is far and away more interesting than palmistry and crystal-gazing, as these might by a prejudiced mind be attributed to imagination, but actual pictures on an actual plate cannot be so accounted for. The only alternative in this case is the assertion of fraud. This is done away with when the undeveloped sensitive plates are purchased at random from any photographer, or those on hand for use in one's private camera are taken.

A brilliant society woman, who is up to date in everything, including the latest scientific discoveries, reflected that if Dr. Baroduc, the Parisian electro-therapeutist, could obtain these pictures and astonish the French Academy of Medicine with them, she ought to be able to do the same. The method was simplicity itself and the cost not worth considering, nothing more being necessary than a box of plates and from two to a dozen people who were capable of concentrating their thoughts on a given person or subject for a few minutes.

Inviting a few trusted friends, a circle was formed and a box containing four unopened plates placed in the center. The results were astonishing when the plates were developed.

LUMINOUS PICTURES.

She was an amateur photographer herself and did the developing. Luminous pictures made their appearance. On the top plate no distinct form was visible, but in the shadowy outlines various figures and faces could be discerned by a lively imagination. On the next plate, however, there was a well defined finger shape, across which lay a light figure that might be held to resemble a female.

But the really startling result was the pictures which developed themselves on the two middle plates. On these were distinct faces, recognized by members of the circle as perfect pictures of living friends they had held in their thoughts. In one case the photograph was that of a brother who had been lost at sea.

A second experimental circle was held. The room was darkened and a new box of plates, unopened, was put into the hands of one person, and the hand of the hostess laid over it for about one minute. Then, without ever allowing the box to pass from her possession, they were developed, and this strange result was discovered: All the plates had pictures, but some were positives and others were negatives. Two had to be transformed to a lantern slide before they could be printed from.

SOCIETY NOW HAS A FAD.

The thing was a success, and now society has a fad that it will not tire of for some time to come. Even the chappies are often fortunate enough to find the face of the heiress they are following up imprinted upon the plate they have held. No woman, heiress or otherwise, could fail to be touched by so convincing a proof as this furnishes that her image dwells in an admirer's breast.

Society women are still women, and when they are able to obtain a photograph of someone they admire, yet don't care to ask for his picture, they experience a sense of power which borders on the supernatural. Sometimes the pictures obtained are of unknown men and women, and then the theory is that these are their affinities not yet encountered, but waiting somewhere in the future.

How is this photography accomplished? Dr. Baroduc's explanation is that every human being has the power of expressing conscious or unconscious thought exteriorly. He believes that a mysterious, impalpable force resides in and emanates from the human body. In the sphere formed about us by this vital emanation our thoughts create forms which the sensitive plate seizes upon and retains. The discovery of the Roentgen ray was a preparation for this statement.

In one of Dr. Baroduc's experiments a society man places himself in front of a fresh photographic plate. He extends his hands in the direction of the plate and is requested to think of some one particular thing with all the energy and concentration of mind of which he is capable.

At the end of a period which varies from two minutes to two hours the plate is impressed by a sort of luminous cloud, in which the outlines of certain objects can be discerned. These vary in distinctness, according to the character of the thinker, and can only be expected to appear when he has fixed his mind on some concrete and clearly defined object.

The kind of thought photograph most easy to produce is a likeness of some person.

Thus it will be seen that society in this, its newest fad, has at last taken up something that is of real value in demonstrating the world's mental progress and in proving the power of mind over matter. If this fad really results in turning the minds of the smart set toward things that are not altogether of the earth earthy, the fact will rank with the most pronounced achievements of modern scientific thought.

Such is the account of this newest discovery in the realm of mind and its mystic powers over the kingdom of form and matter. It will, if we mistake not, become more than a fad for "the upper ten thousand," furnishing, as it does, abundant evidence of some of the more advanced claims of the world of spirit intelligence.

WILLIS F. WHITEHEAD.

"Cosmian Hymn Book." A collection of original and selected hymns, for liberal and ethical societies, for schools and the home; compiled by L. K. Washburn. This volume meets a public want. It comprises 258 choice selections of poetry and music, embodying the highest moral sentiment, and free from all sectarianism. Price, 50c. For sale at this office.

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records," Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

CHRISTIANITY.

Is It of Divine Origin? That Is the Question.

The Testimony of Ancient Spirits About It.

TO THE EDITOR:—Prof. Jos. Rodes Buchanan has had much to say in THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER about what he calls the true and the false Christianity—the Christianity of Christ and the Christianity of the church—the "heavenly religion" and the "hellian religion." He calls the former "the old religion of Jerusalem," and says it was identical with "the young religion of America," which we call Spiritualism, but the proper name for it is Christianity. And, though the Jewish Spiritualists far exceeded the modern Spiritualists in the attainment of a real "brotherhood," still, he thinks we may yet reach their high standard of nobility.

We may pause here and inquire: Why should the adherents of a Spiritualism or a religion of this enlightened age be inferior morally and spiritually to the followers of a religion of eighteen hundred years ago? How many Spiritualists of America will accept this idea? If the American people are less intelligent and moral than the ignorant, turbulent, quarrelsome Jewish subjects of Pagan Rome, then had we best give up our American republic, and our Spiritualism, and become pupils of the wandering Jews. No! Our Spiritualism, in its phenomena, philosophy, religion, and moral ethics, is far in advance of the Spiritualism of any other age or country. It opens up to the mind a vast field of thought, and gives freedom of the exercise. No other such opportunity was ever given mankind for studying the great problems of human life—its origin, source and destiny. It brings us face to face with the cause of things and the life that is spiritual, and we may learn and understand the mysteries pertaining to it, which have puzzled the ages, and know to a certainty who we shall be and what we shall do, over there.

In a moral point of view the Spiritualists of this country stand a head higher than any other class of people. In the cause of temperance they are active—no drunkards, criminals or insane are among them.

On the social question—"equality of sex" and "female suffrage"—Spiritualists are quite unanimous, and they are not behind as advocates of the reforms proposed in government affairs.

More spirituality would not hurt us, but we cannot obtain it from anyone in the past or present; it must be unfolded and built up from within, by individual effort to attain the highest good.

In regard to the false Christianity, Mr. Buchanan says it was manufactured at Rome in the second century, by falsifying the life and teachings of Jesus Christ, interpolating Paul's writings and the original Gospels, etc. Very well, but where does he get his proof? Is there any historic record of such transactions? No, he does not claim any. He claims to have come to this conclusion by making practical the heavenly religion of Spiritualism—coming in communication with ancient spirits living near the commencement of the Christian Era.

He says he has "been for years familiar with the men of the apostolic age, and knows how delighted they all are at this reappearance of their Christianity on earth." And from them he learns all about the true and false Christianity, the former originating with Jesus Christ, and the latter a base forgery of the former.

He says: "The church is not based on Christianity, but on the fraud that was substituted for Christianity at Rome, and justified itself by compiling a fraudulent Testament; not in the first century, when the primitive Christians were still living, but a hundred years after they were all dead. The forgeries manufactured then are the chief basis of the church to-day."

This view of the origin and basis of the "Holy Church," and the Christian religion, will be very startling to Christians. But let them ponder upon it, and may be they will get their eyes open and take a step forward; and if so be that they should advance to where Buchanan is, I will ask them to take a step further.

We all want the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and most essentially in the line of religious thought; for the religious instinct is the guiding star of life; this must be right or the whole man is wrong. While the mind is hampered with religious errors, or fetich idols, the moral and spiritual nature does not unfold and the base nature rules. This is proven to the sorrow of the world in the history of Christianity. Therefore the mind must have the freedom of the whole field of truth. The heavenly religion of Spiritualism is the dispensation of truth. The acquisition is rapid under its ministration, and when fearless to announce and defend it, spiritual progress is also rapid.

Then let us aspire for the truth, and reason together. And let me say here, that, although the Professor has started on a grand discovery, I cannot conclusively agree with all of his ideas. I do not believe in retrograde movements. I do not want the name Christianity applied to my Spiritualism; nor do I want anything to do with any fetich that system of religion has been carrying these fifteen hundred years, and will carry fifteen hundred more unless demolished by an outside power.

Spiritualism is the heaven-ordained power to do this demolishing, and I am not going to be false to my trust. And it seems strange that some of our best-informed minds should persist in helping the church to carry its load of frauds and false dogmas, with which it may still continue its grip on the human mind.

And I cannot agree with the Professor on the two Christianities. In my opinion there never was a Christianity, or religion of that name, other than the one manufactured at Rome. This was not a forged counterfeit of a prior Christianity, which it destroyed, but a clean-cut invention, compounded from various sources. It was not, however, without its frauds, its forgeries, its interpolations, changes and even burning of sacred records.

As much as Mr. Buchanan, from his standpoint, may see in the forgeries and religious dogmas of Christianity that is hellish, it is only a glimpse of the wholesale lying resorted to by its founders in the story they tell about Jesus Christ. Certainly it is worse than he imagines; and millions are still accepting these lies as truth.

These founders of Christianity, the pagan priesthood at Rome, have a deep-laid scheme, and they preface it with an account of the beginning of things, in which God creates the earth from nothing, a man from its dust and a woman from his rib, perfect beings, and places them in a beautiful garden where trees are laden with delicious fruit, and tells them of the fruit of a certain tree of which they "must not eat."

But there appeared a serpent on the scene, and the woman being most inclined to evil was enticed by it to eat of the forbidden fruit, and she gave to the man and he did eat. For this act of disobedience God was angry, and cursed them, and all the race of mankind coming after them, and they were driven from their beautiful home in a "fallen, lost state."

In the course of time, having multiplied considerably, and being depraved and full of sin, God got mad again and destroyed the race from the face of the earth by "a great flood," saving only "righteous Noah" and his family, hoping from him to produce a better humanity. However, he is disappointed—the after-Adam race is as wicked as the antediluvian. So, we presume, he takes the awful situation under deeper reflection and conceives of a different plan of redemption. He thinks if he should be get a son of a woman among the people of earth, who should be as righteous as Adam's race had been wicked, and have this righteousness act as proxy—infuse itself into all believers in this son, and he have power to forgive sins, so many as did believe would certainly be redeemed and restored to the "perfect state" in which Adam was created—provided his "hot wrath" against these rebellious children can be appeased; and this may be done by the son making a sacrifice of his life in a cruel death on a cross, thus shedding his blood for and suffering in the believers' stead, then he will not send them to hell, nor remember their iniquities any more.

It does not seem, were the actualization of these ideas possible, that intelligent men of that age of the world could have entertained them as facts, and when we see millions stoutly defending them as "God's Holy Word," in this advanced age, we are abashed and wonder at the credulity and irrationality of religious people.

And the priesthood catch the inspiration of these ideas and announce to the people that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son as a ransom for the sins of the world, that whomsoever should believe in him might not perish but have everlasting life."

How this came about is told thus:

"Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When, as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost. And while Joseph thought on these things, behold the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying: 'Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary, thy wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost, and she shall bring forth a son and thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins.'"

This revelation came to the priesthood at Rome in the early part of the third century, but the birth of the child is placed in Judea, at the commencement of the Christian Era, over two hundred years before. Of the events of his miraculous birth, life and death on the cross, there is no historic record, and nothing is known of him except what is found in the Testament, which was not compiled till four hundred years, at least, after the occurrence of the narrated events.

How strange that a man of so much importance to the world, who was sent to redeem it from sin; who possessed such wonderful power that all who believed on him had their depraved natures substituted by immediate righteousness; who did so many marvelous things, and had fulfilled his mission—shed his blood for the remission of sins; had been raised bodily from the grave and ascended with it to heaven—should not have been known by someone living contemporary with him, and but for the Pagan priesthood never would have been known by anyone. There being this total lack of historic proof of any of the events in the life of this man, there could not have been a Christianity, or a religion and brotherhood founded by him as is claimed.

The Christian, or Catholic, Church was not organized till the first half of the third century, and Leo, from 440 to 461, was, no doubt, the first Pope.

I cited above the two priestly stories, the fall and flood, because they belong in the Christian scheme of salvation. They show a continuously unchanged idea or conception of God; he was still, at the commencement of the Christian era, a personal being possessing the base attributes of man. In the fall was found a legal excuse to the priestly mind for the plan of a savior to restore "the lost." And to make the plan a success, not as a benefit to the world but to the priesthood, they invent dogmas and attach penalties that are shocking to the moral sense. Belief is the essential factor. "He that believeth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, let him be accursed."

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." "He that believeth not shall be dammed." "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, prepared for the devil and his angels." "I say unto you, unless you repent you shall all likewise perish."

With the blasphemous story that God's dear, beloved son Jesus had been cruelly put to death to take the consequences of the believers' sins, promising entire absolution—with the above declarations to intimidiate, and with a zeal that allowed the leaders to resort to any means to make proselytes, Christianity soon became a terrible power in the world.

Under Constantine the Great, Emperor of Rome from 306 to 337, it became the state religion of the Roman Empire, he enforcing its decrees wherever its votaries desired.

Thus was united church and state, creating that dread enemy of human progress, and under the authority of the civil power the Christian priesthood became intolerant of honest dissenters from the faith. And scarcely a century had rolled away under the tyranny of church and state rule, when Europe sank in the long, dark night of superstitious ignorance, glutted with the blood of religious persecution, known as the Dark Ages. Dark, because to serve God by belief and faith in Jesus Christ, and by religious observance, was the enforced way and only hope of a happy future. Morality and uprightness of life were more despised than desired, and freedom of thought, new ideas, discoveries and inventions were not allowed, because considered the works of the Devil.

And this dark pall of intellectual and moral night lasted nearly ten centuries—all the work of Christianity, that religion which Christians believe was founded by "the Savior," Jesus Christ, "the son of and equal with God; was both human and divine," and was sent on earth for the grand purpose of redeeming it from sin. But, instead of this, worshiping or serving him has resulted in direful woe to mankind.

In that long night of darkness we only get a glimpse of its bad results manifest in the mental chains that it has riveted on the human mind, binding millions in abject bondage to religious errors which are a lifelong and future curse.

Could this man, a very God, have been the author of a religion such as Christianity has been? The religion has no resemblance whatever to the character of the reputed author. There must be a mistake, or a big fraud somewhere. Has Prof. Buchanan found it? Not exactly.

By substituting Apollonius for Jesus we shall get a better clue to the mystery, not as its author, or as having anything to do with it; but it will solve the mystery of myths in the matter.

We shall have a real man. And he was born about the year 1 A. D., and lived till near the close of the first century, a long and exemplary life. Much that is attributed to Jesus are facts in the life of Apollonius. As a medium for ocular manifestations of spirit power he probably has not had a peer in the world.

What Prof. Buchanan says of Jesus, "there is no other such character as Jesus in either ancient or modern history"—"the greatest inspired medium of whom we have any knowledge," is very applicable to Apollonius.

MODERN SCIENCE.

Interesting Facts and Statements.

Spiritualists Should Examine Science as Well as Phenomena.

NEW EDUCATION.

The new education teaches the child by accustoming him to draw and describe objects before him as nearly as possible as they really are. The fact of having drawn the objects adds still more cells to the group already connected in the description of them. As each impression has its separate cell storehouse, and as each storehouse is connected with the others, the recurrence of any one one impression of an object at any time will bring before the mind a complete picture of all its qualities by the association of ideas. It was just this kind of education that Daudet gave to Guy de Maupassant. He set him to describing natural objects, rejecting every composition as inadequate until one was written which came nearest to describing every possible quality of the objects, and the result of this education was that Maupassant was a marvelously brilliant and pictorial writer. The lecture was illustrated by blackboard sketches of portions of the brain and of the nervous system, to which the speaker frequently referred.

WE KNOW.

There are radiated or magnetic auras, peculiar to certain trees, that so combine with their surroundings as to condense in the form of water, sufficient at times to form puddles under the trees, or at least to keep the ground beneath them wet, under favorable circumstances. Science, so-called, has for ages been sending forth its roots and tendrils in search of the truth, from its first dogma that wood was produced from the bark, to the change of opinion, admitting its sap, and proving its seasons and polar directions, north, south, east and west, as well as its age, by the number, nature and character of its concentric rings. For some time previous to that day upon which the great earthquake of August, 1857, occurred great swarms of crabs of an unknown variety were seen in the Bay of Pata, Chili. They all appeared to be greatly excited and were literally climbing over each other in their efforts to escape the impending calamity. How they knew that the earthquake was collecting its strength to desolate the coast is more than man can say, but that they knew something unusual was about to happen there is no doubt whatever. That there were millions of them may be inferred from the report of Dr. Forbes, who says that "ten days after the earthquake the dead crabs were thrown upon the beach in a wall-like line three to four feet wide along the whole extent of the bay."

THE HUMAN VOICE.

The range of the human voice is quite astounding, there being about nine perfect tones, but 17,592,186,044,515 different sounds; thus fourteen direct muscles, alone or together, produce 16,383; thirty indirect muscles, ditto, 173,741,823, and all in co-operation produce the number we have named, and these independently of different degress of intensity.

An acute musical ear will detect so slight a difference in tone between two notes as the one sixty-fourth of a semitone. This means that in the eleven octaves that the human ear compasses there would be at least some 8,000 or 9,000 consciously different notes.

A CHRISTMAS LEGEND.

Howison in his sketches of upper Canada, says that he met once at midnight on a beautiful moonlight Christmas eve an Indian who was softly creeping along on the ground. Upon being questioned the Indian motioned him to be silent and said: "We watch to see the deer kneel. This is Christmas night and all the deer fall upon their knees to the Great Spirit and look up." At Beyreuth was noticed for some time that two goats always kept close together, one being specially watched and guarded by the other. On inspection it was shown that one goat was blind, and its companion, evidently knowing this, attached itself to its poor afflicted friend and acted as its guide, showing untiring watchfulness and care. If any difficulties had to be overcome, or precipice to be avoided the faithful friend was certain to be seen at the side of the blind goat, tenderly guiding it. This went on for several months. But one day it was noticed that the blind goat was left to its own devices and quite forsaken by its former companion. How was this? Had the faithful friend in affliction grown weary of its self-imposed charge? No, the blind goat had recovered its sight, and, therefore, aid was unnecessary.

In the same neighborhood trouts were reared, and they were transferred, according to their age, from smaller reservoirs refreshed by a running stream. A naturalist took great interest in these fish and fed them from a long-handled spoon. Soon all the trout regularly waited his arrival and stormed the eagerly-looked-for spoon. But there was one poor fish which was either pushed aside or missed its way to the point of attraction. It was blind. At last one of its companions took pity on it, led it up to the ladle, and saw that it obtained a share of the feast.

SEEN AND UNSEEN.

There is a greater world unseen than the world seen, and this world unseen we know by its phenomena. We know that there is a spiritual-world, because there are phenomena which can only be explained by the supposition that there is one. The moral law is a generalized expression for the sum total of actions conducive to our well-being. It has been said that there are few things that cost less than kind words, and few that are more valuable. May we learn this great lesson now. In reply to the request for assistance, the professor said: If I could help you, I could not help helping you. It is because I can not help you that I cannot help refusing you." The mendicant darted around the corner with terror in his eyes and cries of "Help!" in his mouth.

LANGUAGE.

Those who contend we could get on without a language may add another story to prove their point. Everybody knows that in many cases it is not the words used but the manner of speaking which makes the impression. Thus it was that Daniel O'Connell was able to make a market dame rage and storm by calling her a hypothenuse triangle. Some Swedish ambassadors having to present an address to Louis XIV., which they had forgotten, recited the whole of their catechism, and that did just as well. Prof. Drummond tells us in his "Tropical Africa" he was in a similar fix, and got out of it in a similar way. On one occasion four of his carriers ran away. There were three others of the same tribe in the company, and, though the professor knew nothing of their dialect, he determined to teach them a lesson. Beginning with a few general remarks on the heathen, he briefly sketched the geology of Africa, and then broke into an impassioned defense of the British constitution. The three tribesmen trembled like aspens. He concluded his reprimand by solemnly enunciating the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid, and the result of the awful admonition was that the men became the most faithful he had.

ELECTRICITY AND HYPNOTISM.

Experiments in mesmerism under rigidity and anesthesia have been made as in hypnotism, and not presenting any experiment common to both, I will make note of it in mesmerism seeming to require further or totally different explanation. The experiment was made upon a subject in the normal state. Though attention and suggestion as to the nature of the experiment might be given, it seems impossible that in any other known way the subject could have acted as he did. A boy was placed at a table. His arms, passing through a screen, rested upon the table. By this precaution, it was impossible to see the actions of the operator. The operator then made passes over certain fingers, or only pointed at them, with care that no change in temperature or breath of wind should give to the boy knowledge of which fingers were being affected. Then a strong electric current was applied to the mesmerized fingers. No conscious sensation was produced; nor could the sharp prongs of a fork or a burning match held at the end of the fingers awaken consciousness, yet the slightest touch or current of electricty at the same time caused in the unmesmerized fingers conscious sensation. The boy did not know which fingers were mesmerized until told to close his hand; he found that he could not bend them, and thus knew which they were. Such rigidity and anesthesia show force higher than is needed to explain the phenomena resulting from suggestion.

That the mind can so influence the body as to produce organic changes is well illustrated by a case detailed by Tuke, where a woman saw a heavy weight falling and crushing a child's hand. She fainted, and when restored to consciousness was found to have an injury on her own hand similarly located to that sustained by the child. Not only was there a wound, but it went through the various stages of suppuration and healed by granulation. Other well-attested proofs of this power of the mind over the body are afforded in the fact that a blister can be raised by mental suggestion, and that stigmata undoubtedly occasionally appear on the hands and feet, and in the side of certain other slight mischiefs, the supply of tric currents.

CURING DISEASE.

Dr. J. W. Robertson says that more patients are cured by the firm and tactful influence and suggestiveness of the physician than by the drugs which they prescribe in the majority of cases, to stimulate the imagination of the patient. He has found that electricity more than anything else appeals to the imagination, and very often the effects obtained by an electric application are purely psychological. It has frequently happened to him that through a failure to properly connect his circuits, or some other slight mishance, the supply of current was cut off, and yet the patient would exhibit all the symptoms heretofore experienced when really receiving large quantities. Dr. Robertson has frequently, at a word of suggestion, caused the sensation of burning at the electrode to be felt, the limb to contract or to relax, and many other phenomena to assert themselves which were usually associated with the application of electric currents.

Another surgical procedure which has suggestion as a basis is the so-called painless extraction of teeth by using an electric shock at the moment of pulling, and thus diverting the patient's attention. Dr Wetterstand of Stockholm has used this method of treatment in seven thousand cases, and Dr. Bernheim of Nancy in twelve thousand cases, and both are strong endorsers of it. The latter unhesitatingly declares that the study of hypnotic suggestion should be made obligatory in all medical schools, and that a physician who in these days ignores the psychical efement in disease, and is ignorant of the part it plays in pathogeny and therapeutics, is no better than a horse-doctor, and should confine himself to veterinary practice.

AUTO-SUGGESTION.

Dr. Krafft-Ebing of Vienna makes the point of the influence of "auto-suggestion" in the production of disease. It is astonishing to learn the number of ailments and morbid conditions of this sort that originate in the nervous system, and are indicated by pains, paralysis, and other symptoms of hysterical, hypochondriac, and neurasthenic affections. Though they are not merely imaginary complaints, they cease with the removal of the "auto-suggestive cause," which may be effected by hetero-suggestion or any change of scene that banishes it from the thoughts. It is shown by the experiments of a distinguished physician of Munich on eight thousand seven hundred and five persons of different nationalities that only six per cent were perceptible of the hypnotic influence.

Greenville, N. C. has developed a sound sleeper in the person of a 15-year old boy. Sometime after he retired one night his mother heard an unusual noise in the boy's room as if some one was struggling. Going in she found him tossing himself about on the bed. Calling him she received no response, and even a vigorous shaking failed to arouse him. The boy's father went in and tried to wake him with no better success. He then took the sleeper in his arms and carried him into another room and poured a pitcher of water on him, but still he slept. The family became alarmed and a physician was sent for who examined the sleeper's heart and pulse and said he could find nothing at all wrong. While those who had gathered were consulting about the boy's condition he awoke and wanted to know what they were doing. He was told what had occurred and asked if he was not sick. He astonished them by saying he was perfectly well, was simply asleep and woke up when his nap was out.

It is fortunate for the human intellect that so many problems are yet to be settled. There is something to do in future ages. Man will always be interested in the problems, the wonders and the speculations of the future life. Those who exercise their reason and intuition can accumulate a larger amount of truth than those who are enclosed within sectarian barriers. Liberalism, through the intellectual courage of our more modern metaphysicians, has of late advanced steadily, and will soon become the ruling power of the world.

CARL SEXTUS.

THEOSOPHIC HISTORY.

How Himalayan Mahatmas Precipitate Messages.

Evidences Indicate that They Use a Brass Seal.

Madame Blavatsky used to get messages in writing from Mahatma Morya, of Tibet, not by mail but by precipitation, signed "M." One day in 1883 Colonel Olcott, passing by a seal engraver's shop in the Panjab, ordered a brass seal bearing the aforesaid cryptograph "M." This seal he gave to Madame Blavatsky as "a playful present." She pointed out a mistake in the shape of the "M"—it was not a good imitation—and she put it into her dispatch box with other odds and ends. She had no use for it, nor did her mahatma need it.

Five years later, when she was in England, her pupil Keightley, living in the house with her, asked what that little brass seal might be. "O, it's only a flap-doodle of Olcott's," she said.

In the same year, 1888, William Q. Judge was staying with Madame. In a letter to Col. Olcott on some official business Mr. Judge used these words: "I believe the Master (i. e., Mahatma M) agrees with me, in which case I will ask him to put his seal here." And plump on the written word came the seal impression. The Colonel could not fail to recognize the seal he had himself procured. Compared with an early Blavatsky missive it was not a good copy, but perhaps the script he imitated was considerably different. Anyhow his copy looks more light, a "We" than an "M," and so do all the fac similes.

Again, in 1890, Mr. Judge received from Madame a telegram for Mr. Keightley in America, and he transmitted the same in a letter from New York. She wished Mr. Keightley to do something. To his surprise the telegram contained an indorsement of the word "Right" in red pencil, signed "M," and with an impression in black of the Panjab seal. He ventured to ask Mr. Judge if the seal had been affixed by him, and was assured that he did not so much as know there was a seal affixed.

Madame Blavatsky died May 8, 1891. Mr. Judge cabled to London: "Do nothing till I come." Fifteen days later he was in London and met Mrs. Annie Besant. He proposed to obtain the advice of Mahatma M. by precipitation, as Blavatsky used to. She agreed. He wrote a question, put it in an envelope and placed it in the cabinet. Mrs. Besant did not stay in the room through the process of incubation. When he took the letter out and showed it to her, there was an answer in red chalk: "Yes. And hope. M."—with the Panjab seal in black.

Next morning there was a meeting of the "Inner Group," of which Mr. Judge was senior head. Some sort of oath seemed to be required on his part, as the newly constituted head. But he deemed an oath unnecessary, and produced a letter from Mahatma M. which had come to him in America, the contents of which he could not yet allow to be seen, save the signature and seal. And he begged them to note the seal. It was the same that Olcott and Keightley knew—but they were not there.

Three days later there was a meeting of the "Esoteric Section" to decide about its future head. It had been expected that Mrs. Besant would be Blavatsky's successor, but Mr. Judge had drafted a plan under which the Council was to be dissolved and its powers delegated to Mrs. Besant and himself as joint "Outer Heads"—the Inner Heads being, of course, the Himalayan Mahatmas. Mrs. Besant took the chair. While turning over her papers on the table there fluttered a little slip, at which she glanced and was about to put it by when Mr. Judge pointedly asked her what it was. Lo! on it in red pencil were the words: "Judge's plan is right." This precipitated message was passed from hand to hand and none questioned its source. So at once Mr. Judge took his seat at Mrs. Besant's side.

Writing on this subject in December, 1894, Mrs. Besant said: "It had never entered my head to doubt the genuineness of these messages, nor to suspect Mr. Judge of any unfair dealing. I willingly take any blame on my gullibility that may be cast on me, for I wish only that the facts may be known."

The next manifestation of the Mahatma was in a letter written by Mr. Judge to Mr. Keightley, May 29, saying, "Fear not, Bert! Masters watch us, and since May 8 have sent word here in writing." Close by the signature of the writer appeared the Mahatmic "M" and the seal, precipitated apparently during transit by mail to Madras.

Again in July, Babula, a personal servant of Blavatsky, received a letter terminating with "Your friend, William Q. Judge," and then, in red pencil, "Yes. M." with the seal impression in black.

In the same month Mrs. Besant received letters from Mr. Judge with the same attestation of the Master and his seal. And later she got a letter with an impression in black carbon of the word "Mahatma" on the inside of the sealed envelope. Was it precipitated after the envelope was sealed? Quite likely; the trick is an easy one and an old one, as anybody may know by consulting books on parlor magic.

Col. Olcott arrived in London in July. He was president of the Theosophic Society and Mr. Judge was vice-president. The Colonel suggested that a sale of some of Madame Blavatsky's jewels would help pay the expenses of the convention. Mr. Judge remarked that the Master had promised a cash contribution, and that the Colonel would soon receive a message himself on the subject. After waiting some time the Colonel jogged Mr. Judge's memory about it. The latter said he had no more to tell. But that very day, on sitting down at his writing-table and lifting a blotting pad, the Colonel found under it a piece of peculiar paper with writing in red pencil, reading thus: "I withhold the message until later. M.," with a faint black imprint of the seal. Presently Mr. Judge left on the same table the following note scribbled on a torn off scrap of paper: "Dear Olcott, Master says he has sent you a message in a queer envelope, and you are to look for it. W. Q. J." The Colonel looked, and sure enough, in an ordinary envelope of a letter previously opened and put by, was a message with a clear imprint of the seal, telling not to sell the jewels, as the money would be provided. This he showed to a brother member, and having replaced it he went off to see Mr. Judge. He told him he had missed a certain brass seal from among the Blavatsky relics and wanted to know if he had seen it. Mr. Judge said he had not. The Colonel said nothing about what he had found among his papers, but remarked that he "hoped no scoundrel would get possession of it and use it to give color to bogus Mahatma messages."

Two days later, when he looked again for the missive, lo! it was gone. Some judicious hand (judicious, pertaining to a judge) had removed it.

When the convention again assembled Mr. Judge announced that a dark, mysterious Oriental figure had appeared to him and deposited two Bank of England notes, of ten pounds each, backed with the familiar red cryptograph.

After this Mr. Judge's mahatma was chary of subjecting any more epistolary efforts to the eye of Col. Olcott. But in September the same cryptograph and stamp appeared in a letter to the Inner Group on the subject of its constitution and future changes. Col. Olcott was visiting America, and he took the opportunity of making some pointed remarks to Mr. Judge on the vagaries of the Master. The result was prompt and significant. During the next month Mrs. Besant received a cablegram from Mr. Judge desiring her not to go to India, and adding, "Grave danger. Olcott. Await further particulars by early mail." Did this mean danger to Olcott or from him? The conclusion of the Inner Group was that the Master warned her against danger from Olcott: in other words, that the Tibetan founder of the society warned her against imperilling her safety in the neighborhood of its president. And it was even suggested that the grave danger may have meant intended poisoning.

In December Mr. Keightley received in India a letter from Mr. Judge warning him that Col. Olcott would try to shake his faith in the mahatma missives, and inclosed in the letter was a slip of paper of the kind used to separate the sheets of type-writing transfer paper. The little slip contained these words in mahatma script: "Judge leads right. Follow him and stick." The seal was omitted; the Mahatma had grown chary of using it after learning what Olcott knew about its origin. Did the Mahatma of the Himalayas use type-writing paper? Blavatsky had gone about with a good supply of it, and Olcott had himself bought it in India as long ago as 1883.

On Col. Olcott's return to India, he got a letter from Abbott Clark, of California, having nothing to do with Mahatmas, but inclosed therein was a message in Mahatma script, saying, "Judge is not the forger you think, and did not write 'Annie' (Besant). My seal is with me (in Thibet?), and he has not seen it, but would like it. Both are doing right—each in his own field. Yes, I have been training him and can use him when he does not know, but he is so new it fades out often, as it may in this letter from an enthusiast." This was signed "M." with a smudge where the seal appeared to have been, as if done with the finger; but there was a postscript, as follows: "Fait per alium applies to the Lahore brass."

The meaning of this appears to be that Mr Judge's part in the performance is "when he does not know," that the carbon stamp "fades out often," as in this very instance; and that the Latin phrase "Fait per alium," used by lawyers (and Mr. Judge was a lawyer) signified that in procuring the flap-doodle seal, Col. Olcott was prompted by the Master himself, who now adopted it, overlooking the blunder in the engraving.

But mark the mistakes of the Mahatma in this message. Mr. Judge had been told by Col. Olcott that the seal was made in "a certain city in the Panjab," and the Master (or Mr. Judge) inferred that that city was its capital, Lahore; but it was made at another city. And when the Master said Mr. Judge "did not write Annie" (Besant), it was a mistake, for he had just written to her inclosing the Master's writing against Col. Olcott.

The Colonel at once wrote to Mr. Clark for particulars about the mailing of that letter, and learned that at the date thereof Mr. Judge had spent two days at Mr. Clark's home. And now it further appears from Mr. Clark's explanation, given at Mr. Judge's request, that the letter was written at the latter's suggestion; that after it was completed it was handed to Mr. Judge for improvement or alteration; that it was handed back to Mr. Clark, and he kept it in his pocket several days before he could buy a stamp at a distant postoffice and mail it. And he naively says that he met Mr. Judge about four days later, and that "Brother Judge said nothing about any message pretended to be from the Master or otherwise."

Once more, and finally, Mr. Judge wrote an amicable letter to Col. Olcott, in January, 1892, reproaching him for not writing. Along the margin of the first page was the following Mahatma script: "I might tell him of your 'poison' interview with Monellah." The only material for suspecting the Colonel of an intention to poison anybody was an innocent conversation with a friend on the subject of poisons, at a date when Mrs. Besant was not even a member of the society. On this trivial incident was founded the belief or suspicion that the cablegram "Danger Olcott," meant poison, and certain rumors from Theosophists in London made the last Mahatma message intelligible to him. Accordingly he wrote to Mr. Judge with some natural heat, to ask what he meant "by his base insinuation," and this is the reply he got: "I have puzzled my head over your reference to 'poison,' as if one of mine; as I never referred to it I cannot catch on, and have given it up in despair."

After this Col. Olcott seems to have given the Mahatma up in despair, too. But the Mahatma continued his work until Olcott was superseded by Mr. Judge.

Mrs. Besant, who at first believed that the messages which came through Mr. Judge were "precipitated," like those that came through Blavatsky, afterwards declared that she was "duped"—that they were written by Mr. Judge's own hand—and she formulated charges against him in these words: "That he practiced deception in sending false messages, orders, and letters, as if sent and written by Masters. . . . That he was untruthful in various other instances enumerated." There was a Theosophic trial of these charges in July, 1894, but Mr. Judge escaped conviction (or acquittal) on technical grounds, whereupon there was a patched-up peace between the contending parties of the brotherhood. Mrs. Besant, however, still believes in the Mahatmas, and adheres to her postulate that, "If there are no Mahatmas, the Theosophic society is an absurdity and there is no use in keeping it up" (Lucifer, December 15, 1890).

Mr. Judge, at least, declared Mrs. Besant's headship at an end, saying that she had "gone outside of her guru," and was under the influence of "the dark powers"—in other words her Mahatma was a demon.

But on the other hand, Mrs. Besant now acquits Mr. Judge of intentional deception, on the charitable hypothesis that he was "a medium, automatically reproducing certain scripts." In other words, the black demon of the Himalayas, Mahatma M, had done it all. And I might add that perhaps it was the same demon, and not Mr. Judge himself, who characterized Spiritualism as the "worship of devils."

For full details on this subject read "Isis Very Much Unveiled," by Edmund Garrett, London, a book of 135 pages, from which the above extract is taken, substantially in the author's own words.

The Liberal Convention.

Amid the multiplicity of duties peculiar to the editor, he neglected to make that mention last week of the Congress of the American Union and Free Thought Federation, which held its annual session in this city on the 13th, 14th and 15th ult., which its importance merited. It was a body composed of some two hundred delegates from all parts of the country, distant Alaska having two. There were also representatives from Europe. Agnostics and Spiritualists met on a platform common to each, and both were gainers by the contact. Secretary Woodbury, of the National Association of Spiritualists, joined hands with the secular movement, and gave a very worthy address, which was welcomed by all. Addresses were also made by President Putnam, Hon. C. B. Waite, of Chicago; Geo. W. Foote and Chas. Watts, London; C. C. Moore, of the Blue Grass Blade; P. W. Geer, Oregon, and several others—all most excellent productions. We find in the Chronicle a brief mention of the closing address by the president of the British National Secular Union, in words following:

"Mr. Foote declared that the Bible did not equal in high moral tone nor in interest or inspiration the works of William Shakspeare. He compared the plea in Jesus' sermon on the mount for mercy—'Blessed are the merciful'—with the passage in "The Merchant of Venice," where Portia says, 'The quality of mercy is not strained,' and contended that in the latter there was more profound knowledge of the human heart and a higher moral purpose.

"All that Freethinkers ask, Mr. Foote declared, is to be allowed to have their own opinions. They neither affirm nor deny that there is a future life, nor that there is a God. They believe that while it is narrow to make a positive assertion that there is a future life and a God, it is quite as bad taste to assert that there is not either. And, contending that each person has the privilege of believing as he chooses, the Freethinkers at the same time demand that no sect or class shall force their creeds upon children in the schoolroom, nor dip into the coffers of the nation to further it. As to the Deity, he continued, if he really exists, it is strange that he should be so cruel to his children as he is said to be, and Freethinkers would find it hard to believe God to be so black as the teachers of religion have painted him. He thought the best death one could wish to have would be the consciousness of a well spent life, and his highest desire would be to earn such an epitaph as Robert Burns wrote for a dear friend:

"If there's a future life he lives in bliss;
If there is not he's done his best in this."

A Mysterious Providence.

A political newspaper before us tells of the supposed death of a distinguished gentleman a few days ago, followed by tears of bereavement, publication of an obituary, the assembling of friends from a distance to be present at the funeral rites; the doctors to the rescue; the administration of nitro-glycerin, digitalis, amyl; the resuscitation of the dead man to life, and then:

"It was, indeed, a wonderful intervention of Providence!"

What shameful nonsense! Providence was not a factor in the case. It is an outrage to lug that gentleman in on every trifling occasion where others are entitled to the credit. It was a case of suspended animation, from inaction of the heart. Skilled physicians were at the bedside. They properly diagnosed the ailment, and administered the most powerful tonics to the circulatory system known to the profession. The heart responded, and resumed its healthy action under the influence of the powerful stimulants. The credit was due the physicians, not to any "mysterious Providence" or any outside influence.

As to this being an isolated case, there are hundreds more marvelous than the one recited. That of Rev. Wm. Tennent, D.D., of New Jersey, about 1735, is best known. He apparently died, and was prepared for burial. After some three days he was reanimated, and lived thereafter near fifty years. But for the insistence of a medical friend that Tennent was not dead, he would have been buried alive and Providence would not have interfered in the matter.

Some people ascribe everything outside the common to the intervention of spirits, as others do to the interposition of Providence. In this we think they err. No greater calamity can befall a person than turning to outside help in every emergency. He soon loses his self-reliance; ambition leaves him and he becomes a worthless appendage to the body politic—the material of which tramps are made.

What thou wilt thou shalt rather enforce with thy smile than hew it with thy sword.—Shakspeare.

Christian Morals.

Very much is said about Christian morals. With an ambition to know what they are, we set out the other day in an earnest search to learn what class of morals receives this distinctive name, as contradistinguished from rules of right which are not peculiarly Christian. We consulted writers on ethics; we plodded through Paley's Moral Philosophy and Locke on The Understanding; we searched through cyclopedias; revived the answers found in the catechisms, based on creeds; we called to mind the Sunday-school lessons of boyhood days, and all the long sermons from "Firstly" up to "Ninthly," and "Lastly," which fell on our youthful ears; but a solution of the problem evaded us. The ten commandments were passed in review, as was the "new commandment I give unto you," but as each was examined in turn it was found older than Christianity, older than Judaism, and very many proved to be older than creation, if that event is bounded by 5,900 years, the exact time according to received chronology.

The "Love one another" was planted in the human breast while man was yet a savage. The "Do to others as you would that others shall do to you," was taught by philosophers many centuries before the period credited to Jesus. The one wife idea is an inheritance from Roman and Grecian civilization. Prayers, ablutions and purifications are as ancient as authentic history. The worship of the Gods was deemed as important in pre-Judean and pre-Christian times as since. And laws to enforce moral conceptions were in vogue and were as rigidly enforced at the beginning of the historic period as now.

Different classes of morals prevail at different periods, as human needs demand. What were good morals in one age are very bad morals in a later age, when civilization is more advanced. In the twelfth century the priestly orders searched through the remnants of Roman and Grecian history—the little which had escaped destruction from the Vandal hands of their predecessors—to learn what was deemed good morals by Pythagoras, by Plato, by Socrates, by Aristotle—the sages of antiquity—and their inculcations were then engrafted on the Christian system. These borrowed plumes from the wings of heathendom are now received as the teachings of divine revelation.

Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness was more strongly inculcated by Pagan writers than by Christian. Paley, in his Moral Philosophy, repudiated the doctrine of a moral sense in man, and held that "Virtue is the doing good to mankind, in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of everlasting happiness." And Locke: "Virtue is generally approved of, not because innate, but because it is profitable." Another learned Christian writer: "Utility is the sole criterion of morality." A late writer has better expressed the truth when he wrote: "Our sense of right does not spring from any mystical, divine source, but from sociological generalization of the common experience and requirements of humanity."

Is it not a fact that "Believe or be damned," and "Observe Sunday as sacred," constitute the principal requirements in the Christian moral code? Observe every other and disregard these, and we are classed as heathen. Believe the Lord Jesus Christ is the Son of God and "Keep the Sabbath day holy," an injunction stolen from the Jews and falsely applied to Sunday, and we fall but little short of the best saint in the Christian calendar.

Col. Ingersoll's Affliction.

Losing his grip, Pope Bob has become a back number, stricken by the hand of Providence, and so on, ad nauseam, were found in the display lines in the daily papers when they announced on the 20th ult. that Col. Ingersoll had a severe attack of sciatica, while lecturing at Janesville, Beloit and Freeport, and was compelled to cancel his further lecture engagements in the West. The papers went so far as to report he sent for a clergyman. His agent, who accompanied him, said the nearest he came to it was to make a heavy draft on their vocabulary, which was mistaken by some for profanity. The Colonel never swears save on rare occasions, as did the good Horace Greeley and the lamented Geo. Washington. (See Hale's History of the United States.)

Most adults have experienced the torture of "jumping tooth-ache." This is a baby pain compared with neuralgia of the sciatic nerve; so if the Colonel did draw on the resources of "our army in Flanders," as reported by Tristy Shandy, is it not probable the recording angel acted as he did in the case of Uncle Toby, so when he recalled the occasion for the naughty words he dropped a tear upon the record and effaced it forever? You bet he did if he ever suffered the tortures of sciatica.

But, please, good orthodox brothers, sciatica is not a fatal disease, so don't take hope too soon; besides the Colonel's arraignment of the wickedness of the church is too voluminous, and too widely diffused to be obliterated by libels on his character, and they will not cease to have influence when he is no more.

Explanatory.

Complaint is sometimes made that the editor-in-chief neglects correspondents and overlooks matters to which he should give special attention. Those knowing his busy life can only wonder so few things are neglected. Unlike the great mass of papers, The Progressive Thinker is wholly original. Every line appearing in its forty-eight columns is set expressly for the paper. The entire editorial, mechanical and business departments are under his personal supervision. The limited receipts compel economy in expenditure, so it is impossible to have the assistance such numerous cases ordinarily command. With the revival of business, the enlargement of circulation and better facilities for dispatching mechanical labor, it is hoped there will be some leisure to attend to the amenities of the profession. Until then the will must be taken for the deed, and the thoughtful will overlook what at first they may innocently mistake for personal slights.

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains the lecture by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago pulpit. It scintillates throughout.

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages. In order that all whom this notice may reach, can secure this address, as well as the other lectures and articles, we have made arrangements to have 10,000 copies printed to be sent out free to every new trial or yearly subscriber. This paper is well worth 25 cents. Every Spiritualist who wishes to know what has been going on should carefully read it. Our regular subscribers have, of course, had the contents thereof.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. Any of our present subscribers can have them by enclosing five cents in stamps.

Now is the time to awaken a renewed interest in The Progressive Thinker.

Verily, What Next?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar! We know of course to a cent what it costs to publish the Progressive Thinker, and we know the circumstances attending its growth, and we don't believe it is within the range of possibility to sustain elsewhere a like paper without losing from $50 to $100 weekly. This opinion is sustained in view of the fact that all the other leading Spiritualist dollar weeklies have lost thousands of dollars in the vain effort to sustain themselves, and have been constantly on the verge of suspension, getting up all kinds of schemes—such as selling bonds not worth the paper on which they are written, "Machinery funds," and like questionable practices to keep themselves afloat.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes, will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker

The Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I of the Encyclopaedia ..... $ .45
Vol. II of the Encyclopaedia ..... .45
The Next World Interviewed ..... .35

Total $1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I of the Encyclopaedia 400
Vol. II of the Encyclopaedia 400
The Next World Interviewed 250

each of these books is neatly and substantialy bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

The Remedy is Death to Liberty.

The Watchman, a Baptist paper published in Boston, deplores the fact that the people of the United States are now less familiar with the Bible and its teachings than at any other period in American history. Biblical allusions, it says, fail to be understood even by churchmen. The Watchman is one of the most substantial church papers in New England.

The proposed cure for this alleged ignorance of the Bible is to give it a Constitutional recognition in the organic law of the nation. If the disturbers of public tranquillity shall be successful in engrafting that effete book into the Constitution, civilization will take a backward step from which it will only recover by revolution. Mark this prediction.

No Paper Like It.

Stop and think a moment as you examine the Progressive Thinker—see its magnitude and the scope of its work. It is something to have the largest Spiritualist paper on this earth; it means a great deal; it speaks volumes for our glorious Cause; it shows what energy and perseverance can do in building up a prosperous business. To have the largest Spiritualist paper, means that it is in harmony with this large city—in harmony with its enterprise and vast projects manifested on every side. Glance over its columns from week to week, and see the vast amount of miscellaneous reading matter, all tending to interest and instruct. We can put all the reading matter of all the other dollar Spiritualist papers in the United States into our columns and still have space for advertising. Glance at our first page, and its seven long columns. Read the "Origin of the Soul," "True Jesuitism," "Evolution of a System" and the "Blight of selfishness." That is only one page. We are sure that Prof. Richmond's views will excite more than a passing notice. He is the presiding officer of the Grand Temple of the Magi.

Then turn to the second page, and read "Finding my Soul," "Not Christian," "Prophecies," "In Spirit Life—Our Homes Over There," and other notes of interest. Remember please, that there are six more pages to the paper, after reading the articles enumerated.

Pass on to the third page and peruse "Christianity, is it of Divine Origin?" "Modern Science," "The Blight of Selfishness," etc.

Then read the varied matter on the fourth page, full of interest to every reflective mind.

The course of reading is a large one, but the interest awakened will increase rather than diminish. Pass on to the fifth page, then to the sixth, seventh and eighth pages, and you will be surprised at the vast amount of miscellaneous matters on various topics.

The Buddhist Teacher.

Missionaries sent to the Brahmans and Buddhists used to take microscopes with them to show the "vile heathen" that their high regard for life was delusive: that the goblet of fresh water dipped from the spring teemed with life and, in drinking to quench thirst, multitudes of living creatures perished. They showed from their Bible that God had given to man "every moving thing that liveth for meat," and then they taught the conscientious vegetable eaters of the Orient that they should "slay and eat."

Now come these Buddhist missionaries, and in an address to the Christians of Chicago, Dhamapala discourses thusly:

"For 2,400 years the luster of the divine compassion of Buddha has taught men to abstain from the destruction of useful and innocent animals. The beauty of your civilization is marred by the unnecessary destruction of innocent animals for sport, fashion and food. 'Peace on earth' was the angelic cry that went out on the day the gentle Nazarene was born; but, alas! not one day has there been true peace in Christendom these nineteen centuries. For the sake of him who wanted 'mercy not sacrifice,' I appeal to you that the day of national thanksgiving be set apart as a day of mercy and compassion, and that no blood of our dumb brethren be shed on that day."

Our sympathies are with the followers of Buddha when they pray us to stay our bloody hands.

Known by Their Fruits.

A telegram from Bowmanville, Ontario, of November 17, shows how the religion of hate afflicts whole families. We quote in full:

"A most extraordinary case of religious mania is reported from a farmhouse near the long Sault. There, for a number of years, resided Elijah Rice, his wife and fifteen children. His eldest son, Louis, 22 years old, recently became insane and announced himself as the 'Prince of the Sand Hills,' and declared Christ had appointed him to reform the world. The mania extended to the father, mother and other children, who neglected their farm and spent their time in singing and praying.

"Recently the father conceived the idea that Louis was pursued by the devil and it must be beaten out of him. Louis was knocked down with the leg of a chair and Mr. and Mrs. Rice and two of the sons pounded him into insensibility. When this was accomplished they were satisfied the devil was driven out. Their next move was to celebrate the feast of the passover and one of the little children was to be sacrificed. One of the sons, a mere boy, told this to a clergyman, who informed the police. On visiting the farm they found Rice and his son Louis suffering from intense mania and had them removed to Kingston insane asylum.

"The mother and the other children were in a state of hysterical mania, and were pronounced insane, but the doctors decided they would recover if separated from the two crazy men."

Their Hearts in the Right Place.

J. H. White, of Port Huron, Mich., sends us a list of names with $10. Wm. Dinning, of Waukegan, Ill., also sends the cash with a goodly list. Their aim is to spread the light, and, in so doing, they are not only accomplishing a good work, but are entitled to the gratitude of the recipients of their favors.

Their unselfish acts shine very brightly indeed by the side of those Spiritualists who will not even take a Spiritualist paper.

Merged.

It is a pleasure to note that Rev. Vrooman, late of the Kenwood Presbyterian church, has withdrawn from that body, taking with him a large following, and has connected himself with Rev. Dr. Thomas' People's Church, with which he will hereafter be connected as assistant pastor.

He deserves small trust who is not privy counselor to himself.—Ford.

LAKE HELEN, FLORIDA.

Fair Prospects Before the Camp.

To the Editor:—For the benefit of many of your readers who are seeking information about the Southern Cassadaga Camp near Lake Helen, Fla., I would say, as I have already declared in the past, this movement is an assured success. Everything regarding it is moving forward with the firm spirit of confidence based upon a consciousness of, and faith in, the powers behind the throne. The auditorium is now in the process of construction, and when completed will be very pleasant and commodious. This building is in charge of C. E. Parcell, of Tampa, Fla., an experienced architect and builder. Mr. Parcell is also secretary of the association, and is working with a will in various ways to advance the interests of this place.

The money used for building the auditorium has been donated entirely. Some of it has come from interested people at the North, through the instrumentality of Mrs. J. D. Palmer, who is untiring in her efforts to benefit this camp. The merchants and business people of this vicinity have also been very generous considering the hard times since the Florida freeze.

The Bond Lumber Co., of Glenwood, Fla., have been liberal in their donations and concessions and have confidence enough in the future of this camp to furnish the lumber for the association to build a large apartment house for the accommodation of those who wish to take rooms and cook for themselves, taking the rents in payment. Dr. H. H. Brigham, of Fitchburg, Mass., a veteran worker in Spiritualism, comes forward with the means to put up this building, for which the lumber is now being drawn, and in a few weeks it will be ready for occupancy.

Several cottages are already being erected. Plans have been sent to Mr. Parcell for others, and if half the cottages that are now contemplated are put up this season, the Southern Cassadaga Camp-ground will be a town of no mean proportion before the beginning of the meeting of 1897.

Several families are already on the ground, occupying rooms and cottages. Many more are expected soon, and it is already evident that this place will be a prominent winter resort where many Northern people will reside for a number of months during the cold weather. C. H. Gregory and wife are now in charge of the Cassadaga Hotel, and are boarding at greatly reduced prices up to the commencement of the meetings. The rooms are also reduced.

The president, George P. Colby, is lecturing in different portions of the State, and doing missionary work for the camp. The outlook for the meeting commencing Feb. 15, 1897, was never more encouraging, and the programme from the beginning to the end will be interesting. Prof. W. W. Tatum, a trance, physical and independent slate-writing medium from California, will be with us during the entire meeting. He will also lecture for the association. Prof. Tatum comes highly recommended from the Pacific Coast and will doubtless be an instrument of great good to this place. Carrie E. S. Twing is engaged for the month of March. Many people in this vicinity are inquiring after her, who feel that the Camp would not be complete if she were absent. Kate R. Stiles, of Boston, Mass., was with us last winter and won many friends. We hope she may come this season; of that news will be given later. C. Fannie Allyn, of Chelsea, Mass., well known in the Eastern and Middle States, as a medium and inspirational speaker, is to be one of the attractions. She also will remain during the entire season. W. F. Peck, Onset's chairman and speaker of last season, comes for the month of March.

The guides of George P. Colby will also be heard from. O. L. Concannon, materializing medium, is expected. Edella Concannon is engaged to give platform tests. Public slate-writings will be given by Prof. W. W. Tatum. All prominent phases of mediumship will be represented on the grounds. Several speakers and mediums are expected who intend spending the winter in the State, that are not engaged by the association. Certainly the army of mediumistic talent will be sufficient not only to convince the doubters of the phenomena of Spiritualism, but to furnish opportunity for the teachers in spirit-life to treat upon the ethics of this beautiful faith.

It will be well for those who are coming to this camp from Cincinnati and Western States to take the Queen and Crescent Route to Jacksonville. Train 1, leaving Cincinnati at 8:30 a. m., arrives in Jacksonville the next morning at 8:30 a. m., making direct connections with the Florida East Coast railway, whose branch at New Smyrna runs direct to Lake Helen. This road will make special rates of six dollars, round trip, from Jacksonville, for parties of ten or more who are coming to this camp, which is a little more than half the regular fare.

Tourist tickets can be purchased for exactly the same price as by any other route. It is hoped that all Spiritualists will patronize this road if possible, as it is well equipped; runs through a most interesting part of the country, taking in the ancient city of St. Augustine, whose famous Ponce De Leon Hotel may be seen plainly from the car windows. It also passes through Daytona, another interesting point, and it is not an exaggeration to say, that the success of this camp is largely due to the kindly concessions and helps in various ways of the Florida East Coast Railway.

The Clyde line of steamers are making very cheap rates to parties of ten or more. It would be well for Eastern people who wish to come by water to correspond with H. A. Buddington, 91 Sherman street, Springfield, Mass., for details and rates from different Eastern points to Lake Helen, or write to the General Passenger Agent, Albert J. Cole, 5 Bowling Green, New York City, if you wish to get up your own party. To those who wish, or are obliged to remain over night in Jacksonville while en route, if they will take the Bay street car, standing at the depot when all trains arrive, and go to Hotel Bristol, corner of Bay and Liberty streets, they will find pleasant rooms at very reasonable rates; meals are not ordinarily given in this hotel, but arrangements have been made with the landlady, Mrs. Armstrong, to serve tea, coffee and light supper and breakfast in the rooms of those coming to the Cassadaga Camp at cheap restaurant prices. There are good restaurants in the near vicinity.

I have endeavored in this letter to answer some of the many questions that are constantly pouring in from various parts of the country; also to give advice that I hope may be of benefit to those who may desire to come to the Southern Cassadaga Camp, but I am always ready and willing to answer by private letter queries that may have been omitted.

SPIRITUALISM

In the Land of the Saints of Latter Days.

Wonderful Manifestations of Spirit Power.

To the Editor:—Under the searchlight of knowledge in the nineteenth century, Spiritualism has sustained its ancient reputation—truth and enlightenment. For from the beginning of the world Spiritualism, psychic science or psychomancy has existed. It is not hard to find proof of this assertion. We have but to turn to the Bible for confirmation of the fact. We find the prophets communicating with the spiritual entity, and receive messages to their people for their advancement and civilization.

And lastly we have Christ, the messenger of God. But to-day, when man is advanced in learning and in intelligence, eighteen hundred and ninety-six years after the greatest and grandest exponent of this same fact gave to the world the intelligence which we possess to-day, man has the hardihood to deny its existence.

It is true there are many who masquerade under the names of Spiritualistic mediums, who are frauds.

There have been a great many so-called mediums who have paid Ogden a visit in the past, and who have eventually been exposed as impostors; but if Spiritualism is worthy of being imitated by mechanical contrivances, it does not detract from its dignity as a religion, or as a science; for—"Magna est veritas, et prevalebit!"—Truth is mighty and will prevail!

In the past, it has been the fate of the average Ogdenite to read the double leaded headlines: "Phenomenal seance and independent slate-writing, wonderful spiritual manifestations! etc.," until from the impositions of traveling frauds, he has come to be a doubting Thomas in regard to such phenomena.

However, in the past few weeks, these views have been considerably changed by a small introductory legend:—

"THE BROCKWAY FAMILY.

"Independent music, pictures, slate-writing, typewriting, trumpet-speaking, healing," etc., etc.

Curiosity is a swift messenger, and so, one week after the Brockways arrived in Ogden, Saturday, October 31, they gave their first phenomenal seance at the residence of S. C. Higgins, 268 30th street.

A number of skeptics were invited, but on account of the stormy weather only a few responded. Eleven people besides the mediums were present, and any of them stand ready, if required, to testify to the veracity of the following account:

In the presence of the investigating committee and your correspondent, an examination of the paraphernalia and cabinet was made. The cabinet was found to consist of a strong, solid frame of pine, made in such a manner as to fold into a small compass. A rigid examination was made for "dry cells" and hidden wires, but the investigation failed to reveal any. The heavy, dark-red chenille curtains used to veil the interior of the cabinet also failed to be found in any way mysterious. Then a close inspection of the musical instruments (a zither, a harmonica, banjo, tambourine and chime bells), an ordinary camp-stool used to place the zither upon, the slates and speaking-trumpet (resembling that used by sailors) was successively made, and as successively failed to show any resemblance to the mechanical contrivances used by impostors.

The committee then declared itself satisfied that there were no traps, doors or hidden wires. A table belonging to Mr. Higgins, about which there was no sleight-of-hand attachments, was placed in the cabinet; and the slates, a small scratch-pad of paper, a lead pencil and slate pencils, together with the trumpet, were placed upon it.

The zither and harmonica, etc., were placed upon the stool and were pushed well back into the cabinet. The curtains of the cabinet were then drawn and the medium took his position outside, in front of the cabinet and in full view of the company. A lady investigator and your correspondent were then chosen to sit on each side of the medium (Mr. Chas. Brockway). The rest of the company then formed a circle, and Mrs. Brockway then hung a curtain of dark material extending from the side of the cabinet and from the shoulders of the medium and investigating committee to the floor. Your correspondent's hand was then gripped tightly by the medium on one side and by the circle on the other.

Our right hand thus being grasped by the medium, and our left by the circle, the lady on the right of the medium then grasped his hand and thrust her right hand through the aperture in the dark curtain, to the gentleman sitting in the circle on her right. In this manner a continuous circle was formed around the room. Dr. Brockway then modified the light, so that the expressions on the faces of everybody present could be plainly seen. He then took up his position in front of the medium and placed his hands on the outside of the curtain immediately over ours. The manifestations then began with raps, in answer to Dr. Brockway's query as to whether they could manifest. Almost immediately your correspondent could feel a tapping on the side of his face, and at the same time several saw a white hand playing backwards and forwards over his head. The lady then feeling somebody endeavoring to crowd between her and the medium, announced it to the company.

As she made the announcement her head was seen to be jerked backwards. She exclaimed that somebody was pulling her hair. Dr. Brockway then suggested to he that she ask who it was, and she did s The trumpet was then seen to appear at the aperture, seemingly held by an invisible force. In answer to a query, a voice was heard from the trumpet distinctly enough to be recognised at the far end of the room.

Several persons were called to the cabinet and full names were given through the trumpet.

As soon as the above manifestations had ceased, the lady still continued to question, a slate was thrust through an opening in the curtain of the cabinet and rested on her head, and for an instant a milky-white hand was distinctly seen. A pencil was heard to make a succession of sound on a slate as of somebody writing rapidly. The slate was then dropped over into her lap. By this time everybody was full of curiousity and amazement. The chime bells were next manipulated by the unseen agency, and very sweetly rendered, "Home, Sweet Home." Raps and noises were heard continuously. In the meantime your correspondent changed places with a gentleman who was skeptical, so that he could get a better view of the manifestations. A gentleman present was then given a test by Mrs. Brockway which he immediately recognized.

As she concluded, the table and all the instruments in the cabinet seemed to have been overturned; and Dr. Brockway sternly ordered them "not to be so rough," and to "put the table and instruments as you found them!" A noise was then heard as of the order being complied with.

The medium then suggested that the circle be broken temporarily.

He then arose and invited inspection of the cabinet. Your correspondent and and several skeptics made a minute inspection, but could not find the slightest suggestion of fraud. The committee of two testified that the medium's hand did not leave theirs, nor did he stir his feet, and I substantiated their statement. After a thorough examination of the paraphernalia once more, and a thorough shaking of the chenille curtains, the medium took his position in front of the cabinet and invited a strict investigator and an orthodox church member to sit on either side of him.

"Over There" and "Nearer My God to Thee" were sung in a low strain, and the manifestations again began. The "O. C. M." immediately announced that somebody was tapping him on the top of the head with something hard, which proved to be mallets used in playing bells, and at intervals a hand could be seen to play about his shoulders, at which he would announce that somebody was pinching and jabbing him. This elicited much merriment from the company, when the medium earnestly requested them "not to get to excited, as it disturbed the magnetic conditions." As soon as order was restored the trumpet was seen to lift the top of the cabinet to an eminence. Soon after it appeared close to the "O. C. M's" ear. He could not hear what was said. It was then thrust further out of the drapery, close to Dr. Brockway's head, so that a luminous hand could be partially seen. The Doctor could not understand what was wanted, and the trumpet was thereupon thrown on the floor by the hand which was again distinctly seen by those present. The Doctor picked it up and handed it back. It was again thrown on the floor. A noise was now heard within the cabinet as if somebody was writing on a slate, and soon after it was thrust into the lap of the "Investigator." The "O. C. M." again exclaimed that somebody was punching him in the back and pulling his hair. Thereupon the "Boy Medium" exclaimed that there was a spirit wishing to shake hands with Mrs. Higgins, saying that his name was Jim. The medium suggested that she look into the cabinet. Following his suggestion, she could see nothing, but as as she reached into the interior, she could feel a hand twitch her sleeve three times in quick succession and at the same time a hand grasped hers which was neither warm nor cold, and which did not seem to be composed of bone. "The hand was that of my brother. There was not one in a thousand like it. It seemed to slip from my grasp!" At this the company was greatly astonished, but more so when, after the lady had taken her seat, a sound as of a man writing rapidly on the slates was heard. Following this the slate was thrust through the curtain over the O. C. M. gentleman's head, and a ghostly hand pointed in the direction of Mrs. Higgins. A lady started to her feet, and inquired excitedly if it was for her. The hand again pointed and she stepped to the cabinet and received the slate from the spirit agency. She had hardly returned to her place when a great hubbub commenced in the cabinet. The hand pointed excitedly from different parts of the cabinet, in the direction of Mrs. Higgins. Dr. Brockway inquired if the message was not intended for Mrs. Higgins. Three loud raps, signifying "yes," were instantly heard. The slate was then surrendered and laid aside till after the seance. A ticking in imitation of a telegraph instrument was now heard, but there being no telegraph operator present it quickly ceased. A few bars from "The Sweet Bye and Bye," was now masterfully executed on the chime bells. A sound was now heard as of somebody writing on paper; then it could be heard to be torn, crumpled, and soon after the same white hand with the luminous light radiating from it, appeared and tossed two notes into the room. Dr. Brockway then requested some selection on the zither, and suggested "The Last Rose of Summer." Judge the astonishment of those present when the beautiful soft music of the zither stole forth from the cabinet, in the sad, sweet, regretful notes of the "Last Rose of Summer."

Mr. Chas. Brockway, the medium, then announced that as the manifestations had continued two hours, the circle be broken; but that for the benefit of the skeptics present, he wished the gentlemen on either side of him to remain seated. When the dark curtain which concealed their hands was removed, the hands of all three were seen to be firmly linked together. "Now, then, gentlemen, examine everything closely for hidden wires and trap doors, and little boys we are reputed to carry about with us as confederates," remarked the Boy Medium, ironically.

An interested examination of all the slates and written matter on paper followed, amid many exclamations of surprise and wonder.

The cabinet was then dismantled in the presence of your correspondent and was found to be as previously described. The messages were from friends and duly recognized. The Brockways invite the strictest investigation and accede to every demand of the skeptic and investigator, and stand ready to convince anybody who will acknowledge the truth.

Under the rigorous test conditions imposed, your correspondent was convinced there existed a "Psychic, Cause and Effect."

But if the foregoing is remarkable, the independent slate-writings which come through the mediumship of Mrs. A. Brockway are still more so. If I am not encroaching too much upon your space, I would like to describe some of the conditions under which Mrs. Brockway gives her independent slate-writings.

The investigator may write the questions he wishes answered, at his own home, or at the rooms of the Brockways. The questions are then sealed in a small envelope. If he brings his own slates, he hands the written questions in the sealed envelope to Mrs. Brockway, so that she can get the conditions. In a moment she hands the envelope back, and it is then placed between the slates. Four slates are used at one writing.

The slates are then divided and placed in two black bags, and the medium and sitter place their hands upon them. During the course of the writing the medium will give the names of those who are present and who have been asked after, by the investigator. In time varying from fifteen to forty-five minutes, the slates are finished, and when opened are found to be filled with messages of cheer from the loved ones beyond the river. Some people, when they have gazed on the familiar handwriting of the departed, the signature in full, and the beautiful designs of floral emblems that they loved who had gone before, break down in tears.

And yet, withal, skeptics say that this is fraud. The Salt Lake Herald recently printed a laughable canard to the effect that Mrs. Brockway had a little boy in a trunk who wrote the answers on the slate! How in the world the little boy mentioned could be able to get the slates off from the table, before the investigator's eyes, in broad daylight (for Mrs. Brockway only gives sittings from 10 a. m. to 5 p. m.) is more than I can understand. The table on which the slates are placed is one which they they are always able to get in any first class parlors: a common, ordinary, open, parlor table. And the slates which are used are not so diminutive as to easily slip up the sleeve of a first-class professor of legerdemain. If the investigator does not bring his own slates, the Brockways furnish them The slates are thoroughly examined and washed before the skeptic's eyes, and placed in the little black bags for the purpose of having darkened conditions. On the table near the slates is a small basket of crayons which the spirits dematerialize and materialize inside the slates, in writing and pictorial form. In several messages I have had the pleasure to examine, each line of written matter has been of a different color.

And yet, despite the fact that the slates are bound around with a strong rubber band, and never leave the sight of the sitter for an instant, poor shallow-brained skeptics cry: "Fraud!"

But this matters little to the Brockways, for their watchword seems to be "Excelsior!" They have now taken up the banner once more, and will be next heard from, from the City of the Saints.

A HAUNTED BARK.

"Chips's" Tragic Story of the Inverurie and Her Crazy Skipper.

IN A SQUALL MATE FIFE HEARD A VOICE CALLING FROM THE MAIN TOP-GALLANT YARD—NO ONE WAS ABOVE, HOWEVER.

"See those battens nailed across that door?" said Bain, the carpenter of the British bark Inverurie, lying at the foot of Twenty-seventh street, South Brooklyn, last evening. Chips lay in his bunk and pointed with his pipe towards three strong cross-pieces which reinforced the perpendicular panels.

"Those strips recall one of the strangest and most thrilling adventures—aye, tragedies—of the sea I ever heard of, and I have been a sailor for twenty-five years. Several years ago the Inverurie sailed from Newcastle, N. S. W., for San Francisco, with two passengers, who gave their names as Dr. and Mrs. Armitage. Captain Willcox was very glad to have a doctor along, for before the bark should arrive at 'Frisco Mrs. Willcox expected to become a mother.

"The captain, so it turned out, was a hard drinker, took a prejudice against the doctor and refused to allow him to attend his wife. Captain Willcox became a raving maniac, the crew shut him up in this very forecastle and put Mate William Anderson in charge of the bark.

Mrs. Willcox's baby died and was buried at sea. The mother died a few days later and her body was preserved in salt, as she had requested to be buried ashore. When we dropped anchor in 'Frisco bay the very first craft alongside was a police-boat. The police were after the doctor, as they had received letters from Newcastle that our male passenger was not Dr. Armitage, but a chap named Eustace Alexander, son of a rich tobacconist of Melbourne, and a married man, who had eloped on this very vessel with the woman who accompanied him.

"We were all arrested for mutiny. Captain Willcox told the British Consul that he had ordered the supposed doctor away from his wife because he could tell from his actions that he was not what he claimed to be. He said that he had several times broken out of his prison, which was true, and that the crew had let him out in time to see his wife die.

"The result of it all was that Captain Willcox received a sentence of ten days, but they couldn't do anything with Armitage in connection with what happened on board the bark because he was not allowed to attend the patient.

"It came out that Armitage had really studied surgery and had but one more examination to pass before taking his diploma. The crew also got off light. They wished that, long before they did, they had locked up the crazy captain, but, as you know, it is risky business to take a man's ship from his hands.

"Ill luck has ever since seemed to follow Captain Willcox. He is now the skipper of a little sloop coasting along the Scottish capes.

"The captain's wife was one of the most beautiful women I ever saw. She was only 22. I never heard what became of Armitage and the woman.

"Now comes the strangest part of my tale," continued the carpenter. "I have never been a superstitious man, and many a time have laughed down the ghost yarns of my shipmates, but I will swear that what I'm about to tell you is nothing but the truth.

"On the voyage of the bark from Rio to this port, when we were off Cape St. Roque, I was sent into the hold to put up spar ceiling. It was during the afternoon watch, and I was working on a stage on the port side. Something made me look, and there between the after hatch and the mizzenmast I saw a woman in gray walking from starboard to port on the ballast.

"I could feel the blood tingle in my finger-tips, I was that scared, and my heart seemed to stop pumping. 'What a fool I am,' thought I. 'If I go on deck they will only laugh at me, and I'll stick it out.' The vision in gray was in sight only a few seconds and went away as suddenly as it came.

"I don't know what to make out of it, but I have my opinions," concluded the sea-seasoned carpenter.

Nor was there lacking confirmation of some unexplained phenomena aboard the bark. Able seaman Main said: "Off Hatteras I was on the lookout in squally weather. We had been having rather light winds and the mainsail had been clewed up. At four bells of the first watch I heard Mr. Fife, the mate, sing out, 'Who's on the main-topgallant yard? I hear someone calling.'

"None of us could see anybody on the yard and we told Mr. Fife so, but he mustered his watch and accounted for every man below before he would be satisfied." Every man—there were twenty-three in the crew—was safe.

Other men on the Inverurie have also seen and heard strange things. Third Mate Aberdin and Able Seaman Figuer are among these ghost scenters.

Sailor Bain says that the apparition has also been seen several times in the cabin by Captain Charleson, the present commander of the bark.

The above strange narrative is from the New York World, and it furnishes another link that unites the spirit-world with the material side of life.

Ghost of a Live Man Makes a Demonstration

When the Body Is Three Thousand Miles Away.

A CLERGYMAN LEARNS THAT HEAVEN IS BUT A CONDITION—LIFE SAVED—DUEL INTERRUPTED—MINISTRATIONS OF A SPIRIT MOTHER—BUSINESS ADVICE FROM THE FARTHER SHORE.

At a conference of several sincere investigators, into things occult, says the Cincinnati Enquirer, the following incidents were related and accepted in good faith:

The first narrator was Mr. George, a stranger in Cincinnati, on his first visit here. He had said that his experiences in matters inexplicable, except on one hypothesis—the truth of spirit return—were peculiar, and in many regards different from any he was acquainted with, and when impressed to do so he gave these remarkable instances: "I am a manufacturer of cotton wadding and batting," he began. "The initiatory process with the cotton I use is had though a machine called a picker, which tears it apart and beats it up into a fluffy condition, while it removes the dirt, seeds and all foreign substances. Attending this picker is not clean work, but is not heavy, and can be done by a strong, healthy girl, as well as by a man, and, on account of the good wages the position commands, it is much sought by girls and women. One girl, named Carrie Gage, did this work for me during a period of more than eight years, and was one of the mainstays in the support of a large family. She suddenly sickened and took to the bed, from which she never arose. In this calamity her first thought was for the family that would miss the financial help she had been able to render them, and early in the morning of the day when her sickness brought helplessness a younger sister came to me with a note from Carrie, begging that I would give the place to bearer. While full of doubt as to whether this was the best course for me, I acceded to the request and put the girl at work.

"In about a week Carrie died. The sister who had taken her place tried very hard to perform the labor, but she was careless in many ways, especially in things which involved her personal safety, and I was in constant fear that some fatal accident might overtake the child. She had experienced several narrow escapes, and I was considering the project of consigning her some less dangerous task, when in passing the door of her room one morning I heard her voice in a loud scream. I ran in and found her dress had caught in the feed rollers of the picker and she was in imminent danger of being drawn into the machine. In my excitement I threw off a belt, but it was the wrong one—that attached to the blower only. As I turned to place my hand upon the proper belt I saw that the girl was released; that the fabric of her dress had been cut away by a large shears used in another part of the factory; that bending over her was the quickly recognized form of her sister Carrie; that the child had fainted.

"Is it possible—" I exclaimed and was interrupted by the apparition.

"Take care of Lucy," it whispered, and immediately disappeared. When Lucy came out of her swoon I found that she had seen and recognized her sister, whose sudden appearance had occasioned the child's collapse.

A PHANTOM RIDER.

"Glancing out of my office window one day, I saw a gentleman alight from a horse, secure the animal to a post, and walk leisurely toward my door. Thinking that he might be an old friend whom I had not met for many years—the resemblance being pronounced—I opened the door to welcome him, but on looking out discovered that neither man nor horse was in sight. Less than a minute had elapsed from the time I had seen both as plainly as I could see any other object, and they had no way to disappear, in the common order of things, in five times the period that had elapsed. This same appearance and disappearance occurred on three successive days, and then I learned that the first day of the apparition witnessed the demise of the gentleman it represented.

GHOST OF A LIVE MAN.

"I once met on the street a gentleman who I supposed was then absent in California. 'Why Charlie,' said I, 'when did you return?' 'Only a few minutes ago,' he replied. 'Back to stay?' 'Oh, no. California is the place for me.' 'You will remain with us during the winter?' 'No, not an hour.' 'Why—' 'I may as well explain. I came home to warn my sister Belle against Will Temple, whom she was about to marry, and already I have conveyed to her hand evidence that will break off the match. She doesn't know who sent it, and I am anxious that neither she nor my father's family find out that I have been here.' 'They are sure to learn it from somebody.' 'I think not, unless you mention it, and if you are my friend you will not do so.'

"We parted with a hand-shake. A few days afterward I mentioned to a friend in a confidential way that I had seen Charlie as related. He laughed at the story and pronounced it a case of mistaken identity, at the same time asserting that on the day before he had received a letter from the gentleman, dated in California, on a day which would make his presence in our Eastern town impossible at the time stated by me. This was annoying. After studying the subject a little I wrote to Charlie for confirmation of his presence and conversation with me

"In his reply he said that on the day mentioned his condition was different from anything he had previously experienced, dreamy, 'perhaps mentally drunk'—he used this expression—and for more than an hour he seemed to be at N. I had been mixed up in this business, he said, but he did not recall the details of his meeting with me.

He was happy to inform me, however, that simultaneously with the receipt of my letter of inquiry he had received notice from his sister that her engagement with Temple was hopelessly broken. She added, he continued, that this result was brought about through documents mysteriously conveyed to her hand involving Temple in dishonest transactions; that the documents had been verified in good part by other testimony, but she was yet in the dark as to where they came from. 'I knew of these documents and had a sort of half dream of placing them in Belle's hands,' concluded Charlie, but, in fact, I have not been out of California since my first arrival here. There is something very strange and creepy in your story that makes me feel uncomfortable.'

MOTHER'S SOOTHING HAND.

"The most startling manifestations are not usually the most impressive," continued Mr. George. "For many years I had nightly visitors who did not show themselves to my organs of vision, but they were readily recognized by their little acts of kindness. On hundreds of occasions, especially when I have been ill, my pillow was shaken up and smoothed by a spirit I knew to be that of my mother, for the act was accomplished just as she did it in my boyhood days. And just as then her cool, composing hand had rested upon my brow to soothe its agony. When I have breathed the words, 'dear mother,' a responsive pressure, light and tender, has always confirmed the identity of the gentle spirit. These ministrations continue and are among the supreme pleasures of my life; and other spirits come in the silent watches and bring consolation. Among them is a brother, fourteen years deceased, upon whose advice I frequently make business ventures, all of which are successful. I am a member of a congregation of Baptists—not a communicant—and was on terms of special friendship with a former pastor of our local church. He had been in the spirit-world two or three years, and often had I speculated upon the probability of his return with a message from the other shore. I became aware one night that one was present who had never come before, and asked:

"'Who is it?'

"'Hersey,' came promptly in reply. 'I want to tell you that things in the spirit are different from anything I had supposed possible, and that heaven is a condition rather than a place. It is here, right in the midst of earth life, and spirits stand ever beside their friends to do them good, and malignant spirits equally beside those they hate to work them ill!'

"'Then Spiritualism is true?'

"'Yes, in principle, although some of its practices, like those of the church, are false and misleading. It assumes too much and is absurdly postulatory on many occasions when modesty would serve a better purpose. When it is reformed upon these lines there is no good reason why all Christians should not become Spiritualists.'

"'Thank you; and all Spiritualists good Christians, you would add.'

"'Just so. There is plentiful occasion for this supplementary remark.'

"We conversed for some time, but I have given you the gist of what was said." T. P.

REINCARNATION.

Why try in this progressive age of thought,
To resurrect the dreams of ancient seers?
Why delve in lore with musty errors fraught,
To raise the dust of dead and buried years?

Why go to Oriental climes to find,
Among the rubbish of most ancient lore,
Decaying relics of primeval mind,
That we their life and prestige may restore?

Why Nature's grand, progressive course reverse
And backward turn our eager, truant steps,
That we with Egypt's mummies may converse
And seek the truth from those long dead adepts?

Why should we trammel modern truthful thought
With superstitions that the Orient yields?
Why now by eager minds, so oft are sought
The fads and fancies gleaned from Asian fields?

Is it the part of wisdom now to strive
The fossils of the long-dead past to wake,
And long-forgotten creeds and faiths revive,
The place of new and better thought to take?

Nay! "Let the dead past bury its dead;"
The truth we need is born to us to-day;
We cannot live on stale and moldy bread,
Much less on dust and ashes of decay.

Reincarnation is a heathen lie,
Told simple-minded mortals long ago;
A Pagan myth so false it ought to die
And ne'er again its foolish nonsense show.

No re-embodiment we need on earth
To ripen our souls for another sphere;
So ne'er have we another earthly birth
That we in mortal forms may re-appear.

With Evolution's vast and wondrous plan
This Oriental myth does not agree;
That grants but one life here to mortal man,
And then from earth forever sets him free.

Progression's law no step doth e'er repeat;
It gives its lessons here to man but once:
Repeating them its purpose would defeat;
None needs them o'er and o'er, unless a dunce!

Hence, one life here is all that e'er we get;
'Tis not repeated o'er, and o'er, and o'er;
But when, at last, on earth our sun has set,
Its light then shines above forevermore.

With science true this fad does not accord;
The facts of Nature give it no support;
'Tis but an old Egyptian myth and fraud,
To which no modern thinker should resort.

The facts that seem to some to make it true,
When rightly used, this fad do not sustain;
But other facts and reasons not a few,
The facts adduced, much better can explain.

'Tis strange so crass a doctrine should survive,
In light of truth now dawning on this age,
And stranger far that spirits should revive
This olden myth, that now is "all the rage."

With warning voice, to all we kindly speak,
Enjoining them to each and all beware
Lest this strange doctrine that so many seek,
Should prove a most delusive snare!

DR. DEAN CLARKE.

Another Awful Warning.

Mrs. Mary B. Stevens, at the opening session of the Daughters of Rebekah, Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows of Illinois, at Springfield, on the 18th of November, while officiating as chaplain, commencing a prayer, got so far as "Our Father," when she fell to the floor—dead! Praying seems to be extra-hazardous in these last days.

Deliver me, O Lord, from that evil man, myself.—T. Brooks.

AMERICAN CONGRESS.

Composed of Liberal Religious Societies.

E. P. POWELL'S BELIEF—GOD THE CONCEPTION WHICH MAN HAS EVOLVED FROM THE UNIVERSAL.

The late American Congress that convened at Indianapolis, Ind., and held a three days session was a notable body. It was composed of the leaders in liberal religious societies. We present one address delivered by E. P. Powell, which will be read with interest.

THE ADDRESS.

The common conception of religion as a thing of art and not of nature is incorrect. For if a creature of art it must pass away as men and time progress. I was myself caught for a time in this false premise and erroneous conclusion. We must study religion as we study civics—historically. The state is not a compact; neither is the church a compact. Both are growths. Every one must, will he or nil he, belong to both of them.

The primitive form of humanity was the family. In this family was the germ of all human evolution. Out of this family came all that there is or has been of social organism. These organic forces are three collaterals—church, state and school—parallel but always essential to and interactive. They consist in the very nature of things. The state evolved because social life became complex; religion evolved because the family reached out both ends, beyond present needs and limitations, that is, into the past and into the future.

The germs of the state were headship, order, present substantiality. The germs of the school were headship, obedience and order, knowledge of the present. The germs of the church were headship, obedience and worship, faith and hope of the future, involving the eternal perpetuity of the family. Here were the elements of God, ritual and creed. These three things are always found in a church. But God in higher terms is Father; worship in higher terms is love; creed in higher terms is immortality. We may believe a thousand things about this life; it is what we believe about the other life that settles our religious faithfulness to the family.

The spiritual agnostic is an unchurched and irreligious man. He may be a member of the state in good standing, but not of the church. We affirm that no position is historically more unphilosophical than agnosticism. It is more scientific to affirm that matter came ab nihilo than that mind and purpose came about ab nihilo. Matter is eternal; mind is eternal. In each is involved an eternal change of sequences. Our Father which art in heaven is a sentence in biology; and the question of a trinity is a question of common mathematics. Therefore it is that God-hunger is universal. When Livingston preached God to the Matabeles an old woman cried out: 'Why that is the One we have always been feeling after, but couldn't find Him. We are born with ma and pa in our mouths and in our hearts. Religion is ma and pa expanded or expanding to the larger limits of our growing conceptions. Infinity is merely a word we have invented to express the limitation of these conceptions. Infinite God is fatherhood at our highest thought and our highest hope.

With this historic foundation of religion it is clear that we must never let the church idea loose from the family idea. The state is an evolution of the family; the church is another evolution of the family. God, duty, immortality are three family ideas. God is father; duty is household love; immortality is simply home reaching out beyond and in defiance of death.

GOD THE CONCEPTION OF MAN.

I assure you that it is all important to never let go of the fact that God is man evolved, expanded, ennobled, enlarged, eliminated of meanness, narrowness, ignorance. God is not an idea apart from man, conceiving man; but is the conception which man has been able to evolve of the universal. God is in that sense man-created and it is infinitely important that man shall create goodness, truth, love and honor. What we want is a God up to the times; a God fully as good and wise as the best living man; as good as Gladstone, or Whittier, or Florence Nightingale; equally we need to escape from survivals of deific conceptions of barbaric days. We only, said Parker, wish to shift religion from the knowledge and sentiments of three thousand years ago to those of the present day. The chief religious blunder is to feel that it is a duty to worship an Athanasian, or a Calvinistic, or a Mosaic God. A God rocked in the cradle of barbaric mothers, is not only angry, pertinaciously so; and his revenge is wholly out of the cover of any civilized code. He tortures by substitution, as an Apache Indian will kill any one white man for the sin of another. The plan of atonement by blood is a survival from the Cave men.

Goethe makes the devil grinningly suggest to man that he and his God look so much alike that it may frighten him to see how much it looks like a case of father and son. We accept Goethe's thrust, for there is no question that God and man are a part of the same family. Jehovah was a being of wholly anthropomorphic qualities. Calvin's God was like himself. We must never forget the sublime meaning of evolution—even though of the gods we must, again and again, sing with Mrs. Browning or with the old Greeks, Pan, Pan is dead.

The historical and philosophical truth is that God is the final cause as being the latest, and not being the first, in a chain of conceptions. For so far as man is concerned he existed before the God he worships, and called Him into being by the power of his imagination. God did not only always seek for a man, but sought man for a God.

DUTY IN RELIGION.

We turn from the idea of God to the second element in the foundation of religion—I mean duty. Clearly this is also a family affair. Originally all virtue was filiality to parents. This lacking, all was lacking. Thus Æneas bore his father first of all from burning Troy. Piety to the gods was of the same sort. It was obedience and reverence. Is not our inchoate social condition all of a piece? We lack reverence of parents, because we are trying to worship a barbaric conception of the Infinite Father. We teach our children to repeat the prayer, Our Father which art in heaven, with a conception of that Father totally foreign to the conception we wish our babes to have of ourselves as parents.

Religion is not worship or belief; it is faith, love and obedience. It is to be faithful to the home idea, to the family. Toward the Father, obedient and reverent; toward the family trustful, loveful. Religion is not good works, but the good spirit of good works.

The end will be a reunited family. The field is the world. The homestead is the five continents and all the isles of the ocean. To banish from our souls narrowness and sectionalism and classism—the conceits of religion, the pride of piety—this is the finality. When that is done the reaction upon civic affairs will prevent discord, war and hate. Jewish religion I still think the most perfect yet evolved. It gave us the Lord's prayer. It included this earth in its heaven. Sanitary laws were to it moral laws. Its aim was to create a wholesome family; and it nearly did it. Its tenacity is not Jew grit, but the tenacity of common sense. It compelled the brother to care for the brother's family.

But Christianity is yet in its cradle—the cradle of humanity and the world. Jesus himself never lost sight of the family idea. I and my Father are one. He was a son of God. A cyclone of heathen converts seized on the idea of his sonship as a divine, and not a purely human attribute. They inaugurated a trinity of gods, and soon there was nothing left but the supernatural. It remains for the twentieth century to recreate the unity of the divine Father and divine brotherhood, to reconstruct the family, and then to construct the higher civic life—the cornerstone of which Thomas Jefferson laid at the threshold of our century—a church without rites, a state without paupers, a church as big as humanity, a state federated for common helpfulness around the whole world.

THE FAMILY IN FUTURE LIFE.

We have only to consider the third requirement of the religious family, perpetuity. Immortality was home extended beyond this life. It was a part of the oldest conception. It was never mentioned by primitive creeds, because it was never doubted by primitive thought. To the original man all life was one life. To die was only a change. He never thought of annihilation or reabsorption. To him the departed were not dead; they were counted in as yet, and always to be members of the family. The Hebrew books belonged to this undoubting era. A man is never thought of by them as possibly dissolving into his elements; he lives on, of course. Therefore the whole future partook of the family life. The family was projected into the unseen. Not only was the father there, but the children were there.

What we need, then, in all this struggle of sciences and creeds, is to come out at last upon a perfectly fatherly God, a family of mankind, including all races, a hope for the whole race beyond this life as well as in this life, and this we will yet do. Slumping off the narrowness of sects, the undivine meannesses of religious cliques, yielding our craving for paradise that exclude those who cannot vote or eat or believe with us, we reach out our hands to the world and say: Come unto us all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and we will give you welcome and rest When Asoka, the Buddhist, was about to die his courtiers said: "O, Asoka, now you will enter into eternal bliss." He answered. "Never of my own free will shall I enter paradise while one poor soul wanders outside." Christianity must register this vow before the world and before heaven. Let us save the whole family or perish together. We need a godlier god; a diviner mission, and a worthier immortality. These are the foundations for the twentieth century of the Christian religion.

When the family is restored in religious life we shall comprehend the saying, I and my Father are one. Religion belongs to the universe as much as gravitation. As Jupiter draws my hand, and my hand proportionally pulls Jupiter by attraction, so will the intelligence of the universe interact in the sublime harmony of love. God and man will hold together without breach of purpose. Evolution does not deny the doctrine of immediate and constant inspiration. The great fact of the universe is family love.

Nor let it be forgotten for one moment in our lives and plans that these three things are of equal importance—God, humanity, eternity—the Father, the whole family, forever. To this end only any decent religion works to unite in one eternal co-operation of love the intelligent universe.

A BOSTON REVIVAL.

The Grand Work of Mrs. J. J. Whitney.

The Spiritualists of Boston are experiencing a revival such as they have not enjoyed for years, and will long remember the past few weeks as among the brightest in the history of Spiritualism. The Berkeley Hall, which has not been able to attract much attention hitherto, and where, I regret to say, the attendance has been generally far below the deserts of the intellectual fare offered, has suddenly with one bound come prominently before the public. Last Sunday 669 persons paid admission, while fully 200 were turned away. The audience on that occasion did not consist of the regular attendants; it was the general public that had been stirred up, and that in no uncertain manner. They came to witness an exhibition of the wonderful powers of Mrs. J. J. Whitney of California, whose fame has reached all sections of this community; and right nobly did she acquit herself. The most marvelous tests were given, and it was not the faithful, but the pronounced skeptic, that admitted from time to time her mysterious ability to give really astounding information under her control. Mrs. Whitney does what is wanted in reaching those who are not within the spiritual fold. What Moody is to Christianity, Mrs. Whitney is to Spiritualism. She attracts, then interests, and finally convinces. She, more than any man or woman in America to-day is capable of carrying forth the banner of truth. With a powerful delivery, pleasing presence, and thorough absence of any paraphernalia, standing before her audience on an open platform under her control, she fairly astounds all who behold her, and it does seem more than a pity that when such a champion is obtainable, the brethren do not secure more commodious quarters where the public could be accommodated, instead of having to turn them away. Unfortunately, Mrs. Whitney does not stay much longer with us; I understand but two more Sundays. What is our loss, however will be Chicago's gain, for I have heard that Mrs. Whitney contemplates breaking her journey at Chicago on her way back to her California home, and will, no doubt, hold at all events one meeting. If she does, it is to be hoped that the largest hall in the city will be obtained, so that as much good as possible may result from her flying visit. We want public exponents of our system like her—those who are above reproach, those who disarm suspicion, and those who are able to carry conviction to the general public. As a woman who has made sacrifices for the truth, who is away above the necessity of giving her time and energy to the cause, as one who gives to that cause far more than it ever gives to her, she is indeed a great power for good, a great factor in hastening that glorious day when all shall know the truth.

A PROGRAMME.

ENTIRELY NEW AND PRESENTED TO OUR MANY READERS.

Three Excellent Books Furnished at Cost.

The Progressive Thinker is published not alone to promote the prosperity of its editor and publisher, but it has the welfare of its numerous subscribers at heart. With that end in view we put the price of the paper at one dollar per year, and during these hard times we have been able to maintain it at that price, without begging for assistance or without having debts or obligations to accumulate to harass us. Our main object is to promote the interests of Spiritualism; to make each family feel that its members are enriched in mind and spirituality by the presence of The Progressive Thinker. And in order to continue in a measure that status, we have changed our programme somewhat.

We have just published a remarkable book, the title of which is "The Next World Interviewed." It is intensely interesting and instructive, and should be in every family. Hon. Arthur MacArthur, at one time Judge of the Supreme Court, thus speaks of the work:

"The Next World Interviewed," by Mrs. S. G. Horn, is a book of power and interest to all those who are inclined to the study of spiritual phenomena, or who desire to know something about the sublime teachings that come from supernatural intercourse. The revelations are of such an extraordinary character that the attention is not only attracted by the nature of the communications, but the mind is filled with amazement at the range of thought and the grand views that are presented of the invisible life.

The communications are varied according to the character of the communicator, and each relates an experience of his own. For instance, the poet Longfellow, when the lethargy, that for a few seconds had enthralled his senses, had passed away, heard a great chorus of voices singing words taken from his own Psalm of Life. De Quincey finds that the splendors in the visions of an opium eater grow pale before the transcendent realities that open to a spirit's sight in the Land of Souls, and Darwin affirms that could he have lived an hundred years longer, he would have been able to demonstrate the evolution of an angel from a man.

The book is composed of communications received through the mediumship of Mrs. Horn, while in a trance condition, and reveal the influence of a high order of spirit intelligence on every page. The scenes described and the vivid spectacle of the Heavenly life are full of grandeur, and recall the highest passages in our best poetry.

Nothing can be finer than the description of the homes of our departed friends. The life of usefulness they lead is very different from the current views on that subject. Instead of the supposed indolence of Spirit-life, each one is constantly employed in some work of self-improvement, or in some effort for the general good.

Titian paints in his spirit-home among the stars, where he has a studio, and his splendid color realizes the ideal in that land of love and beauty; the patriot soul of Lincoln loves and watches over the country for which he lost his life, and John Stuart Mill, who could find no proof of any life but this on earth, reveals the undying principle stamped upon his spirit that renders him immortal.

Indeed, throughout all these wonderful sketches, the mind realizes the full grandeur of its own destiny, and the great future in which it is to live forever. Scenes of surpassing loveliness and a boundless prospect of man's activities are disclosed in this new sphere of existence, and one cannot but feel that he is reading messages of plain and honest truth from those who speak, and know and see what they relate.

It is an animating thought that springs up in the mind on the perusal of this book. The beauties of life in the world of spirit are laid open to our gaze and the various changes that are wrought in the views and opinions that were entertained on earth by the greatest thinkers, show how far knowledge and science have been from grasping the laws of the spiritual spheres, and how much grander existence is when it becomes immortal. The humble and great often reverse positions, and the inequalities of earth conditions are rectified by a just and equitable balance, that has for its foundation the work and worth that have marked the life of each member of the human family. Let these pages be read with candor, and skepticism and atheism would be converted into belief, and a devotional sense of reverence and joy would take the place of besitation; and even the professed Christian will find his doubts of the future swept away, and his views of the everlasting goodness of God corroborated by the most infallible assurances.

There is no phase of philosophical hesitation or indifference but what would be startled by this mighty blazon of the unknown and invisible universe, and if the devotees of science would read and ponder these marvelous pages, their disdain would be turned into awe and admiration at the grand world of life and wisdom which they reveal. The soul who can contemplate these messages of love and truth without emotion is not in a condition to receive the proof of one who should rise from the grave to testify to the same things, for there is an air of reality and naturalness that attracts the common feelings of our better self against all the suggestions of prejudice or tradition. The world of sense is confronted with the direct revelation of a higher form of life. Those who have lived great lives here below come back to inform us of their experience there, and to give us the assurance of their great souls that they still live, and that the world of spirit is as real as this one; they give their names, they state their views, they relate the facts, all in perfect conformity with their individual gifts and peculiarities, and call upon their friends who linger below to read and believe as if they stood with them face to face, after the manner of earthly intercourse, and this transcendent appeal is couched in terms so exquisite and appropriate as to show that only the wise, the gifted and the cultured ones are the authors of these divine passages. The philosopher, the poet, the man of letters, the orator, the statesman and the divine, the doubter, the religionist and the unbeliever unite in this grand testimonial of the eternal existence of the soul.

It is a noble array of genius, learning and character to the greatest and grandest truth that any of them had ever examined or proclaimed, and they now come from their glorious abode to communicate the glad tidings of immortality to all the children of men.

In conclusion we would say that the rare mediumistic gifts of Mrs. Horn are singularly free from every selfish or mercenary motive. She exercises them for the good of her friends, and scarcely ever appears in public work. Her gentle and lovely character is a testimony of the exalted nature of the intelligence that controls her, and of the purity and good faith of whatever appears in this volume.

The plates of the above remarkable book have been presented to us by Henry J. Horn, of Washington, D. C. One edition only had been issued, and it sold for $1.50 per copy. This book is published as "The Progressive Thinker Library," and is only one of a series to be published, to be furnished to our subscribers at a nominal cost. Just think, Spiritualists, of the great good that can be accomplished through the instrumentality of the plan!

"The Next World Interviewed" contains communications from many distinguished individuals, and they are, indeed, highly interesting and instructive. It is neatly bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and will be furnished to our patrons, post paid, for 35 cents a copy. That is, anyone sending a year's subscription for The Progressive Thinker can have the book at that price, 35 cents, postage paid.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes, containing an aggregate of 1050 pages, will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription, on the following terms:

The Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I of the Encyclopædia..... $ .45
Vol. II of the Encyclopædia..... .45
The Next World Interviewed..... .35

Total $1.25

☞ Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

"The Next World Interviewed."

A REMARKABLE BOOK AT COST.

The Progressive Thinker.

To the Editor:—Enclosed find the price of a six months' extension of time of subscription to The Progressive Thinker. There may be many spiritual publications, but there is only one Progressive Thinker. It has a strong individuality and does not fail to endorse the truth, no matter from what source, and that is the true ideal of progression. To be narrow-minded and exclusive is Christianity; to crave and accept the gems of truth from the whole world of humanity is spirituality; and a Spiritualist who does not accept all people as kindred is only a spiritist, and is yet to be converted to true Spiritualism.

If a person wishes to study the philosophy of Spiritualism, the very best and cheapest means is to subscribe for this valuable paper, and not only read each article carefully, but study those which treat of scientific truths, and when they have digested this food for soul-growth they will be up to date in all progressive education.

I have not time to engage in the study of library books, many of which are behind the times, but I take time to digest all the ideas of the bright lights of Spiritualism of to-day, who are continually crowding a flood of missionary literature before the eyes of the world through the columns of The Progressive Thinker.

To The Progressive Thinker and all admiring friends, the greetings of the season, I cordially extend.

MARY E. VAN LUVEN.

A Good Proposition.

To the Editor:—I desire you to say a few words for me. I am a medium, and have been traveling through Minnesota and Wisconsin this last summer and have found a great many people who never heard of a spiritual paper. I have paid for four papers, in the past six months, for three months. What I want to say is this: If every medium would pay for the paper for three months for some family that never read a spiritual paper, it would do more to advance Spiritualism than in any other way. I am sure that if they have one valuable paper, they would read it, also loan it to their friends, and induce others to take it. I hope all Spiritualists, and especially mediums will do all they can to increase the circulation of the papers.

MADAME VERNLEY.

"Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." Church people are cautioned not to open this book, as its comical pictures, based on Bible texts, tend to induce uncontrollable levity. It is a book for the freethinker who wishes to rest from busy cares, and drive away ennui. Price, in strong board covers, $1; cloth $1.50. For sale at this office.

"Hypnotism Up to Date." By Sydney Flower. In the form of dialogue and story, the author presents very successfully a condensed account of hypnotism, its theory and practice up to date. Price, paper, 25 cents. Sold at this office.

"Mediumship and Its Development, and How to Mesmerize to Assist Development." By W. H. Bach. Especially useful to learners who seek to know and utilize the laws of mediumship and development, and avoid errors. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

GENERAL SURVEY

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Doings, Etc.

Bear in mind, please, that we cannot publish weekly reports of meetings. Whenever a change is made in speakers, or anything of special interest, send us a brief item, please. A great deal can be expressed in a dozen lines; but long reports will not be used. Meetings are of local interest only. We extend a cordial invitation to all speakers to send in their appointments to lecture, and general movements, which will be read by at least 40,000. We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

Mrs. E. A. Druliner writes; "At the Masonic Home Temple, 3120 Forest avenue, the good work of a Spiritualist revival goes on. Some may call this orthodox, but why let the orthodox monopolize everything effective? To swell the ranks of spiritual evolution is the motto of this society."

Geo. W. Walrond, the English trance, clairvoyant and Spiritualist missionary, has become quite a favorite with the Colorado people. He is now giving a series of Sunday lectures and tests to good audiences in Denver, before he moves further West to fill other engagements ogered him. The Denver Sunday Mercury has an extended report of an interview with Mr. Walrond.

Mr. C. E. Winans, the materializing medium, is now in Michigan, and wishes to make engagements in that State and vicinity. Address him at 409 Lion street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

During the month of November Oscar A. Edgerly has filled very successful engagements in Willimantic, Conn., and Philadelphia, Pa. During the entire month of December he is engaged with the First Spiritualist Society of Lynn, Mass.

T. Grimshaw writes: "I have reached this country once more, safe and sound from my trip to the mother country. My engagements are: Brooklyn, N. Y., December; Buffalo, N. Y., January; Indianapolis, Ind., February; St. Louis, March and April. Owing to an alteration in my plans, I am left with May and June disengaged. Would like to engage them with some society or societies in the Middle or Western States. Address, T. Grimshaw, care of J. Donovan, 114 Jersey street Buffalo, N. Y."

D. P. Hughes writes from Wheatland, Mich.: "J. B. Jonson, of 425 Tecumseh street, Toledo, Ohio, has been with us for a few days, and we wish to call the attention of the friends everywhere, in need of a good physical medium that, if given reasonable conditions, he will satisfy the most skeptical of the continuity of life."

Georgina McIntyre writes: "We wish to inform our friends and co-workers of the success of our first social and musical given on Friday evening, November 20, by the Sunday-school of Love, which meets in the Mystic Temple, 1910 Washington boulevard, every Sunday at 2 o'clock. As the writer is the founder and leader of this little band, she certainly feels a mother's interest, watchfulness and care for the young people who gather within the sacred fold. Each Sunday our numbers have increased two-fold, and the interest manifested would inspire even one whose heart is less in the work than the writer's. Over forty children participated in the pleasures of the social, and fully entered into the spirit of the exercises. Every number on the programme suggested the wierd and mysterious. The 'Dance of the Demons,' the Trilby waltzes, the 'Maid in the Moon,' 'Dream Faces' and 'The Mountain Sylphs,' were a few of the vocal and instrumental pieces rendered, all of which added much to the pleasures of the occasion. Our next Dime Social will be given on the 3rd of December, in this hall, to which all are cordially invited. Refreshments extra."

Mrs. M. Gregory will hold a free developing class every Monday evening at eight o'clock, commencing December 7, at her residence, 593 LaSalle avenue, this city.

Dr. T. Wilkins, the magnetic healer, of 67 Thirty-third street, this city, contributes a very seasonable poem to The Progressive Thinker this week entitled "The Turkey's Prayer." As it is one of the Doctor's best inspirations, we trust our readers will be delighted with both its sense and sentiment.

Mrs. Mattie Hull has closed her engagement at Allegheny, Pa. She went from there to Boston.

Dr. Rothermel writes: "I am now on my way East. I will be in Omaha for a short time. Anyone desiring to make engagements with me for seances between that city and Cleveland, may address me at Omaha, Neb."

Lyman C. Howe writes from Fredonia, N. Y.: "I am having fine audiences in Buffalo this month, and next Sunday closes my work there. Mrs. Matteson, the famous clairvoyant physician, whose work and money led the building of the brick church, or temple, has been ill for several weeks, and is now away on an 'outing' for rest. She is a remarkable woman, and a terror to the dogmatic dictators who seek to compel the sick to employ them and let them experiment on them to see how much scientific (?) poisoning and carving they can endure and live. Mrs. Swain is feeble, but came to the church a week ago Sunday. She is one of the 'old reliable' mediums, whose gifts were endorsed by Prof. Wm. Denton, thirty-eight years ago. For many years she has been retained as a private medium by Daniel Bailey, whose cottage at Lily Dale is conspicuous on the bluff. He passed away about three years ago, and, I am informed, that he left to Mrs. Swain a monthly endowment of $30, which makes her declining years easy. Mrs. Moor has done excellent work the past two months in organizing a lyceum, drilling the children in the most approved manner, and making it so attractive as to bring the children in, and hold and enthuse them. My health is much better than two months ago. I am open for engagements wherever called. Success to you and The Progressive Thinker."

Dr. R. Greer will leave Chicago this week, on especial business, for the Gulf Coast of Mexico, and may be away for a few weeks; but while he is gone Dr. William Richmond (husband of Cora L. V. Richmond), will, as before, have charge of his office work. While Dr. Greer is gone, he may be addressed at Biloxi, Harrison Co., Miss.

Geo. H. Brooks writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "I close my two months' work with the Unity Society of Milwaukee next Sunday. It has been a very successful two months' labor. I hold a series of meetings in Ottawa, Ill., commencing Saturday, December 5, closing Sunday, December 13. My address while there will be 627 Cornell street. Then go to La Crosse, Wis., for the two last Sundays of December, and then return to the Unity Society of Milwaukee for January and February, 1897. The socials of the Unity Society are very largely attended and full of interest."

M. C. Sherwood writes from Coloma, Mich.: "There is a growing interest in Spiritualism here, as our beautiful philosophy is so ably presented by our able and earnest brother, Dr. H. C. Andrews, who is drawing larger audiences with each meeting. We have secured Dr. Andrews as our regular speaker for the second and fourth Sundays of each month for a year. He gives good lectures, grand tests and improvisations. He will engage with societies for the first and third Sundays of each month, or week evenings, or for camp work for 1897. He will also officiate at weddings or funerals. Correspondence solicited. Address him at Riverside, Mich., box 45."

Dr. Noyes writes from Atchison, Kas.: "There is no society here, although many Spiritualists, that are anxious to hear from loved ones that have passed on before, as was proved by the large number that attended our physical and test seances. The friends are anxious for mediums and workers to visit this city. They will receive a kind welcome, but we are cursed with a city law that compels all mediums to pay a license if they do any private work or hold seances. Mediums dare not advertise, for fear of arrest. I would advise mediums visiting this city not to advertise. I go from here to Topeka for a short time."

J. Madison Allen and Mrs. M. Theresa Allen, general missionaries for Missouri and Kansas, are at liberty to give special attention to the work within the State of Missouri and vicinity for the month of December. Terms for the services of either of them are within easy reach of all who will make an effort to have the cause revived in their respective communities. Write at once and secure dates and terms for short appointments. Address them at 233 Commercial street, Springfield, Mo.

Mrs. Tripp, of Minneapolis, formerly of Houston, Texas, having finished with the Society at Bloomington, Ill., is now in this city visiting friends, at No. 79 Hammond street, North Side. She reports that the Bloomington Progressive Spiritual Association is doing a grand work. There are lectures three times a week, and on Sunday evenings many are turned from the door, so intense is the desire of the people to listen to the Spiritual truths and feel the presence of their dear departed friends.

J. C. F. Grumbine goes to Boston to minister at the First Spiritual Temple presided over by Mr. Ayer, during December and January. He will be in Brooklyn during February and March. All mail will be forwarded from his old address, Station P, Chicago. See advertisement on last page.

Dr. C. H. Figuers writes from Cincinnati, Ohio: "My engagement here with the People's Religious Spiritual Society as a lecturer and platform test medium, closed last Sunday. I have been very successful as the attendance was large and constantly increasing. I leave for Boston, Mass., this evening, November 26, for a two months' stay, and after that for Lake Helen, Fla. Cincinnati is a fine field for honest, conscientious mediums of any phase, as many of the people here have been imposed upon by unscrupulous rascals who have stolen the livery of heaven to serve the Devil in. The resident mediums are for the most part reliable and true, and have a quiet following, and are doing a good work. My address will be 145 West Newton street, Boston, Mass., and all letters will receive prompt attention."

J. M. White writes from Joplin, Mo.: "In order to satisfy the inquiries which are coming to me in regard to my mediumship, I will say that my phases are clairvoyance, poetic improvisations and inspirational speaking. I give platform tests, and in my sittings give names and dates. Parlor seances a specialty. My rooms are at No. 707 Main street, Joplin, Mo."

Secretary writes: "Samuel Smith, of Grand Rapids, delivered two lectures before our society in this place on Sunday November 22. There was a deep interest manifested by his audience, and he was listened to with the closest attention from the beginning to the end of his lectures, and which were so convincing that the skeptics present had no criticisms to make. He is open for engagements on liberal terms. His address is 47 North avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich."

Mrs. S. C. Scovell writes from Elgin, Ill: "I am at home once more from a six weeks trip, in South Dakota. We had successful meetings both public and private. Elgin is still interested in Spiritual work, but the support financially is not what it should be with the number of people in attendance at our public meetings. I find plenty of work here, but financially a medium cannot find the support needed. In private classes and spiritual readings there is plenty to do, but it comes from the outside ranks almost entirely. Brother and Sister Claman have given two public meetings here. The attendance was good, but the fees very inadequate to the work done. Mrs. Claman is a good speaker, and, I feel, as honest as the spirit-world itself."

Mrs. G. A. Wilson, vice-president, writes from Galveston, Texas: "The First Spiritual Society of Galveston is in first-class condition. We have just lately received our charter from The National Association and feel that to be an important link in the chain of union which is soon to bind all Spiritualistic societies. The ladies some time ago organized a Wednesday afternoon circle, which is doing even more than expected in convincing investigators, helping to sustain the sociability of the members and bringing new members into the society. We now have with us John W. Ring, a young inspirational speaker, who with the earnestness of purpose, simplicity of language yet logical manner in which his guides handle their subjects, attracts very good audiences, including some of our first citizens. Several private circles are being held in different parts of the city, from which some very good developments are being manifested."

Mrs. J. W. Cartwright writes from Fort Woth, Texas "Owing to my husband's and mother's demise so near together, it seems that they have forced me into Spiritualism, against my consent, as they have repeatedly spoken to me so plainly, I recognise which it is, when they come."

E. J. Bowtell, who has been lecturing during October and November at Canton and Massillon, O., is re-engaged for the Sundays of December, speaking in the mornings at City Hall, Canton, and in the evenings for the First Spiritual and Religious Association meeting at Grand Army Hall, Massillon. He is at liberty for week nights of December in the vicinity of Canton, and for Sundays in 1897. Address 402 S. Market street, Canton, O.

Mrs. E. A. Dexter has removed to 292 Sheffield avenue, near Garfield avenue, this city. She will resume work. Circles Wednesday evenings, also Friday afternoons.

Will C. Hodge, whose lectures are always interesting and suggestive, is now stopping in the city, and can be addressed for engagements at No. 3 South Elizabeth street.

Mrs. Myra F. Paine has been holding meetings at Bolivar, N. Y., and doing an excellent work. She writes: "We are having well attended meetings every Sunday, and much of the prejudice against Spiritualism is getting rubbed off, as my inspirers present a different kind from what they had in their minds, and judging by their breathless attention, it looks as though we should have material for a society here after a while."

S. N. Aspinwall writes from Minneapolis, Min.: "During our absence, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, of Stevens Point, Wis., an able speaker and test medium, took charge of our meetings, and I would say that any societies needing a good lecturer, a good medium, and a quiet lady in their midst, would do well to correspond with her."

R. Ward writes from Denver, Col.: "The Colorado Spiritual Association meets every Sunday at A. O. U. W. Hall, corner Champa and 18th streets. It gives me great pleasure to inform you, that we have been able to secure the services of George W. Walrond, the great inspirational lecturer and test medium. His lectures are fine, and his tests are clear. It is a pleasure to hear him. We also have Prof. W. S. Graz, who is one of the best speakers I ever listened to. His psychometric readings are the best I ever heard; and I have heard a great many. Those two speakers fill the large hall every Sunday. The music of our society is quite an attractive feature; we have a very fine choir. We have quite a number of good test mediums, among them, Mrs. L. J. Bicknell, Mrs. Galbrath, Mrs. Baymonde, and several others. We have a host of good talent in our society. We are spreading the gospel of Spiritualism to the people of Denver, and they are flocking to hear it. On Thursday evening, November 19, we started our weekly socials for the winter, at room 209, Charles Block. We had a concert, dancing and refreshments. Everything was donated to the social by the ladies of the society. Mrs. L. J. Bicknell and Miss McKenney sang a duet; Miss Russel, Mrs. Raymond and R. Ward sang solos. The social was a grand success. We recommend them to all societies. They are good for the cause."

T. D. Kayner writes from Independence, Iowa: "I will be in St. Joseph, Mo., for the months of December and January, and will attend calls to go out during the week in any direction, fifty miles or so from that city. Will also officiate at weddings or funerals."

Mrs. B. Hasenclever writes: "We would like to inform our many friends that we have moved to a more central location, 684 W. Madison street, where the Doctor and myself will be pleased to have all the friends call and spend a pleasant evening. My materializing seances are the same evenings, Wednesdays and Saturdays, as before. The Spiritual Advancement Society also meets at our home every Sunday evening, and we have had good attendance Mediums are invited invited.

T. D. Kayner writes from Independence, Iowa: "We came to this city perfect strangers, and, as it were, upon probation; but the evening after arrival, Mrs. Kayner gave a seance in the home of Mr. Marquette, a leading business man and old resident of the city, that made those present know and understand that there was a truth in spirit return, and that Mrs. Kayner was one of the chosen instruments that could demonstrate that fact honestly and fearlessly. There were some present that heard her father, E. V. Wilson, lecture here twenty-five years ago, and they could see many things in her manners and tests that reminded them of him. We are in a city that has many liberal-minded people that have been anxious to investigate and learn, but a few months ago there was a person here at work that did not live the life he taught, and who probably thought he would never come this way again, and therefore tried to get all the money he could and then leave the people to cry fraud, and make them afraid of the next medium that came along, no matter how good and true. It has been very hard to win our way here, but the work of the last two Sundays has given us a foothold and reputation that true Spiritualists need not be ashamed nor afraid of. Next Sunday will be our last in this place, as we are under engagement for December and January in St. Joseph, Mo. If the same good fortune attends our labor there as it has in the other places where we have been, we hope to be able to do their society a large amount of good in increased membership and widespread interest. We are certainly in the field yet as pioneers, notwithstanding the amount of spoken and written thoughts that have been given forth by others. We find many in every town we enter, that do not know the first thing of our philosophy or phenomena; and we find others who say it is the work of the Devil, and if anyone dares to investigate he will go straight to perdition!"

"Easy Lessons in Spiritual Science," especially for the young, and arranged for lyceums, may be obtained by addressing this office. They are by Mrs. Myra F. Paine, who is a gifted lady, and this work is especially fine. Price, 10 cents.

The Spiritual Light Church, 526 West 63d street, Englewood. Conference and mediums' meeting every Sunday at 2:30 p m. Lecture, musical psychometric readings and tests at 7:30 p. m. All welcome. Mrs. Lora Holton, pastor.

Mrs. Lora Holton, phenomenal musical test medium, and clairvoyant, will accept calls to hold parlor musical test seances, in or near Chicago, upon reasonable terms. She is located at No. 83 Thirty-first street.

Mrs. Ella Woodward writes from Toledo, Ohio: "I would like to say a few words on the necessity of urging the organization of the children's progressive lyceum. My attention was forcibly called to this question when, on the 8th of November, at the Central Congregational Church of Toledo, hundreds of little children listened to the story of the sacrifice at the dedication of the temple, and were each given a paper with a picture of the altar and the fire, whereon the live animals were placed, tied and burned, as a sacrifice to please God; and they were told by their teacher that God accepted what they had given him, and blessed them. Was this not enough to shock their sensitive hearts? And to those that we had tried to teach to never kill a living thing, what must have been their thoughts? Then who knows what the effect may be on that class of little ones who are so hard to teach anything to in a humanitarian way? Who knows how many of them may gather in some old shed or commons and build their fires and sacrifice someone's pet kitten, or bird, perhaps, because the idea has been given them by their Sabbath-school teacher? Oh! why will not the Spiritualists of our country look at this question more seriously? In my mind there is nothing so much needed as the forward march of the children's progressive lyceums."

German Spiritualistic Church, 755 S. Halsted street. Services every Sunday evening at 8 o'clock.

ITEMS FROM LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

We have received from the publisher (Mr. James Bowden), Coulson Kernahan's odd little work, "The Child, the Wise Man, and the Devil." It is, in one way, a beautiful and touching book, but in every way it is an aggravating one. Intensely religious in subject, it nevertheless has nearly all the vices of the impossible and sensational shocker. It sets out to show what a horror the world would be if the results of Christ's coming were blotted out: but it does not at all do that, and it omits everything on the other side,—all the persecutions, all the "religious" wars, all the havoc between man and man, man and woman, mother and child.

A writer in "This World and the Next" draws attention to the warning that ought always to be given to inquirers. It may be almost a commonplace, but how necessary it still is! He says: There is great danger, in connection with Spiritualism, to which the inexperienced and inquiring ones are exposed. The danger lies in placing too much reliance upon communications received from the other side. Anxious inquirers have often been repulsed through contradictory phenomena as bosh and humbug, through not having properly understood the conditions necessary to receive truthful information and teachings, compatible with the claim that Spiritualists maintain as to the high order of their truth. It appears to me, therefore, that not a little care should be bestowed to point out to such before they seek those proofs by the evidence of which they will be able to reconcile them with Nature and reason —that they should clearly understand that the transition of a soul from this sphere to the next does not alter the peculiarities of the individual. That a liar will be a liar still, and that a mischievous person transferred to the next stage of existence will still manifest the same propensities of character and temperament as in the one just left. At the same time, while we entirely endorse this, the beginner needs quite as much to be on his guard against an over-sceptical state of mind, and especially against a state of mind which almost assumes falsity or mischief. That may possibly attract it.

As it is the mediums who must ever be the teachers of our cause, it behoves us to see that they are fitted for the work before them and understand what they are doing.

Many of our best mediums have been destroyed by their own ignorance of the simplest laws governing the manifestations produced through their powers. The manifestations have appeared questionable. The mediums have suffered, and the cause itself fallen into disrepute.

It has been argued that a certain class of phenomena is much more convincing when obtained through an ignorant medium than when coming through an intelligent or cultivated one. This is, however, open to question, as I venture to assert that no manifestation can take place for the production of which the medium has not the latent power independent of help from the outside spiritual sources. I am now referring to writing, drawings and trance speaking mediums.

The spirits who are able to control a medium are limited to this latent power; consequently, the knowledge or ability displayed by the spirit is subject at all times to considerable restriction.

If we improve the instrument, foster its latent powers, develop its best qualities, adapt it especially for the end in view, the work will be the better and more satisfactory done by it.

We educate our clergy for the work of the church, our teachers for our schools, but to the present our mediums have had to get along as best they could; have had in many cases a hard fight with the world and got the worst of it.

Sensitive and subject to influences of all kinds, both favorable and adverse, mediums have not known nor understood how to protect themselves. They have allowed their mediumship to be used by investigators as ignorant as themselves, who, when something happened, which to their limited understanding seemed to reflect on the medium's honesty, have been the first to throw a stone or act the part of the Pharisee, and the medium, often innocent, has been left to sink into the mire to be trampled upon.

Our mediums should be Spiritualists —which is not always the case. Their aim should be to increase the knowledge and spiritual well-being of their fellow men; they should be above suspicion in honesty of purpose, thought, and deed; their aim and motto should be to "do the right, happen what will."

Home and training school for mediums: 1. The object of the new Home to be the education and development of mediums through whom the inhabitants of the spirit world can work for the regeneration of humanity.

2. To educate children from earliest infancy in the knowledge that all life and goodness are from God, and that communication with God and His spirit messengers is the first aim of earthly existence.

3. That in order to become a medium a pure, holy life, that is consecrated to this end, must be led.

4. That the great object must be to attain the perfection necessary to become a medium for faithfully transmitting the messages from the spirit world to this.

5. That no creed nor dogma is to be taught, but that whole education be directed to the existence of a Supreme God and Creator, the immortality of man, and the possibility of communication with angels.

6. The inmates of the Home must be the children of healthy parents who have led honest, God-fearing lives, and whose progenitors, as far as can be ascertained have committed no crime. This is necessary, in order to save the teachers from having to contend against any hereditary taint either physical or moral in child thus to be brought up to the service of the Almighty and His angels.

7. The children must be given willingly by their parents at as early an age as consistent with health, and every facility must be afforded to such parents to assure themselves of the little ones' well-being.

8. The Home of the children to be plain, simple, but comfortable. Clothing to be strictly in accordance with hygiene. Food, as far as consistent with health, to be fruits, grains, and vegetables.

9. Physical health is to be considered as important as moral purity for the proper understanding of God and His works.

10. If, after a time, a child shows signs of being entirely unsuitable for the work for which it is being educated, either through the development of any physical or moral deformity or disease unfitting it for the end in view, it is to be given up to its parents and another put in its stead.

11. The education of the children to be as comprehensive as possible, including all branches taught in the best schools. If any child shows a talent for a special work of art, every facility is to be given for its study.

12. The whole education of the children to be based upon the fact that, as it is by the will and love of God that all things exist, it is the clear and imperative duty of all to study and work to fulfil His laws and devote the talents given them to the service of God and His creatures. They should be taught that to work for fallen humanity is the greatest service they can render to God, and that it is their special duty to prepare both their souls and their bodies to be fitting instruments for this end.

I have long carefully and conscientiously studied spiritual phenomena. Not only am I convinced of their irrefragable reality, but I have also a profound assurance that they are produced by the spirits of those who have left earth; and further that they only could produce them. I believe in the existence of an invisible world corresponding to the world around us. I believe that the denizens of that world were formerly resident of this earth, and I believe in the possibility of inter-communion between the two worlds.

At a sitting the following month, Rosetta materialized and threw lengths of drapery over the sitters, long folds of it stretching across the room like a hammock. The face was very distinctly seen by most of the sitters, the medium being visible apparently in a deep trance, as the form walked about the room. The striking feature of this seance was the distinctness of the form and the features. Every sitter was delighted. A child, not recognizable, was seen with Rosetta and spoke to my wife, addressing her as mamma. The same form played about my two boys for some time, and took a handkerchief out of the pocket of one of them, after which I felt a small hand placed in mine, but not distinctly enough for me speak with certainty as to the size of it. Several sitters declared positively that they saw what appeared to be my little boy playing about his two brothers, whilst my wife says it was the most satisfactory materialization of him she ever witnessed. She also heard him say, "I'm papa's boy! I'm mamma's boy!"

There are some who think it wicked to attempt to penetrate into these occult things; but, if so, the Bible is a wicked book, for it is full of occult lore, and is saturated with astrology. Even the great and comparatively modern astronomer, Kepler, was a believer in it. But, in these days, the subject has fallen from the high places to the low, because men in high places, unlike the wise men of old, will not look at it.

This is a subject which keenly concerns Spiritualists. We have it on record that a leading lunacy-doctor declared his readiness to certify to the insanity of any one who professed to hear spirit voices; and only lately we had incentives to incarceration publicly put forth by another leading lunacy-monger, with strong hints as to the greater facilities given on the Continent. We are persuaded that there is real danger here, and it is our grave duty to watch it and worry it to the best of our ability. Publicity and public opinion are the best safeguards here.

As regards prophecies, I cannot say that I have much faith in them. "Sunshine," an Indian spirit, prophesied wonderful things to my family, several years ago, but they have not been fulfilled, and I find the safest way is to go on doing one's best without paying much attention to them. I was present when Mr. Slater predicted most confidently to a certain lady that she would pass her examinations, about which she had been very anxious, and I was afterwards sorry for her sake to see that she had failed. Perhaps the prediction made her relax her efforts, whereas if she had looked upon it as an encouragement to persevere, but without overworking herself, she might have succeeded. In this case the prediction was wrong, but Mr. Slater knew her surroundings, etc., from her handwriting.

The First Spiritualistic Temple in Europe, Professor Lcian Pusch writes "Thanks be to God and the high spirits that through their influence it has at last become possible for us to have a temple in one of the most beautiful parts of Europe, at Bodensee, Ober Waid, St. Gallen, Switzerland. It is at the same time an academy for psychological research in every direction, and thus fills a long-felt want. It will be open summer and winter, and possesses all conveniences for visitors. Private rooms, with excellent board, can be had very reasonably. The building also possesses large halls for lectures, etc. For all particulars address Professor Lucian Pusch, Director, Ober Waid, St. Gallen, Switzerland."

On reflection, it will be seen that the advanced view which regards the physical body as a useless encumbrance is illogical and irrational both in its beginning and in its end. The doctrine of reincarnation, whether true or not, leaves to the one who believes it no alternative but to take all the means available to prolong physical life, inasmuch as he might save enormous trouble and time if he could so prolong one incarnation as to render another incarnation unecessary.

Spiritualism has consoled thousands upon thousands by temporarily withdrawing the veil between two planes of existence, and showing the continuity of life under other conditions than man is ordinarily accustomed to, but that does not affect the fact that there is an overwhelming longing to prolong physical life, at all events till its capabilities are exhausted. And to suppose that this can be done in a paltry seventy or hundred years is palpably absurd. Day after day new possibilities dawn upon the developing individual, and when he has cultivated the power of travelling in the etheric body, and acquired a thorough mastery over it, he has comparatively little ground for complaining of being hampered by the physical body. So that, when prolongation of life is being considered as a possibility, it must not be taken for granted that it involves of necessity a standstill in the evolution of spiritual powers.

To talk of prolonged existence for animal forms in the spiritual world is to leave out of account that the form is nothing but the manifestation of life for a definite purpose, and when that purpose is attained the form necessarily disappears.

There have been members of Spiritualistic societies, members of the Society for Psychical Research, and persons belonging to neither, such as Theosophists, Mystics, Occulists, and last, but not least, as a source of supply, readers of "Borderland" who, induced by what they read there, have begun to try to develop automatic writing and clairvoyance in themselves and received encouraging indications of those gifts.

SAYS BLIND WILL SEE.

Edison's Profound Faith in the Marvelous X Rays.

Almost Equals the Clairvoyant Sight.

EXPECTS THAT BY THEIR USE THIS ASTOUNDING RESULT WILL BE REACHED IN THREE YEARS—EXPERIMENTS WITH TWO MEN WHOSE EYES HAVE BEEN SIGHTLESS FOR YEARS PROVE GRATIFYING IN RESULTS—BOTH CATCH GLIMPSES OF THE LIGHT.

To the Editor:—It appears from the New York Journal of late date that "the blind—that class that cannot see, but whose optic nerves are still intact, will be made to see, and that within three years. I do not mean that they will be enabled to read, but it will be possible for them to distinguish persons and things."

Prof. Edison looked happy as he made this startling announcement in his laboratory in West Orange on Monday night. He had just concluded a series of experiments on two men who have been blind for years. By means of the X rays, held before the eyes of the men, they declared that for the first time since they have been stricken they had been able to perceive the light. For two hours Edison was busy with the experiments, and when the blind men left him, after making an appointment to visit him soon again, they thanked him again and again, and prayed that he would be successful.

MAKING THE BLIND TO SEE.

The men who had visited the Wizard were Jacob Mahrbacher, of No. 24 College place, and Otto Kallensee, of No. 130 South Orange avenue, Newark. When they walked into the laboratory Mr. Edison heard the story of their affliction, and then went to work. Mahrbacher was the first tried by Mr. Edison.

The light was flashed before his eyes and gradually the operator turned on the X ray current stronger and stronger. Finally, as the strongest light was reached, Mahrbacher tremblingly announced that he could see a glittering substance. Mr. Edison's face brightened, and again the tube was changed. Kallensee then stood before the X ray and gazed unblinkingly at it for some time. Another light was thrown, and with almost a sob the man cried:

"I can see a light. It's burning now, isn't it? I can see."

The best result was had by the incandescent light in a red globe, and this gave Edison a clew that may be important. Many experiments were tried, by the use of direct rays and the fluoroscope, with no better results.

After working for two hours Mr. Edison concluded to postpone his experiments for a time. As the men left him he said to them:

"Don't be discouraged, men. I know it is awfully hard to be blind, but we will find a cure for you yet."

DEVOTED TO THE WORK.

He afterward expressed himself as highly pleased with the outcome of the experiments, saying:

"I shall now devote myself to a specially prepared X ray that will, I feel sure, answer the purpose. Of course, I do not claim that those blind will be enabled to read, but they may distinguish persons and things. Constant research is being made in this field, and I doubt not that wonderful results will be attained. I will rig up a tube to be run in ice-cold water, that will be especially adapted to these men's needs, and I feel confident of success."

When Dr. Peck, of the New York Eye and Ear Infirmary heard of Mr. Edison's experiment and statement he said:

"I don't like to discuss this matter. In the first place, I do not know the nature of the blindness with which the men on whom the experiment was tried were afflicted. Possibly there are some cases in which Mr. Edison's discovery may prove available. There are cases where the patient may be afflicted with a loss of vision where the connection between the nerves and the brain is all right. There are numerous cases where we can see no reason why the person should not see; the optic nerve is all right and the brain connection is good, yet the person cannot distinguish objects. In such an instance Mr. Edison's discovery may prove beneficial. Then, again, there may be instances where the patient cannot see an ordinary light, but could clearly distinguish the glare of the X rays. When atrophy of the nerve is present I do not think Mr. Edison's cure will amount to anything, for in that case the hope of restoring sight would be in vain.

"I do not like to discuss this matter, however, as I do not know the subjects, and I don't suppose Mr. Edison knew what caused their blindness. There are so many causes for blindness, and while in some cases it can be cured, in others it is impossible to restore the sight. There is no reason why the patient should be able to distinguish a red light quicker than a white one. I sincerely hope that Mr. Edison has discovered what will benefit the blind. I would not be surprised at anything he does, and it is possible that he is working in the right direction."

SAW THROUGH A BOARD.

Charles P. Elwert, M. D., writes to the New York Journal as follows, in reference to some experiments in California:

"I read with the most intense interest the news regarding the X ray experiments with the blind. I have just returned to San Francisco, and while there learned that experiments were being very quietly conducted, on those lines, at the German Hospital. I went there with a local physician, a friend of mine, and witnessed one of the tests. I went in a very incredulous mood, but I left a full convert, for I actually saw the blind see.

"The experiment was upon a young man, a German, 20 years of age, who had been blind for seven years. There was no doubt as to his being actually blind. That was first fully demonstrated. The rays were tried, and, at first, without success. That made me incredulous; and then came the most amazing feature.

"Between the object he was to see and his eyes was placed a pine board two inches in thickness. Then he actually made out the object, which was of very irregular shape. Next a cube was placed in position, and, looking through the board, he described it as being something with four corners.

"The tests had been made with the aid of the fluoroscope. Next a different arrangement was made, with the fluoroscope between the subject's eyes and the light. A big iron comb was placed before him, and after a short time he described it as some kind of a musical instrument with teeth.

"It was marvelous. I have great hopes of future developments of the greatest possible importance along this line. But it all depends on the optic nerve. If that is entirely destroyed I do not think there can be the slightest hope. If that is not destroyed the blind, I feel confident, may all see.

"Why the young man could see better through a board than without it is a mystery that I cannot pretend to explain. But it is a subject of mysteries. I do not think that the explanation can in any way be like a near-sighted man's seeing better through glasses."

But the X ray, with all its wonderful unfoldments, is not equal to clairvoyant sight, which reveals to view the inhabitants of the spirit world.

New York. ALBRO.

Passed to Spirit-Life.

Brother John Franklin Fuller, of Nashville, Mich., one of the oldest Spiritualists in Michigan, passed away on November 16, 1896, at his residence, where the funeral was held on the 19th, conducted by Bro. Charles Howell, an inspirational speaker of Grand Rapids. He passed away full of hope, and his last hours were filled with the ripe fruit of a long and beautiful life that had been spiritual in its true sense. He closed his earthly career like one going to sleep. He leaves a widow, two years his senior, three children and five grandchildren, to mourn his loss.

Sarah A. Root, wife of John G. Balcome, and sister of Mrs. R. N. Willcox, passed to spirit life November 15. The funeral was held at her residence, on the 17th, at 1:30 p. m. Bro. F. D. Dunakin, pastor of the Spiritualist Free Temple, conducted the services.

Deceased has been an active working member of the Avery (Ohio) Free Temple Spiritualist Association, and was respected and esteemed by all who knew her. The funeral was the largest ever held in this vicinity.

She leaves a husband and four children—three sons and a daughter—to mourn; but it is a comfort to them to have the knowledge that they can look upon death in the light of universal order; that it is no fatality, no accident; it is just as necessary as life; that when the time comes, death is a relief from pain and weariness—no enemy, but a most true and tender friend.

Passed to higher realms, in the evening of November 5th, after a long illness and much suffering, the beloved wife of our dear and esteemed friend, Edward K. Earl, and mother of Edna Earl. They have our heartfelt sympathy. MRS. S. E. COOKE.

Harry C. Cowhick, youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. George Cowhick, joined the angel band November 6, 1896, aged 3 months and 1 week. Mrs. S. C. Scovell, pastor of the Spiritual Research Society, conducted the services.

The Southern Cassadaga Camp-Meeting, Lake Helen, Fla.

The Mallorry Steamship Line from Pier 21, East River, New York City, offer the following rates from New York to Lake Helen, Fla., via Brunswick, Jacksonville and East Coast Railroad:

Round trip, single ticket, $41.50.

Round trip, parties of five or more going together, but returning singly, $40.50. From Boston, round trip single ticket, $46.50. Round trip, parties of five or more going together but returning singly, $45.50.

For tickets, staterooms or other information, apply to H. M. Clark, Leominster, Mass., until December 10, or Arthur Sinclair, agent, 306 Washington street, Boston, Mass. C. H. Mallorry & Co., general agents, Pier 21, East River, New York.

The Spiritualists will open their third annual meeting February 14, closing March 31, 1897.

Good accommodations will be furnished at low rates, with facilities for light housekeeping if desired.

A new auditorium is being built, and a club-house and several new cottages are being erected.

This season promises to be a grand success for the camp, and a glorious good time is assured for all who attend. Dr. Brigham, of Fitchburg, Mass., will assist in getting up clubs if desired; address him (with stamp) and get all necessary information. H. M. Clark has decided to accompany a party December 11th; all wishing to join it, address as above.

Married.

Miss Laura Hull, second daughter of Willard J. and Libbie A. Hull, and Mr. Joe Edward, of Chicago, were married at the home of the bride's mother, 1304 Steven's avenue, on November 12, by Rev. E. J. Burdy.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and well repaid by its perusal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds.' By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical bodies and their psychical bodies with universal nature, and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the Spirit-world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

"The Great Roman Anaconda." By Prof. Geo. P. Rudolph, Ph.D., ex-priest of the diocese of Cleveland, O. A sharp and pointed letter to Bishop Horstmann. It is good reading, and should be widely distributed, that people may be enlightened concerning the ways and methods of Rome and its priesthood. Price 15c. For sale at this office.

"Angel Whisperings for the Searcher After Truth." By Hattie J. Ray. A volume of genuine poems, of such fine moral and spiritual tone that all will be pleased and benefited by it. For sale at this office. Price $1

"The Dead Man's Message," an occult romance by Florence Marryat. The author's wide experience in Spiritualism and her study of occult science have prepared her to write this romance, which will be found laden with gems picked up in the course of her investigation and studies. Cloth $1. For sale at this office.

"The Woman's Bible. Part I. The Pentateuch. Comments on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy." The contrast between the thoughts of these brave women and the thoughts of the orthodox world during all time past, is very striking. Keen analysis, ripe scholarship and fearless adherence to the right, characterize this very interesting effort of some of the brightest minds of to-day. For sale at this office. Price 50 cents.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

Mrs. E. M. S.: Q. Has Marie Bashkirtseff, the Russian girl, been heard from since her departure to Spirit-life?

A. I think no communication from her has been reported.

B. R. Todd: Q. What was the Brazen Sea?

A. It was a bronze or copper bowl, resting on twelve oxen, facing Eastward. It stood in the priests' court of Solomon's Temple, and served to hold water for the priests to perform their prescribed ablutions. Commentators are not agreed as to its size, but this has been placed at 11,000 wine gallons. The oxen supporting it were symbols borrowed from the Egyptians, to whom the ox was sacred.

"A Thinker," Fond du Lac, Wis.: Q. Should not church property be taxed, like all other property?

A. This is fast becoming a burning question, and a contention on political party lines. That it has not already become so, is because the vast extent of property within the grasp of the church is not known. The heavy burden imposed on the property that is taxed, by this exemption, is not appreciated, nor is it clearly seen that in this manner every citizen is forced by law to sustain the churches, whether he desires to do so or not. This is plainly opposed to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution.

The census of 1890 makes the value of the churches with the land on which they stand and furnishings, at almost $700,000,000.

The Methodists lead with..	$132,132,304
Catholics	118,342,366
Presbyterians	94,869,697
Baptists	83,834,272
Episcopalians	82,774,618
Congregationalists	43,335,437
Lutherans	36,060,354
Reformed	18,744,242
Disciples	12,206,038
Unitarians	10,335,100
Jews	9,754,275
Universalists	9,060,333
United Brethren	4,937,983
Evangelical Association	4,614,490
Friends	4,541,334

This does not include parsonages, landed estates, convents, monasteries, colleges, orphanages, Episcopal palaces, which the Catholic Church especially hold. This church holds in the name of its bishops vast amounts of property in the heart of nearly every city in the United States. The 1,400 convents, at the lowest estimate of cost, average $10,000 each, or $140,000,000. The valuation of the parochial school buildings and colleges, at a low estimate, will reach $500,000,000. To this must be added real estate owned by the bishops for the church, in every town and city. Wherever a new railroad is projected, wherever there are indications of commercial centers springing up, the ubiquitous priest clutches for his church the most central and valuable locations.

The Catholic churches and schools always stand in the most conspicuous places. The valuation of this property is incalculable, and appreciates rapidly from year to year.

Altogether, the properties directly and indirectly owned by the churches in the United States, must exceed the vast sum of three thousand millions of dollars. The taxes, if levied equitably, as on all other property, would make a most desirable reduction in the burdens the people have to bear. The churches are not recognized as State institutions by the Constitution, yet they are protected and their rights guarded, and they should contribute their just share to the taxes imposed on the wealth of the nation for civil purposes.

Simon Emery: Q. What was the real cause of the French Revolution? Was it on account of disbelief in the Bible, or on account of the worshipers of the Bible? Was the French Revolution anyways comparable with the bloody Crusades and holy wars, and were these not brought about by Bible Christians?

A. Widely different as were their methods, the causes and the culmination of the French Revolution and the Crusades were similar, but in widespread ruin, and in numbers slain the former is not comparable with the latter. The French Revolution has been held as an historical scare-crow in the face of the nations subjugated to the tyranny of church and State, and no words have been strong enough to represent its bloody horrors. Such was the outcome of infidelity—and liberty! Back to your kennels of beliefs in the vicegerency of God's ordained priests, and priestly anointed kings! The revolutionists killed their king, they killed the nobles, they dispossessed the priests! Most shocking was the result of liberty for the people! And yet the honest student of history sees in their uprising the ultimate of centuries of wrong; oppression of the masses until they could bear no longer. Rousseau, Voltaire and their school voiced the thoughts current in the air, thus crystallizing and making them tangible. It was a reaction against the superstitions engendered and sustained by the church on Bible authority. As a flood bursts through the dam which confines its strength, and works wide ruin, so the pent up longings for liberty of thought and action broke through restraint of priest and priestly king, and for a time flowed in a tide of destruction. Only a brief time, and the world advanced with rapid stride, and though the revolution was suppressed, its ideas have remained.

The Crusades were in like manner direct outgrowths of Bible teachings. The foolish doctrine, still inculcated, of the desirability of pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulchre, the sacredness of Jerusalem, the hatred of Christians for the Infidels, these were incitive causes. For two hundred years Europe poured a steady stream of its best blood on Asia, at last to acknowledge in humiliation its defeat. Under the infatuation of religion, led by the best warriors, blessed and commissioned by the Pope, eight successive crusades poured their living floods on the soil of Asia, and the brief holding of an empty sepulchre supposed to be that of the arisen Christ, but without the least evidence, was all that could be claimed for the two hundred years of war and the several millions of slain.

One good result came—the barbarous Christians of Europe became acquainted with the refinement of Greek and Saracenic civilizations, and they were awakened thereby from the intellectual coma, into which they had fallen, and began the advancement which has culminated in the achievements of the present.

MATERIALIZATION.

Thoughts Worthy of Earnest Cogitation.

Writing Up Truths, not Mediums.

To the Editor:—What I have seen, more than what I have heard, leads me to decide by reasoning thereon whether I may accept of the evidence I am led to deduce, in favor of or against the reality of the claims made, as to the truth of that which is represented to me as something I am to accept as a genuine fact. I am not writing to speak the praise of any medium: I am but offering my evidence in behalf of the phenomena called materialization.

My statement of having witnessed this, has called out more than one personal response—from doubters. I have no room to doubt the sincerity of those who claim to have discovered fraud where this phenomena was being represented; that in every instance where a "grabber" has got in his work, he has caught a mortal.

I am not prepared to deny this claim, as I have never been at an "expose" denouement. But I am inclined to accept the statement. However, there is a philosophical explanation for the fact—if it be such; and it is this: The controlling spirit would know—from ability to read thoughts—that a "grabber" was present, but a mortal (confederate) would not know unless a good mind-reader himself.

I am informed by a gentleman (who offers one hundred dollars and expenses to any medium who will accept the offer on conditions) that no medium who knew that a "grabber" was in the room, could (which ought to have been would) call out spirits while said "grabber" was in the seance-room.

I will first state the "conditions" under which the genuineness is to be tested, if any medium honestly earns that $100, and then I shall tell why, in my opinion, it is an offer that may not find any takers, and yet need not stand out as evidence that there are no genuine spirit forms.

I'm afraid there are many Spiritualists who jump at conclusions—as well as the opponents of our Spiritual philosophy. Observers and those who reason closely to a point under discussion, or suspicion, are less apt to brand all because of one, or a dozen, or even a thousand or two deceivers—enemies to truth's advancement.

The conditions are these: Any medium who will produce spirit forms and permit of the "tester" holding to the spirit's hand until the form dematerializes, may take the stakes and also the affidavit and a thousand thanks, etc.

Does the requirement seem simple enough for any honest medium to grant? I know it does to many honest minds. I know it, because it once was the test I thought I would require before I would believe this manifestation was in the power of those who have left the mortal form.

It seemed so simple a request to make of medium or spirit—seemed that it would be unquestionable evidence of dishonesty in any materializing medium who would refuse so small a request. But then I had not sat in the holy of holies; I had never had my angel loved ones come to me in this way. I had not closely observed, or been led to reflect upon the showing of those finer natural laws which result—to us who are favored by dear angel visitors—in the gathering, by chemical processes too subtle for mortal's present ability, or his understanding; of elements that our perception scarce can have any assured belief in their having an existence.

Of late years we have heard something of an aura that surrounds each individual, but how difficult is it, to us, to fully understand this claim, or rather the constituency thereof.

But to return, and show up my reason for having stated my claim for the genuineness of the forms I claim to have seen and heard, and watched dematerialize: It is understood that the larger part of the forces and material are collected from the medium who is the materializing instrument. With these fine forces collected from his organism, if he is not deceptive in his work, how wrong of his guides—of the band of spirits who are bravely making these efforts to establish inter-communication—if they did not do all in their power to guard that instrument which they have evidently worked upon for some months or years, in order to accomplish this great and grand undertaking.

I have had my spirit-friends who came in form—and who told their names and gave other evidence of their identity—I have had them touch my head and face and hands lovingly, at some materializings, and at other times the same spirit had not the forces so under control as to be able to do this, without doing an injury to the medium. But after telling me they could not give me their hand, I have watched them going slowly down, as the elements they were clothed in (in form) went to pieces—returned to the medium and sitters, we are taught.

I am not blind, neither am I easily duped. I am not writing up mediums, but truths. I have lent my labors to the cause of Spiritualism. I feel it to be obligatory, on my part, to use my pen in behalf of the cause that the angel guides have chosen me to represent in their stead, in their efforts to instruct those they love (humanity), and, in some cases, to complete, in this way, their unfinished work.

A materialized form—a dear spirit-friend—said, recently, in his conversation to me: "I had not finished my work, but I desire to do so. If it was not for your dear self, your assistance, I could not do this."

As he was a noble and true man when on earth, and one who loved me truly, and was and is as dearly loved by me, I can affirm that my labor in his behalf—and for truth's sake—is the dearest task I could have appointed unto me.

If I have made plain any point of doubt, in any mind, by my lengthy penning of the hour; this, too, will be to me a precious evening's labor.

Reluctantly I lay down the pen, moved to do so by the knowledge of the over-crowded space in the valuable weekly, The Progressive Thinker, that upholds its name so ably.

THE UNITARIANS.

They Are Somewhat Progressive.

THEY CONSIDER PSYCHICAL SUBJECTS, AND TAKE BROAD AND COMPREHENSIVE VIEWS OF THE SAME.

The ses[illegible]f the annual meeting of the New [illegible]hire Unitarian association at Ke[illegible]ntinued during the afternoon and evening. At 1:30 Rev. George Batchelder of Boston, secretary of the American Unitarian association, gave an address on "The Unitarian outlook," which was followed by an essay by Rev. Frank Pratt of Walpole on "Our message to the modern world." One of the papers of the day which was highly commended by the brethren as an able and scholarly contribution was that by Rev. John C. Mitchell of Wilton on "The psychological basis of immortality." After a careful argument and the massing of a great number of striking facts, the speaker came to the following conclusions:

1. Psychology makes it clear that man in his essential nature is a soul, or a spirit. This teaching is greatly strengthened by considering such strange phenomena as child prodigies, dreams, hypnotism, etc., which reveal the wonderful power and possibility of the human soul.

2. Psychology emphasizes the personality of the soul. Shows that it is a unit, hence, probably imperishable.

3. Through the power of hypnotism it has been proven that a soul in the body can gain control of another soul in the body. Hence, it is possible for a soul out of the body, if there is any such thing, to gain control of a soul in the body.

4. By the power of telepathy it has been shown that a soul in the body can communicate with another soul in the body, even at a great distance. Hence, it is possible for a soul out of the body to communicate with another soul in the body.

5. In clairvoyancy it has been established that the soul can sepafate itself from the body and maintain a distinct existence. Hence, at death the soul can be separated from the body and maintain such an existence.

6. In the instance of supersensitive people, whether natural or induced by hypnotic influence, where the senses are greatly intensified in power, if there are any spirit forms around us and if they are more ethereal than our material bodies, then these supersensitive people would more probably see these spirit forms than those having only ordinary power of sensation. There are many honest, intelligent people who claim to be able to see such forms.

7. Notwithstanding that many of the manifestations of modern Spiritualism are fraudulent and that others can be accounted for on other grounds than claimed, as through mind reading, hypnotism, clairvoyancy, etc., still, the impartial investigator must admit that there remains a large residuum of fact which has never been explained except in harmony with the theory of Spiritualism.

8. There are multitudes of people outside the ranks of Spiritualists who testify that they have had experiences which they cannot account for except through the mediation of spirits. A notable example is that of Miss Abigail Dodge, who was one of the brightest women of our country. She was a strict orthodox in religious faith. A few months before she passed away she was taken dangerously ill and remained at the point of death for a number of days. She recovered from this severe illness; she declares that when in the critical stage she left the body and entered the spirit-world, held converse with spirit friends, saw visions and heard sounds which she could not describe. She wrote a little book entitled "The X-rays" in which she has set forth her experiences.

9. A scientific Spiritualism practically demonstrated would make the Bible an open book. It would explain the miracles of healing, the visions of prophets, the mediation of angels and spirits, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, Paul's exaltation to the third heaven, and the apocalyptic visions.

Psychology furnishes a basis for a future scientific Spiritualism which shall practically demonstrate the immortality of the human soul and establish a means of communication between this world and the world of spirits. Then the grand doctrine of the soul's immortality shall no longer rest upon theory and speculation, but upon established fact.

It was the glory of the eighteenth century to prove that not one atom of matter in this universe can be destroyed; it is the glory of the nineteenth century to have established that no one scintilla of force can be lost—even so trifling as the flutter of a butterfly's wing; it shall be the glory of the twentieth century to demonstrate that no one human soul shall be destroyed, or cast as rubbish in the void when God has made the pile complete.

THE EVENING SESSION.

The evening brought out only a small local attendance owing to the political rally at the city hall, which attracted many people, being the most important local rally of the campaign. The meeting was opened by a praise service followed by a conference meeting and an address by Rev. Charles J. Staples of Manchester on the topic "The need of the present hour," in part as follows:

The speaker, looking back upon the wonderful outgrowth of the human spirit through the devious wanderings of man before he came into possession of himself spiritually, declared that no hour meant so much to humanity as when it dawned upon man that the true object of his worship was no local or national idol, but the God of the whole earth. Jesus said, the hour has come—the hour now is—when we shall worship the Father. Jesus saw into the future and as is often the case, foresight into the future led to a clear insight of the present. That thought furnishes the greatest need of the present hour—to have faith in a present opportunity; to see right here the germ which shall blossom into centuries of creative energy not yet dreamed of.

The man who says he cares not what another may believe is deluded. He does not realize that our beliefs are what we live by. He does not see that here and now is the chance for us all to weave into the present life something in which future generations shall take courage. Each hour has its present needs. It is unlike every other hour. It requires to be studied and understood. Today we have a new heaven and a new earth; yet the same steadfast orb remains which confronted the first man in his simplicity. But howsoever we perceive a newness of heaven and earth, it is still left for the human spirit to conquer all doubts by persistency of faith. In the midst of the new earth we find the human consciousness—the human being—which is yet to be understood and controlled.

The need of the present hour is greater than any other for infusing new life and sacredness into human existence. If you and I can only realize that now is the time for us to begin to so live and think as to make it easier for those about us to live the truest lives, then we have something in the present hour which is a foresight of the future.

The onward or more expressive interest which our forefathers took in the problems of religion is passing away. Indifference and superficiality prevail. Recognizing this we see the reconstruction of religion as a need of the present hour. It must be reinstated and put in a form in which man can feel its force and power. And what we need is a faith so simple and yet so impressive that men shall take new heart in its presence. It is easy to sink into the daily drudgery of life, without faith in a future condition. But this lethargy never stood behind high issues nor moulded high attempts.

And out of the new vision and interpretation of God there must arise the beautiful structure of the ideal and higher life. There must be a faith not of forms, but of the whole energy of man's being—a faith which it is worth while to live in and die in; knowing that with that faith in the grasp of the soul no harm can come to and no terror can affright the household whose members shall remain now and forever in the love unspeakable.

A discussion of the topic of the evening followed, in which several ministers took part, and the conference adjourned after singing numerous hymns, closing with America, and passing a vote of thanks to the Keene society for its hospitality, etc.

AN OBJECT LESSON.

In Which Beautiful Facts Are Illustrated.

Far remote from this puny little world, with punier people, and said people with still punier worries and trouble—away among the myriads of suns in the Milky Way, in the constellation of Hercules, sat three wise men with unspeakable names, but whom we will call Alpha, Beta and Ceta. Alpha was a seer, Beta a philosopher, and Ceta a geometrician. It was the council hour, and while Alpha was reading the destinies of worlds in space, Beta was reasoning upon probabilities and effects of each such world upon each other, their attraction and repulsion towards each other, and their relation to the general whole. Ceta, deep in thoughts and figures, remarked: "According to the truest geometry, a vacuum must be somewhere between Orion and 69 Cygni, or else a sun of some description is wandering silently in that space." After a few minutes more of figuring, he laid his stellar chart to one side, and took up a telo-spectroscope to view the vastness of worlds, with whom he was so familiar; but scarcely had he adjusted the lenses, afocuses and refracting mirrors of the instrument, till he exclaimed: "I find no vacuum there, but a sun which is traveling towards us; and let us examine it while you, Alpha, read its past history and its future destiny; and while you, Beta, find causes and meditate their effects." The angels chanted above around them these encouraging lines:

"While suns are circling in their sweet converse,
They are but specks in a grand Universe;
While each a destiny has—kind Nature's plan,
Let man search out its greatness if he can."

In earnest inquiry these three men were drawn towards this little speck, the sun, and found, although remote and insignificant to the sight, it was within the circle known as the Milky Way or star-belt. As they drew nigher this sun, they beheld that within its orbit there were planets and secondary planets or satellites within its solar system. They saw a cold planet on the outer border, which they called Neptune; a smaller one within, which they called Uranus; and still farther in towards the sun they found a larger planet which they called Saturn; and one of the greater dimension had still an orbit within these, and they called it Jupiter. A tiny planet within these they called Mars, and a scattered smaller group of self-existences they called asteroids. As they drew nigher unto the sun, they saw three other planets, and they called them Earth, Venus, and Mercury, respectively, according to place.

For some unaccountable reason, the minds of these men were irresistibly drawn towards the third outlying planet; and although there were myriads of others far larger, and far grander in every solar system, these men were inquiring into the modus operandi of world-building, and this tiny orb of destiny would serve their purpose as well as any other. Therefore Beta, the philosopher, was the first speaker, and after a short consultation said: "The centrifugal and centripetal forces are here in action, and this planet is held in its orbit by that same law of motion. Whence it came and whither its destiny, our brother the seer may describe. It must be a child in growth, slow but certain. Its component parts, animate and inanimate, upon its surface, must conform itself to its location in the system, to its heat or cold, aridity or moisture, according to the different ages of this planet. Its light is by refraction and reflection, but mainly the former. Whatever its progress is at this present time matters little in our observation, as all worlds pass all stages—from the molecular atom to the cold death of the planet when moisture ceases to be a known element."

Here the speaker stopped, and Ceta, the geometrician, began. "The destiny according to the size of this planet, cannot be as light as of the planets Mercury and Mars, but far lighter than the larger planets in this system. The distance from its central sun must vary greatly by its oblong or elliptic circling around its sun. Its atmosphere must exert a pressure of hundreds of kilogrammes on every inch of surface, and its temperature must vary according to the age of the planet, and also according to its position towards its sun. Its perpendicular in the Universe never varies in its periodical round.

During all this time the others were intently listening while each spoke in his turn. Alpha, the seer, spoke next, and said: "Like an aggregation of Brother Ceta's units, I must employ the word 'atom,' be they of a molecular or seemingly inert nature; nevertheless, an aggregation of atoms formed the nucleus of this as well as of all stellar bodies. I see how the star-dust or atmospheric substances draw together by the united efforts of many agencies, while the most essential of these are the electricity caused by motion, and the component parts of iron in solution in the atmosphere. I see how the particles for countless ages gather material, and how it is bodily enlarged by strata upon strata; how it revolves and becomes circular in conformity with Nature's law, like a drop of water. I see how it wanders as if in search of an orbit around some central sun, while seemingly none cares to own the wanderer. As ages roll on this aggregation becomes larger, and carbonization from within, caused by pressure, commences to form an outer regular shell, while lurid fires within devour its centre. I see how it comes in contact with this stellar orb, the sun, and how the latter adopted it, and held it by attraction, while another balancing agency, centrifugal force, presses it outward, and forever holds it from merging into the central sun, or flying from its orbit to other parts of the solar system, or by disintegration merges into its original element or star-dust. I see how the strata grow in thickness; how flora and fauna spring up; how the undulatory motion of the inner heat disturbs and destroys the symmetry of this child planet. I see as ages roll on, how the radiates, mollusks, articulates and vertebrates spring successively into existence, and how the law of self-preservation makes many of these carnivorous and aggressive. I see how the mountains, through subterraneous action rise and fall, and how new species appear. As the crust is growing cooler, the vertebrates are enlarged, and mammals appear, while the object of Nature is seemingly to develop more perfect heads. I see that the sound or voice in the different organizations are becoming more harmonious, and at times musical, while the sound of early vertebrates was discordant and guttural. I see that all animals are approaching a more erect position,—a gradually arranged progress from the fishes and reptiles to the quadrupeds with upraised heads. I see inharmony, if one would consider it singly, but the grandest of Nature's results if viewed as a whole. I see a specie of the higher animals, who are adopting an erect or perpendicular position, with a constitution that they can exist in all climates upon this planet. I see that the waters which the heated substratum had caused by evaporation, and generated from the zones where the hot and cold air meet, are gradually diminished by the thickening of the planet's crust." Here the seer stopped, when interrupted by Beta, the philosopher, who asked: "What future destiny lies before this tiny planet? Look and see." The seer resumed: "Harmony is Nature's highest law, and the harmonious progress which has thus far ruled the destiny of this planet, will continue, till, like the satellite, the moon, it becomes dry and fruitless; but animate and inanimate beings, together with every flora that lives and breathes, will have passed away long ere then. The inner fires will feed upon its rocks and minerals and every available chemical property contained in its crust, till every physical vestige of the planet is reduced to ashes, to blend with the atmospheric dust again and other tractable mineral substances."

Thus this tiny planet has been formed, served its destiny and object, returned to the elements of which it was formed, and has met its physical death!

Oh! man, look up, and prize not kite and strings
Or baby toys, for they are childish things;
And while on earth, and chained to its sod,
Make not a fickle fortune's dross your God.

ABOUT GHOSTS.

Their Remarkable Visitations to Earth.

AS VIEWED FROM THE STANDPOINT OF THOSE NOT ACQUAINTED WITH THE GRAND TRUTHS OF SPIRITUALISM.

To the Editor:—It is exceedingly interesting to study the phenomena of spirit return from the standpoint of those who are not acquainted with the grand truths of Spiritualism. Household Words has been doing that as set forth in the following:

What is a ghost? This is a question much more easily asked than answered. Perhaps as good a definition as any other is that a ghost is a spirit of a person departed this life, which is permitted or commissioned to revisit this earth—usually upon some special errand, such as the bringing to light of a murder, or some other heinous crime.

Occasionally, however, it would appear to be the unquiet spirit of some departed sinner, who during his mortal life had been guilty of some cruel wrong or great injustice, and who restlessly returns to his former sphere of action in the vain hope of repairing or expiating the evil done in the body.

In former and more superstitious times, the spirits of persons whose bodies had not been safely laid to rest in consecrated ground were supposed to wander restlessly about, and to continue to do so until decent and reverent interment of the remains had been made.

As to the causes which were supposed to lead to ghostly apparitions, sometimes the ostensible reason was that the appearance occurred in fulfillment of a solemn promise made by one friend to another, that if he should first depart this life, he would, if possible, return and show himself to his surviving friend.

Ghosts were popularly supposed as a rule, to make their appearance about midnight, but instances of alleged daylight appearances are not by any means rare.

It used to be seriously averred that no one who had the good fortune to be born on Christmas Day could ever be disturbed by any ghostly visitation in after life.

Ghosts seem, as a general rule, to have appeared habited in the same or similar dress to that which the deceased person had been in the habit of wearing when alive. White garments are, however, occasionally mentioned.

Dragging and clanking of chains and fetters has rarely been characteristic of British ghosts, but has been usual enough among their Continental brethren. It may, perhaps, be argued from this fact that, dead or alive, British spirits "never shall be slaves."

One solitary passage in which a ghost is described as being clothed in a black garment occurs to the writer. In the old ballad of "William and Margaret" occur the words:

And clay-cold was her lily hand,
That held the sable shroud.

Among the lower animals, dogs would seem to possess, in a special degree, the faculty of seeing spirits, and to be possessed with the most abject fear of such appearances.

In olden times, there was an established formula in which it was considered proper for mortals to address ghostly visitants.

It was usual to conjure spirits in the name of the Holy Trinity to reveal their names and the reason of their appearance, and when necessary, to repeat this adjuration thrice.

When this was solemnly and reverently done, the ghost, as a rule, replied in a forced and hollow voice, and instantly vanished forever from mortal ken.

Occasionally, although rarely, a ghost would condescend to converse upon the affairs of this life, as in the instance given by Glanvil of the apparition of the deceased Maj. George Sydenham to Capt. William Dyke.

In this case the ghost reproved the Captain for allowing a sword, formerly the property of the dead man, to become rusty.

"Captain, Captain," cried his truculent ghost, "this sword did not use to be kept in this manner when it was mine!"

Ghosts have never, so far as the writer is aware, seemed to be particularly alert in the transaction of whatever business may have brought them back for a time to the world of mortal men.

Thus it seems remarkable that the ghosts of persons who met their death by murder have in no single recorded instance carried the story of their wrongs to any one in authority who would have had the right or power to redress or avenge them.

It has always been believed and averred that to whomsoever the unearthly visitant might show himself it was by no means safe to treat the appearance with contempt, or fail to carry out its behests. In certain cases where such indifference has been shown, the ghost so slighted has appeared again and again in a threatening mood. When such means have still failed to secure proper attention to their behests ghosts are even said to have shown their high displeasure by resorting to violence.

On some occasions, although rarely, ghosts are said to have shown themselves without having, or at least without expressing, any very definite object, or fulfilling any purpose except that of disturbing, annoying or terrifying a household. In cases where ghostly malice was thus shown, it was usual to call into requisition the services of one or more priests or ministers of the Gospel to "lay" the undesirable visitor.

The ceremony of "laying" the ghost was invariably performed in the Latin tongue, which was popularly supposed to strike terror into the heart of even the stoutest and most truculent ghost. The laying of a ghost was not expected to continue effectual for a longer period than 100 years, but the words used always expressly named the place to which the spirit was to retire, and occasionally very curious places indeed were indicated by the exorcist. Thus, the solid heart of an oak, the pommel of a sword, the interior of a cask of ale or of a hogshead of wine, have all been the spots chosen for this uncanny purpose, and in cases of specially troublesome and persistent ghosts the Red Sea was usually named as the place of their banishment and confinement. This locality was held in great dread by the whole ghostly fraternity, so much so that apparitions have been known to beg the exorcist in most urgent and moving terms to name some other spot as their place of retreat. And no ghost condemned to banishment there has ever been known to return to its former haunts.

A truly remarkable and not at all usual form of apparition is that in which the likeness or double of any individual has appeared to the very person in question. In "Aubery's Miscellanies" is narrated the story of the strange experience of Sir Robert Napier, a formerly famous physician of London. While upon a journey from Bedford to pay a visit to a friend in Berkshire, Sir Robert was startled by seeing at an inn where he was to pass the night an apparition of himself stretched out, and to all appearance dead. Sir Robert continued his journey on the following day, having previously told the people of the house his strange experience, and shortly after leaving the inn in question Sir Robert died very suddenly in his traveling carriage.

Lady Diana Rich, daughter of Lord Holland, who saw a vision of herself in a garden in Kensington, confidently predicted her early death, and she actually did die within a month of the day on which she saw her "double."

Various and curious local names have been applied to ghosts and apparitions. Thus in Cumberland they are generally spoken of as "swarths," in Scotland as "wraiths," and in Ireland as "fetches." The meaning of the Irish name is sufficiently obvious, pointing very plainly to the "fetching" or summoning to another world of the person who sees the apparition.

The following account of the cure of a sick person in Holland by supernatural agency may close this very slight sketch of a large and interesting subject.

On the 13th of October, 1696, a certain Dutch woman named Pesch Claes, while in bed between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning, was thrice pulled by the arm as if by some invisible agency. Naturally greatly startled, the woman, who had long been a confirmed invalid cried aloud: "Oh, Lord, what may this be!" Thereupon a sweet and gentle voice replied: "Be not afraid; your malady shall depart." Then suddenly the sick room became flooded with a soft yellow radiance, and a beautiful youth clad in white apparel stood by the bedside, looked for some moments upon the invalid, and then gradually faded from view. Next day the poor invalid had painfully dragged herself from her bed to the fire, and was endeavoring to cook some food, when she felt her strength and power of limb return, and ran towards the house door. Her husband, who was just entering, met her there, and in great amazement exclaimed: "Surely this is not my wife!" To which the woman replied with the happy cry: "The Almighty God himself hath made me walk again!"

The incidents herein narrated are certainly confirmatory of the grand truths of Spiritualism. They illustrate the power of spirits to return, and show that they have ever been on the alert to communicate with mortals. L.

"History of the Inquisition." Every citizen of our country should read this concise history of that Romish churchly institution known as the Inquisition. The animus of Romanism against all institutions, beliefs and parties not in conformity with the ruling powers of the Romish hierarchy is plainly shown in these statements of veritable history. The devilishness and murderous malignity of the "Holy Inquisition" is scarcely paralleled in all the world's records of inhuman atrocities. It is for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid for 25c.

"The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional." This book, by the well-known Father Chiniquy, reveals the degrading, impure influences and results of of the Romish confessional, as proved by the sad experience of many wrecked lives. Price, by mail, $1. For sale at this office.

"Voltaire's Romances," translated from the French. With numerous illustrations. These lighter works of the brilliant Frenchman, and invincible enemy of the Catholic Church are worthy of wide reading. THAT JUBILEE

W. H. Bach Makes Some Suggestions.

Editor Progressive Thinker:—In last weeks Progreeive Thinker you published lished President Barrett's report to the National Convention and made an especial notice concerning the "Semi-Centennial Jubilee" at Rochester, N. Y., which matter also received considerable attention at the convention.

It seems to me as though this was the Spiritualists' "Golden opportunity." We have been before the public for nearly fifty years and never have we made a determined effort to place the records of our work before the people in a manner that would show what we had done and what our different lines of phenomena were.

The camp meetings have filled their places: The meetings have done the best they could under the circumstances; circles and private sittings have opened the way for many, but the greater portion of the people of the United States are densely ignorant of the strides Spiritualism has made during the last half century.

True, we are still, to a great extent, disorganized. We are too much individualized, but this need not stop us from having an effort made to open to the world a grand convention of Spiritualists that will show our work as it is.

To me, the greatest difficulty is that the people do not realize the importance of the event. Unless it can be made a phenomenal success, we had better let it alone. To do so requires an immense amount of work and the time is growing short for it.

Speaking on this matter a Spiritualist said to me: "Why, there is no hurry. We have got seventeen months to do it in. That is time for anything." True, if you are only going to make a local affair of it; but not true if it is to be anything like what it should be for a semi-centennial jubilee.

It requires three months to communicate with India. If we begin at once, six communications can pass between us before the time for the convention to meet if no time is spent in investigations. Two weeks will be required to get a round trip communication between here and England, our nearest neighbor who will be interested in our movement.

Thus is will be readily seen that the time is limited for the work, if we begin at once.

In my humble estimation we should make this a grand exposition of our system. All classes of phenomena should be represented. Slates with messages upon them, spirit paintings on slates, canvas and porcelain should be procured; paraffine casts of materialized hands should be secured and all should be arranged in proper order with a statement of their method of production placed near them so that all can learn the conditions under which they are produced, and wherever possible they should be produced under the strictest of test conditions with sworn statements of such production. In fact, every phenomenon known to Spiritualism should be exhibited with a note of explanation attached to it, while the best mediumship of the world should be presented to those who wish to attend.

A very important, as well as most interesting part of the convention, would be a picture gallery, consisting of pictures of the leading workers in the Spiritualistic ranks, from the "knockings" to the time of the convention.

Every nation should be invited to participate with us in making it a grand exposition of the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism and with a proper management and arrangement, we can do more than anyone realizes at the present.

Railroads must be seen and arrangements made for rates. These matters are not arranged in a day, week or month. Meeting after meeting passed before the railroads settled the question of rates for so important a matter as the World's Fair at Chicago. Money must be raised, and no small sum either, to defray the expenses of the meeting, and when we begin to count the labor to be performed, I wonder if people can be found who will be willing to sacrifice everything, forget themselves and their own comfort and live for the next sixteen or seventeen months with the one idea that this convention must be a success. We must enthuse over it. Every State and every society, yes, every Spiritualist and "investigator" must be ready to work in it.

The question of location is most important. True, from historical points, Rochester, N. Y., is the place for it to convene. But we must see to other things. What will the people of Rochester do for us if we go there? What will the railroads do for us? If they will not do the right thing, there are other cities that will. Boston, with its thousands of Spiritualists and seventeen meetings advertised; Chicago, with its twenty-three meetings; Minneapolis and St. Paul, with their thousands interested; St. Louis and Kansas City, that occupy a position midway between the East and the West. If Rochester will not do what it should for the convention, other cities should be considered.

We are informed that several cities are desirous of securing this meeting, and the Boards of Trade have made propositions for it. There is no question that either Boston or Chicago would furnish all that the committee could desire, while the railroads centering there would doubtless give a rate of one fare for the round trip.

Up to the present time we have made no determined effort at an exposition of our ideas. Now is our opportunity. But let us go at it with a will. Let us be satisfied with the best, but not with anything less. There are enough wealthy Spiritualists to assist in putting it on a good financial basis and the city in which it is held should give not less than ten thousand dollars in cash and furnish a suitable auditorium in which to hold the sessions of the meeting.

These are simply my ideas on this celebration. It will require in the vicinity of $25,000 to carry them out. Can we not find it and show the world that Spiritualists are alive? I believe we can. But to do so, we must be up and doing. There must be no rest. The thing must boom from now until the thirty-first day of March, 1898.

GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE . .

CURES CONSTIPATION!

And Many Liver and Kidney Troubles. It is a Most Pleasant Drink.

Among thousands of testimonials we receive, the following from W. H. Morse, Therapeutist and Consulting Chemist, of Garwood, N. J., speaks for itself:

"Let me commend to your notice the GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE, manufactured at Ayer, Mass., by the company of that name. It is not only a grateful, refreshing and stimulating beverage, relished by all, but, as well it is mildly laxative, health-promoting and thoroughly scientific in composition; in these essentials altogether unlike any other beverage for this purpose. It is well worthy of being brought before the public. W. H. MORSE."

A small package will be sent to any address for 35 cents, and a larger package containing twice as much, for 50 cents. This package will go as far as four pounds of coffee. All can drink this coffee that pure coffee will not agree with, and it DOES cure constipation. State rights for sale to manufacture and sell this coffee. A great money-maker!

SAVAGE ASSISTING COLLYER.

Boston's Eminent Divine Goes to New York.

DR. EDWARD EVERETT HALE ROASTS THE ORTHODOX RELIGIOUS SECTS.

New York, Nov. 30.—Altogether it was a notable service that of the historic Unitarian Church of the Messiah, Thirty-fourth street and Park avenue, held November 22. First of all, the Rev. Minot J. Savage, D.D., pastor for twenty-one years of the Unity Church, Boston, was installed as an assistant to take the burden off the shoulders of the venerable Dr. Robert Collyer in the presence of a congregation that filled the church to overflowing.

And Boston's famous preacher-author, the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, took occasion in the sermon of the evening to broil his brethren of other Christian denominations on the hot coals of his irony.

For some years Dr. Collyer has felt his age—he is 72—a bar to further continuing the work of his prosperous church. Time and again he has offered his resignation to the trustees, only to be begged to stay. This year, however, Dr. Collyer proposed to compromise, and the trustees accepted it.

It was that he should select an assistant, who in reality would be the guider of the church work, while he remained on as pastor emeritus. Dr. Collyer selected Dr. Savage, known as one of the most aggressive, up-to-date Unitarians in all New England. In honor of his advent all the ministers of this faith in this neighborhood were present.

Hardly had the Rev. Dr. Hale read his text, which was, "The common people heard him gladly," before he sailed into the religion of the other great Christian bodies without gloves.

"It is more than seventy years ago," said he, "that the first Unitarian doctrine was heard in New York City. It was very bold, said people. It was regarded as rank New England heresy. Not so; it was the outgrowth of our political freedom.

"The Christianity now preached in three out of four pulpits in this city eighty years ago would have been heresy. The great religious corporations know their doom is sealed. What chance has a young preacher in New York's churches to-day? Penances, named and unnamed, are in store for him if he says, 'Thus God saith!' I realize that if he is three score and ten and has a stronghold he may found an independent church. But what can he do if he is a young St. Paul?

"Fifteen years ago the most learned men of England and America revised the old Bible. How was this great work received by the great religious corporations? Did they melt down the old stereotype plates that preserved the errors of the Dark Ages? What did the great Bible Society do? It pointed out that the charter forbade the new Bible. They are printing the old Bible to-day; they'll print it to-morrow.

"The Church of Rome, the Church of England, the Presbyterian Church, the Mormon Church—they're all the same. Despising the things that are before, they worship the things behind. Our Presbyterian brethren, with prestige, wealth and dignity, clamp the dogmas of the Dark Ages over the mouths of men taught by Darwin, Le Compte and Emerson. Our Baptist brethren are so afraid that they won't permit convocations or conferences. Our Methodist friends have to do away with creed; theirs is a religion of love.

"We and our friends, the Universalists, are one in preaching the truth. The kingdom of God is at hand."

DEAR ONE'S GONE.

Friends I once loved in days of old,
Hands I once clasped, now still and cold,
Forms I have pressed, have passed away,
All that remains is their body of clay.

Soaring away to the unseen shore,
They are with us still as in days of yore;
Fleeting away to the spirit land,
Sweetly mingling with the angel band.

Dear are the memories still in our home,
Though they have left us, we are not alone;
On to the realms of beautiful day,
Softly Death's Angel bore them away.

Ah! I remember well, when death drew nigh,
Softly and sadly we whispered good-by;
Over that stream that seemed darker than night,
Silent we watched them fading from sight.

Yonder the pilot, stern and pale,
Stood by a boat with a snow-white sail,
Waiting to bear them over the foam;
Gone are the dear ones to their angel home.

Soon will the shadows of earth life be passed,
And sorrow and partings be over at last;
Soon we will meet them in yonder fair land:
Soon we will walk with them hand-in-hand.

CHAS. E. WATKINS, M. D. . . .

THE FAMOUS SPECIALIST

Who is so successful in treating Chronic Diseases, devotes his whole time to his practice. This is one reason for his great success.

ANOTHER REASON is that he does not try to run down other doctors.

ANOTHER REASON is he is acknowledged by all to have the most wonderful psychic powers by which he can locate the cause of disease.

ANOTHER REASON is that he has his patients write him each week, and he sends them weekly instructions, thus showing that he watches each case closely.

ANOTHER REASON is he gives only the purest medicines and in the smallest doses that will produce the desired result. Some cases are cured without any medicine.

ANOTHER REASON is he makes the price of treatment right to all.

A Few Letters Showing Dr. Watkins' Great Skill in Curing Disease.

C. E. Watkins, M. D.—Dear Sir:—You have helped Miss Jamison very much, and I am well repaid for securing health for her for what I have paid you.
Yours respectfully,
J. C. MORROW.
Washington, Pa., Nov. 17, 1896.

C. E. Watkins, M. D.—Dear Doctor—I feel so grateful to you for what your medicine has done for me. The discharge is completely gone after two years trying to cure. (This after one month of Dr. Watkins' treatment.) Thanking you very much for what you have done for me, I am,
Sincerely yours,
MRS. LOTTIE SHAUT.
Chicago, Ill., 234 Hampden Court, Nov. 17, 1896.

Dr. C. E. Watkins—As the humor on my face is well, and I feel so much better than I did before I commenced to take your medicine, I don't think I care to keep on another month. Thanking you ever so much for what you have done for me, and the low price for which you took my case, I remain,
Yours respectfully,
F. H. HARRIMAN.
Georgetown, Mass., Sept. 14, 1896.

Dear Doctor—I will do all in my power for you by telling all the people I meet what you are doing for me. I cannot find words to express my gratitude to you for what you are doing for me. The tumor grows smaller all the time.
MRS. MARY HOLMAN.
Winstead, Conn., Nov. 4, 1896.

[This case is one that I diagnosed very near two years ago, but as my price was too high, she placed herself under the treatment of another doctor. After months of treatment she grew worse, when she came back to me for treatment. I could hardly promise a cure, but said I would do my best. I am much pleased to be able to say that there is no question now of a rapid cure. —Dr. C. E. W.]

Dear Friend—I thought you might be pleased to know that I am feeling as well as ever, and that it will be a year the last of this month since you cured me of those dreadful headaches, etc. God bless Dr. Watkins.
SUSAN E. HULL.
Dennis, Mass., Sept. 11, 1896.

These are only a few of 1,110 cures since November 19, 1895. Dr. Watkins' books and record of patients cured and not cured proves this statement to be a fact. There is no question that these doctors who are honestly gifted with psychic powers are the ones that make the cures. The other day Dr. Watkins gave positive proof of this power. He met Dr. Parsons and Dr. Shattuck, the famous consulting physicians of Boston, and without examination with instruments, told every organ that was diseased. Then Dr. Shattuck and Dr. Parsons made their examination, and their diagnosis, made with the aid of scientific instruments, agreed with Dr. Watkins' diagnosis perfectly. Dr. Watkins is constantly asked to go here and there to consult with this and that doctor over some difficult case. How do their prices agree with Dr. Watkins' price? Dr. Watkins seldom gets $20 per month—more often $5; Dr. Shattuck's price for that one consultation was $50—$10 an hour. Family doctors usually get $2—never less than $1 a visit, and their visits are usually quite often. We believe that in the future none but those having psychic powers of diagnosing will be allowed to practice medicine. How can the ordinary M. D. cure when he doesn't know what ails the patient?

The Watseka Wonder and Other Wonders.

Every well-informed Spiritualist, Liberalist and Freethinker has read of the Illinois "Watseka Wonder," called by some a case of "double consciousness"—when Mary, the spirit daughter of A. B. Roff (a lawyer by profession), entered the body of Miss Vennum (a neighbor), residing in and controlling this body over ten months—the real owner, the meantime, being in the spirit-world. The proofs of this psychic fact, this marvelous phenomenon, are irrefutable and ungainsayable. And no family in Watseka to-day is more highly esteemed than the Roffs.

Under date of October 20, Mr. Roff thus writes Dr. Peebles: "I was taken with the shingles, which was followed by a kidney complaint, and later the rheumatism of shoulders, hips and limbs. The remedies of different doctors did me little or no good. At length I could not get up stairs nor down, and I continued getting worse until November, when it became certain that I must soon get help, or die. Life with such pains was a burden. My neighbor, Mr. H. Garner, a justice of the peace, across the street, and others said: 'Well, that's about the last of friend Roff;' and my family had no hopes of my recovery. I then wrote Dr. Peebles for a diagnosis of my case. It was entirely and wonderfully correct, and I at once commenced taking his medicines, and kept on until this October 10th, when I discharged the good doctor, cured—cured! I can now walk as well as I ever could, with no stiff joints. And while my family and neighbors are happily surprised, I am so thankful, so very thankful. Dr. Peebles has never asked, nor even hinted that he wanted any testimonial from me; but in duty to my conscience and for the good of humanity I felt that I ought to give it to him, that others seeing the published account of this cure might apply and be helped, or cured by him as I have been. ASA B. ROFF.
"Watseka, Ill., Oct. 20, 1896.

Now, Doctor, I want you to treat and cure my husband, as you did wonders in my son's case last winter. His health is the best it has ever been. You have the thanks of a grateful mother; have saved and made a true friend of my boy.
MRS. MARY G. MILLER.
Anacortes, Wash., Sept. 14, 1896.

I've had the best season with my hay fever that I've ever had, and I more than thank you for it. Your medical assistance came in the right time. May you long live to thus bless humanity.
REV. WILLIAM BRUNTON.
Castine, Maine.

God bless you, Doctor, and bless the day also that I placed myself in your charge. A few months ago it was thought by all who knew me that my critical and hopeless condition would soon carry me to that world where there's no physical suffering. But what a change! Your medicines have done more for me than I could ever have expected. You have given me a new lease of life, and I wish my name and testimonial to go to the world, that others may receive the benefits of your treatment. If any want further particulars of my case, I shall be glad to answer their letters. I feel deeply the debt of gratitude I owe you, doctor, and I say again, God and his good angels bless you. MRS. MARY E. JAQUE.
11 Abingdon Square, New York City.

James G. Clark, who has a national reputation as poet, singer and writer, says that "Dr. Peebles' catarrhal inhalations, gargles and general treatment have done wonders for him; his voice is now at its best." He cannot speak too highly of this catarrh remedy, and recommends it everywhere. Dr. Peebles allows no case of catarrh coming into his hands to go from him uncured; and this is all-important, because catarrh, as every physician knows, tends toward and precedes consumption.

The gift of healing possessed by Dr. Peebles is truly startling. He is now treating Prof. J. R. Buchanan psychically.

Thomas G. Newman, editor of the Philosophical Journal, says: "We have seen and inspected letters to Doctor Peebles, from which the following extracts are taken:

"'I had suffered great pains a long time from a prolonged sickness; but when I was sitting Thursday evening for your psychic treatment, the pains all left me at once, and I was instantly cured. Although there is some little soreness, I've had no pain since.

DR. A. B. DOBSON'S

Healing powers are being repeated over and over again through the mediumship of MRS. DR. DOBSON-BARKER, who, for the past year and a half has

of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.
With affectionate regards, very truly,
REBECCA LEVY.
8331 Laclede ave., St. Louis Mo.

The doctor has hundreds of testimonials like the above, and while some are cured instantaneously almost, by psychic force, the majority of the Doctor's patients require medicines—magnetized medicines. Medical and hygienic literature is sent free by the Doctor. This literature tells people how to get well and how to keep well. Diagnoses are free by enclosing name, age, sex, leading symptom and stamp for reply. Address Drs. Peebles & Burroughs, Indianapolis, Ind. P. O. Box 117.

A Good Offer.

If you are sick and have failed to find relief, send your name and address to Dr. J. R. Craig, 1346 Market street, San Francisco, Cal., and he will send you a correct diagnosis. Stamps for reply. 370

Dr. E. J. Worst,

of Ashland, Ohio, will mail any reader of The Progressive Thinker one of his new Aerial Catarrh Inhalers with medicine enough for one year free. He will allow you three days as a trial, then if perfectly satisfied, send him $1; if not, return it to him in the original package. Catarrh, asthma, colds in the head, bronchitis and tuberculosis immediately relieved and speedily cured. Don't pay big prices for worthless inhalers. Address above. 376

DEMONS! DEMONS!

And the Part They Played in a Duel.

The Cincinnati Enquirer contains the following:

Mr. George related several additional incidents, some of which may be referred to at another time. An interesting story was told by a Cincinnati business man, who deprecates notoriety in this connection.

"I was born in the South," said he, "and raised in accord with Southern notions. When about 16 I had a friend named Willis Garrison, a boy belonging to our neighborhood, of the same age and tastes with myself. For two years we were inseparable, hunting, fishing, nutting, eating and sleeping together, and imitating each other in everything. Then, almost simultaneously, we fell in love with the same girl, and, between our own hearts the bond of friendship suddenly snapped—identity of taste refused to work well when applied to a single member of the opposite sex.

"I tried to bribe Garrison to forego his claims to Fannie Watson's regard, but he would not entertain such a proposition. Then each assured the other that he was the favored one, and would come out of the contest triumphantly. This was mere bluff on both sides. The girl was only 15, and could have had no idea of the comico-tragico notions she had raised in our heads. One day Garrison remarked that blood must be shed to settle the dispute, and I agreed with him. We arranged to fight with pistols, and without seconds, and pitched upon an old, disused tobacco barn as our theater of valor. A couple of old-style horse-pistols were the only weapons we could command that were equally matched, and with these we went to the barn and arranged details. We chose a room for the meeting on the second floor of the building. It had two doors opening out into the drying room, and was lighted by half a dozen small windows.

"We tossed up for choice of positions and Garrison won. Then for who should give the word, and it came to me. It was a dark, cloudy, depressing day, and both felt its influence, but both professed to feel overjoyed at the prospect of blood. Garrison took his position in one corner of the room and I selected the corner diagonally across from him, making the distance all the place would permit—probably a dozen paces.

"'We will fire simultaneously when I give the word after counting one, two, three,' said I. Then I counted and gave the command, at the same time pulling the trigger of my weapon. Garrison was equally prompt. Both caps exploded and that was all. Just as we lowered our arms one of the doors of the room was pushed partly open and a hideous head thrust in. A hollow voice issued from its mouth like the echo from a cavern.

"'Too bad! Too bad!' it exclaimed. 'When one fellow wants to shoot another he ought to have all the encouragement he can get. Ha! ha! ha!' It scowled and exhibited teeth like tusks. 'Give me the pistols and I'll kill you both,' it hissed.

"Garrison and I made a break for the other door with all possible speed. It was locked firmly, although fifteen minutes before we had come through it. Looking around we saw that the demon who had disturbed us was entering the room, followed by another equally as hideous, and at once they possessed themselves of the pistols we had thrown down. They took the same positions we had occupied only a minute before, and, without waiting for any ceremony, fired upon each other with those capless weapons. There was a loud explosion and both fell to the floor. The door we had tried to leave the room by then flew open and in trooped a horde of shapes so withered and so wild in their attire and with such skinny lips drawn over their teeth, and eyes unspeculative, that we were overcome by the accumulative horror and unable to move. Hoarse voices made discord unlike human sounds, and there were shrill yelps from those throats like Stygian dogs in chorus. Both of us swooned. More than an hour later, just as night was about to envelop the earth, I felt a dash of cold water in my face and heard Garrison's voice begging me to wake up. I sat up and looked at him; asked if he was hurt, and when he answered in the negative I thanked God. "'We have had an awful lesson, Tom,' said he.

"'Yes,' I assented. 'Have all the devils gone?'

"'All but us. They may be waiting in the next room, though. Let's go home.'

"We gathered up our weapons and left the barn as rapidly as possible, without further hindrance. On the way home we again swore eternal friendship for each other and mutually agreed to relinquish all pretensions to the love of Fannie Watson. That young lady did not suffer from our desertion, for some three years later she captured a Nashville merchant and made him a model wife. If there is any moral in this story you can extract it as readily as I, but I will say that it is only one of a long series of ghostly incidents which have come to me in the past twenty years, and when opportunity presents more of them may be related." T. P.

ETERNAL TRUTH.

There Will Always Be New Fields to Explore.

To the Editor:—Yes, you are battling against error and I appreciate, as I am able from present position in the University of Thought, your untiring efforts to throw the light of the living truth over the shadowed minds of earth, and, as well, I am glad to be able to offer my mite of strength to aid the exhausting energies of those aiding you in the promulgation of a common-sense edict of natural salvation to all mankind.

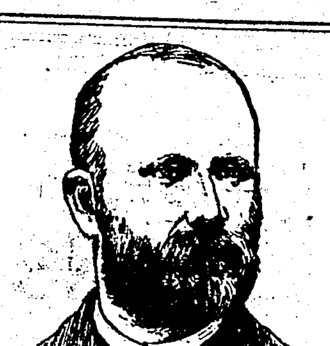
The echo of an infinite and ever-inspiring impulse is resounding in the spiritual avenues of the incipient soul, offering up, maybe, many vague theories to the eternal throne of grace, only to be badly slaughtered by the just criticisms of advance thought as to what is the truth, and where to find it?

These ever-recurring questions may be fully answered only by the slow experience and the gradual evolution of each individual soul, separate and apart from the great floodtide of crude definitions offered by the ruling(?) masses.

"Truth is eternal and shall prevail" and the "Truth will make us free"(?) If, then, truth is infinite verity, shall not all of us, as a part of the great over-soul, have to experience the infinite ultimate of all eternal problems—of all time and space in unending worlds?

If eternal progression is a self-evident and accepted fact (among Spiritualists), it argues the unending continuance of an all-inspiring energy towards greater and grander fields of knowledge, and pre-supposing this inevitable need to be always existent in any realm or condition which the mind can conceive, man nor archangel can ever hope to find or experience, in but small degree, the infinite ultimate of the great unknowable! Therefore, argument may be but a weak, senseless hireling in delving in this great field of thought, and well may all ask: "Where shall we find," and "What is the truth in the infinite sense?"

In a sense, all minds, of whatever stage of development, are primitive—belonging to a primary class, as compared to the all-pervading, or infinite mind. Thus we cannot solve the deep problems of ultimate infinity, else I am impressed that the great moving power of immortal life would be lost to us, (that is, our existent energies for greater knowledge), and thus we become slaves, babes in wisdom, groping in partial, if not total darkness—making endless blunders and frightfully dead to all deep, spiritual issues and the vital principles of the living ego within us.



Truth delves deep and silently, while Error keeps to the surface and howls!

In all ages different individuals (man-made gods), have presumed to trace the great fountain of light, truth and wisdom to its very source and highest pinnacle eternal; but does not all mankind finally awake to the simple, but humiliating fact that there are still grander and greater gems of knowledge—infinite issues to solve beyond any and all points of material, or even spiritual vision which may ever be in their power to obtain?

Long may the flag of Truth wave, and The Progressive Thinker be its staff. BURR CHAAPEL.

NEW BOOKS.

Whittier: Prophet, Seer and Man. With portrait. By B. O. Flower. The Arena Publishing Co., Boston, Mass. Cloth, $1.

In this fine volume Mr. B. O. Flower, the editor of that foremost and radical review, The Arena, treats with tender and appreciative effect the life, character and literary work of one of our greatest American poets. Whittier is brought before us as: A barefoot boy who was also a dreamer; a prophet of freedom; a modern apostle of lofty spirituality, and a man.

The pure, lofty, noble and spiritual traits of Whittier are set before us in a captivating literary style, that charms the reader and tends to the cultivation of the same excellences within the heart. The tone and tendency of the book is commendable in every way.

"Principles of Light and Color." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL.D. A truly great work of a master mind, and one whom Spiritualists should delight to honor. The result of years of deep thought and patient research into Nature's finer forces are here garnered and made amenable to the well-being of humanity. Medical men especially and scientists, general readers and students of occult forces will find instruction of great value and interest. A large, four-pound book, strongly bound, and containing beautiful illustrative plates. For sale at this office. Price, postpaid, $5. It is a wonderful work and you will be delighted with it.

"Social Upbuilding, Including Co-operative Systems and the Happiness and Ennoblement of Humanity." By E. D. Babbitt, LL. D., M. D. This comprises the last part of Human Culture and Cure. Paper cover, 15c. For sale at this office.

"Talleyrand's Letter to the Pope" will be found especially interesting to all who would desire to make a study of Romanism and the Bible. The historic facts he states, and his keen, scathing review of Romish ideas and practices should be read by all. Sold at this office. Price 25 cents.

"Mahomet, the Illustrious." By Godfrey Higgins, Esq. (Library of Liberal Classics.) No author was better qualified to write an impartial and honest life of Mahomet than Godfrey Higgins, and this volume is intensely interesting. It should be read in conjunction with Gibbon's work. For sale at this office. Price, 25 cents.

A LIBERAL CHURCH MEMBER AT WORK.

BANISHES ILLS.

And Makes No Charges Therefor.

Singular Powers Attributed to a Young Alabama Widow.

CHICAGO INVALIDS MADE WELL BY THE LAYING ON OF HER HANDS—WHAT THE HEALER SAYS CONCERNING THE SOURCE OF HER SEEMING SUCCESS.

"Am I not orthodox? Have I done anything to put me beyond the pale of the church? Is not the body the temple of the Lord? You grant that, I can see. Am I not justified, therefore, in healing the sick if the power lies within me?" says Mrs. Comer in Chicago Chronicle.

A young woman with something more than subdued fire in her eye stood within the portals of the Church club in the Masonic Temple and asked these questions rapidly and vigorously of the Episcopal clergy and laity who were there gathered. It would have taken a spirit like unto that which inspired the Inquisition to have told the questioner that she was a heretic. She was a little woman, young, with the soft speech of the south, and with eyes and hair like the pine cones in her native State, while her cheek was like the petal of a flushed rose.

Mrs. Luverna Comer is probably the only member of the Episcopal church living who is unorthodox enough, according to the conservative tenets of that body, to attempt to heal the sick, the lame and the blind by the laying on of her hands. The good churchmen who gathered in the clubrooms in the Masonic Temple stood a little aghast when this pretty woman suddenly stood before them and vehemently demanded that they pass judgment on her standing in the church. They were not gathered as a trial tribunal, and they told her unanimously that they thought she was all right. She seemed satisfied with the decision and passed on upstairs a flight, where she took up her work once more among a heterogeneous gathering of Christian-Scientists, truth seekers, theosophists and people representing all the known orthodox schools of the Christian world.

Unlike so many of the alleged faith healers and Christian scientists who claim the power of removing disease by faith alone, Mrs. Comer does not assert her power for private gain. She attends all who go to her without compensation of any kind. She says that she knows not whence the power comes, but that it is hers for the sole purpose of doing good and that money will not compensate her for its exercise. She works absolutely without remuneration.

ONE ALLEGED CURE.

One not being able to doubt the evidence of his senses it must be admitted that Mrs. Comer has done some startling things in that little room in the Masonic Temple. W. D. Avery, living at 487 State street, hobbled into the elevator on crutches one day last week. He had been a victim of rheumatism for years. The disease had been succeeded by almost complete paralysis of the legs. He was not a believer and made no pretense whatsoever of any innate love for religion. He was so weak when he reached the floor upon which Mrs. Comer was holding meetings that he had to be supported to her presence by two people. He talked to her for five minutes and left his crutches alongside the organ, walked out of the room and to his home. He has had no return of his paralysis since.

"I don't know how she did it," said Mr. Avery. "She touched me on the shoulder, told me to drop my crutches and to walk. I was afraid, but I made a 'brace,' as it were, and I walked, and have been walking most of my time ever since, for the experience was a novel one to me, and I would rather walk than sleep or eat."

MRS. COMER'S MISSION.

Mrs. Comer left Chicago yesterday, and is going about the country for a while trying to get 100,000 people to pledge themselves to go to Washington next year to attend a gathering which she calls an "anti-ism" congress. She has a dream that some day there will be no dividing line between churches. Although she is a staunch Episcopalian so she says, she doesn't care about having the new church founded on the lines of apostolic succession. All she wants to do, she declares, is to get them together, to acknowledge the Lord Jesus Christ and to think of nothing else. Mrs. Comer says that her healing power ought to give her some claim on the consideration of the people.

She has been out of Chicago barely thirty-six hours, and one of her last works before she left was to talk to a little child named Eleanor Lasser. Eleanor had an affection of the eyes which Chicago oculists had declared incurable. There were external evidences of the disease, which made its presence apparent to the casual observer. These passed away within ten minutes of the time that Mrs. Comer placed her hand upon the child's head. The child felt the change and instantly exclaimed: "I see you all."

Martin Moe of No. 558 Humboldt street, Chicago, had worn glasses for years and was getting blind rapidly. He went to Mrs. Comer within the week and she, in the presence of at least 100 people, put her hands on his head, said a word or two and Moe received back his sight. He said afterward:

"My eyes are now as strong as when God made them."

THIS WAS A PUZZLE.

MajorieSummers, a child 14 years of age, was in the last stages of consumption and her mother was told by the attending physicians that the child must die. She was taken to Mrs. Comer, being carried to the woman's presence in the arms of an attendant. She walked away and is now apparently perfectly well and is the hardest kind of a puzzle to her former physicians. This child lives at Fulton, Ill., and the residence of her parents is to be one of Mrs. Comer's first stopping places while on her journey. The clergymen of Fulton knew of the illness of Marjorie Summers and have seen her since her almost instantaneous recovery. They have opened their churches and have told Mrs. Comer that she may preach in them, and, if she is able, this qualifying clause they put in—she may heal the sick.

Mme. Albert, who has been at the Palmer house, Chicago for years, suffered eighteen years from paralysis of the face and one of the eyes. Mme. Albert said that she had tried everything that the best physicians could prescribe or do and her paralysis was no better. Mrs. Comer cured her with a single touch, and Mme. Albert will tell anybody so who chooses to call upon her.

WALKED TO HER TRAIN.

Mrs. R. F. Martin of Marengo, Ill., came to Chicago last week and went to one of the meetings which Mrs. Comer held. Mrs. Martin had a complication of diseases. She had been unable to walk for years. She walked to her train, however, from the Masonic Temple, after Mrs. Comer had put her hands upon the woman and had told her that the Lord would heal her. A letter came from Marengo Wednesday. In it Mrs. Martin said that she had just prepared a dinner for forty-six people and that she had done it without the least fatigue.

Mrs. Comer is not without a vein of humor. In speaking of Mrs. Martin's case she said: "This woman has so many things the matter with her that I thought possibly time would cure her before she got through telling me of her ailments."

HER PECULIAR SYSTEM.

The peculiarity about Mrs. Comer's method is that while she says herself that her power comes from the Lord she does not require in the person healed the possession of any faith whatever. So-called faith cures of the Dowie and other stripes require that the person who is to receive the benefit must believe on the Lord Jesus Christ with soul, heart, mind and body, and give himself over to nothing else but the thought that he is wholly God's and can be cured alone by God's mercy. The persons who by some means or other have become rid of their body ailments while in attendance at Mrs. Comer's meetings, have not been in the main church-going people at all. Most of them, on the contrary, have been of the nonchurch-going classes and utterly skeptical as to Mrs. Comer's powers. They only went to her when interested friends told them that they would not be obliged in any way to commit themselves to any profession of faith, of religion or of belief in God or the power of the woman who was to attempt to heal them. Physicians have been in the place and have seen some of this healing done. The cases enumerated above are those of persons who were healed in the presence of a crowd. The thing was not done under a bushel, and they have been willing witnesses to their cure without pretending in any way to account for it. All sorts of things have been put forward as the means whereby it has been accomplished. Suggestion, hypnotism and will power have been the favorite explanation advanced.

Mrs. Comer says: "It is pure faith on my part in the Nazarene. This power is in me, and I can account for it on no other ground than this abiding belief which I have in Christ's power to cure through me on account of my implicit faith in him. I am not a Christian scientist. I am not a hypnotist. I don't know what they mean, when they say I cure by 'suggestion.' A man named Clarence McIlvaine is manager of the Grand hotel in Cincinnati. He had locomotor ataxia in its worst form Dr. Prendergast of the Cincinnati board of health told him that he would never walk again. I heard of his case and went to see him. I laid my hands upon him. He got out of his wheel chair and walked. The locomotor ataxia left him. I have a letter from him. He tells me to make it public. He says that he is to-day as strong a man as any in the world and that he has been such from the moment that I touched him.

"It has been said that when some person professing the power of healing is able to cure a deformity where the surgeon's knife and doctor's medicine are alike unavailing it will be time enough to say that the cure is something beyond the effect of simple will power. A Washington child was born with a malformation of both ankles. She suffered frightfully. The best specialists in the United States said that she was incurable. She wore iron braces on both feet from the time that she was first allowed to stand. The instant they were removed both ankle bones left their sockets, as it were. I touched this child and she was healed instantly. She described the healing feeling as one like that given experienced when one day she had been given a gentle electric shock.

PART OF HER LIFE.

"This healing is part of my life. I have to do it. I can't help it. It is as natural for me to do it as it is for you to eat your dinner. I am not a crank, but perhaps I am an enthusiast. They tell me that the Episcopal church frowns upon anything which is not based upon an old-time conservatism. I am as conservative as the church in everything, perhaps, except in this one use of power which some people might think trended toward the uncanny. I was confirmed by Bishop Wilmer of Alabama. I was originally a Baptist, but once, when I was ill, my sister, who was a church-woman, sent for a priest of the Episcopal church. He prayed in a way which I liked. I found nothing narrow in it and I became an Episcopalian.

Four years ago I was at the Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va. I had been in bed for weeks. The physicians at the place told me that I must die. I had all sorts of physical troubles, and as a last and fatal complication, blood poisoning was about to set in. I was in bed awaiting death. Then the remembrance of the New Testament promises came to me. I remembered the "Knock and it shall be opened unto thee," the "Ask and ye shall receive' and the message about the faith which can remove mountains came to me. I remembered there in my pain and sickness how people had said that the reason we did not always get what we asked when we prayed was because it was impossible to feel that perfect faith which was necessary. I resolved then and there that I would pray and that in my heart there could be no room for doubt. I prayed for half an hour. Then I arose, dressed myself and went in the garden. For two hours and a half longer my spirit knelt in the presence of God, and faith went with the petitions. I could actually feel the cure taking place within me. Strength came back and a feeling as if I were a child again. I went in to the physicians who had pronounced me but a few hours before incurable. They were astounded. I insisted upon an examination. At its conclusion they told me that I was as well a woman as there was in the land. The external evidences of the disease had vanished. This thing that I tell you is susceptible of proof.

WILL RETURN TO CHICAGO.

"I am coming back to Chicago after a while to make one final appeal to the people to send delegates or to come themselves to the Washington conference in 1897. The conference will include the men, I hope, to whom the people look up, and that out of the gathering much good will come."

Mrs. Comer is a widow with one child. She was born in Pine Level, Ala., probably about twenty-four years ago. She talks like a southern woman and the accent lends a charm to her voice. She does not pretend to have much of an education and confessed frankly in the church club when she went there to get her doctrinal standing passed on that she did not know the meaning of the word heterodox. There are many people who are just now trying to study out how Mrs. Comer accomplished what she certainly did accomplish in the healing line while she was in Chicago. If someone can find out and tell the rest of the world just what it is the subject-matter will make mighty interesting reading and may be of advantage to many a young doctor in his practice.

TREATS OF TWO CREEDS

Western Philosophy Applied to Beliefs of the Hindoos.

VOLUME ON THE THEOLOGY OF THE RAJA YOGA PUBLISHED BY THE SWAMI VIVEKANANDA, WHO ATTENDED THE CONGRESS OF RELIGIONS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR—IT CRITICISES CHRISTIANITY WITH TOLERANCE AND EXPOUNDS THE IDEAS OF THE EASTERN FAITH.

There is something delightfully refreshing in listening to the philosophy of the East. We have so long been accustomed to send out missionaries to convert the poor, ignorant Hindoo that the idea of reversing the situation and taking the Hindoo as our teacher brings a mental shock which is most invigorating. It is only the ignorant, of course, who really regard the religion of the Brahmin as little better than that of the Australian bushman, and yet so many theistic shams and so much of the exploded mysticism of the last few years have been associated with different parts of India that even the wise can hardly be blamed if they look upon any apostle of the great Indian creed as a fanatic or charlatan.

Without any personal knowledge of the Swami, who was such a familiar figure in the Congress of Religions at the time of the World's Fair, without caring to inquire whether he came with due credentials from his home in the East, or whether he had a right to speak in the name of the great religion of the East, I can only say that a perusal of the modest volume lately published by him upon the philosophy of the Raja Yoga is calculated to open the eyes of pharisees and fanatics who set themselves upon a plane of thought far above that of the native of India. Indeed, there are thousands of those who profess and call themselves Christians who have never in their highest and best moments attained the level of universal tolerance and love which is the starting point of all Vivekananda's teaching. It would be impossible here to go into the details of the original Raja Yoga, nor would we find there the true essence of what its interpreter has to say. Vivekananda has attempted to apply the advanced ideas of Western philosophy to the old beliefs of the Brahmin religion, and although he might not admit it himself, he has read as much into the old forms as any commentator ever read into Shakspeare. But he has this in his favor—he is able to look upon Western thought and Western creeds from an outsider's point of view. He has criticised us fairly and truly, just as we may criticise Brahminism; only he has shown greater impartiality than any Christian would employ in judging the effete East. And this, perhaps, is one of the great advantages of Brahminism, that it is so universally tolerant. It has kept its hold upon millions of people of very diverse habitation and intelligence simply because it embraces everything that runs counter with it. Indeed, it would embrace Christianity if we were only willing that it should be so.

DOES NOT TOUCH THE MYSTIC.

The Swami succeeds, then, in getting the best out of our Western creeds in such a way that they may almost assimilate what is best in the philosophy of Raja Yoga. And what he tells us is nothing mystic, nothing esoteric, but something very simple if only it is true. We can, he says, by concentration obtain such control over the internal mind that it will be possible for us first of all to abstract the mind from all outward sensation and finally make it master over the Prana of the universe—that is to say, the force which is one aspect of matter. It may appear at first sight as if this were merely repeating the well-known doctrine of faith. We are told that faith will enable us to move mountains. But the Yoga tells us more; it shows us how such power can be obtained by practice, and, indeed, if we are to believe Vivekananda, we have only to practice in order to become true Yogis. Now, obviously there must be some truth at the bottom of this belief, because every creed gives place to something of the miraculous, and we are confronted in every religious history by men who have exhibited this power; nay, more, there are many who profess to wield it at the present moment, for what is hypnotism, or what is christian science but a minor manifestation of this control of Prana? Yet none can tell us how to attain to this height unless indeed the maxims of the Raja Yoga are to be taken as a practical guide.

This, then, is the aim of man: 'To acquire the complete control of matter, and that not by the exercise of reason, but by not by the exercise of reason, but by the development of his superconsciousness. When we have fully realized this power our souls are no longer human, they become Om, part of the divine essence, and Om cannot reason; the omniscient can have no possible use for reason; therefore there is a state of superconsciousness above reason, just as there is a state of subconsciousness below reason; the state, for instance, of a stone. There are many, of course, who would say that subconsciousness and superconsciousness are the same; in both cases reason is dead, and the passage to either one or the other is a movement of degeneration. Not at all, says Raja Yoga; just as there are vibrations of light so low that one cannot see them, and then more intense so that they become light to us, and then more intense still so that they become darkness to us again; so it is with consciousness. And just as the more intense vibrations of light are brighter far than the low vibrations, if we could see them, so is the superconsciousness of the Yogi a far higher state than the subconsciousness of the stone.

CONCURS WITH WESTERN PHILOSORHY.

Now this is most true: We know that "the dead wall of reason" must some day be overcome, and from the days of Plato to the days of Kant all philosophers have striven to find the key of this universal knowledge. Yet no one of the philosophers of the West has ever expressed so clearly the fundamental difference between reason and omniscience, or shown so simply how necessary it is for us to divest ourselves of the raiment of reason. Rationalism is the constant cry of the present, although we have only to think for a moment in order to see that no change from our present state is possible which does not imply the breaking down of reason's barriers.

Granted, then, that this state of superconsciousness can be attained, we are confronted by many difficulties. In the first place, since we can all apparently obtain complete control over matter, what is to prevent the universe falling into a state of hopeless anarchy when there are so many who have the power of gods? In the second place, how is this state of superconsciousness to be acquired? Obviously we cannot accept the teaching of Raja Yoga on that point, and it is hard to see how Vivekananda can accept it, unless we bear in mind the fact that he is a Hindoo, and the Hindoo, as Hegel has pointed out, is like a child in his philosophy. He is nearer the truth, perhaps, because he is nearer the sea of immortality from which he came, but his methods savor of the pseudo miraculous, just as a child's endeavors are rendered ineffective by the faith he puts in his own childish contrivances.

SUPERSTITION THE WEAK POINT.

Now with all the good will in the world we can never be brought to believe that to breathe in through one nostril and after holding the breath sixteen seconds to breathe out through the other will result in freeing our soul from the ties of the flesh, even though we should mutter words of pregnant meaning during the operation. This, of course, is the weakness of Vivekananda's teaching—that even he cannot divest himself entirely of superstition. Yet it is hardly to be expected that he should do so when it is remembered that there are hundreds of well educated Hindoos who thoroughly believe such legends as that of Hunyman, the monkey god, who tried to carry off Ceylon and whose tail was set on fire by the inhabitants; an act of revenge which brought retribution with it, for the monkey god promptly retaliated by setting fire to their city with his tail. But Hindoos are not the only superstitious people. Is there a single religion in the world which is free from superstition or fanaticism? We can well afford to let the Yogi believe in his breathing exercises if in return he will tolerate our religious observances. Besides, we may laugh as we will, but it is absolutely certain that we would gain, if only from a physical point of view, by his instructions. Imagine the effect upon the hard-worked business man of one hour of meditation spent in a clean, flower-bedecked apartment every morning. Such a practice would be a perfect cure for many cases of nervous prostration.

NO REAL RESULT.

Still there is a stronger argument against the practical part of the Raja Yoga, and that is the fact that, as far we know, there has never been any genuine result. Prophets have perhaps stumbled by accident upon the true path, but the ordinary Brahmin seems to be as far from Nirvana as ever. To this Vivekananda would reply by quoting a parable, in which the impatient aspirant is condemned to a new cycle of probation, while the patient learner is given instant release. In other words, 4,000 years is no proper test; it is merely a period of temporary transition in the eyes of the Yogi. Vivekananda vigorously opposes all attempts at christian science or hypnotism as denoting the ruin of the soul. Where one soul gets command over another it must end in the annihilation of the weaker. Every soul must work out its own salvation. Nor is it a fair criticism to call that salvation mere nihilism. Nirvana, as has been already pointed out, is a state which at present we cannot conceive; even Aristotle, who call it "theoria," shrank from following it in its legitimate conclusion; yet it is none the less a state far higher than our present one, to which we may some day attain if we have but the necessary patience. The Swami is far more candid about his religion than most Brahmins, who do believe in mysticism and think it foolish to let the common herd into the secrets of the universe. This candor compels our attention, and if we cannot profit by reading the aphorisms of Patanjali we can at all events find much food for humble thought in the wise teaching of Vivekananda. W.

THE UNSEEN WORLD.

We Are Already Inhabitants of a Spiritual World.

Our Duty Toward the So-Called Dead.

A clergyman of the Church of England has written a book narrating his experiences with the unseen world, and in it he says:

"If the so-called dead are near us and appear, what is our duty toward them? Are we right in seeking fellowship and intercourse with them? What is the nature of their mission? Have they anything of surpassing interest to impart to us? Moreover, in what relation does the whole subject stand to revealed religion? * * * There are persons willing to acknowledge that in an age in which men's highest interests are in danger of being lost sight of in the pursuit of temporal gain, a fuller light is being thrown on the truths respecting the higher life, and the all-important fact of individual immortality. * * * If those whom we call 'the dead' are in reality near to us and both anxious and able, under certain conditions, to communicate with us, it is right and necessary that we should know it."

There is certainly a marvelous awakening of the world to a consciousness of the direct influence from the life just beyond, and there is no more extraordinary anomaly than that the church—the church universal, as a rule, inclusive of each and all sects and creeds—holds an attitude hostile to the careful and reverent investigation of the possible communion between the two worlds of the seen and the unseen. Here, on the one hand, is the vast organization of professed Christians; of those—pastors and people—who have definitely ranged themselves as accepting and pursuing divine truth; as holding faith in immortality and the infinite development and progress of the soul; yet who regard as variously wicked or weak—sinful or silly—any definite pursuit to discover what relations, if any, exist between the two worlds of the visible and the invisible, or, to be accurate, the seen and the unseen. For the time has passed that we can actually designate them as the physical and the spiritual. None of us would tolerate the assertion that the physical and the spiritual. None of us would tolerate the assertion that the present life is exclusively a physical one.

THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.

We all realize that we are inhabitants already of a spiritual world; that we are ourselves spiritual beings; that we are in perpetual touch with spiritual forces, but the further proposition that we may be in constant association and communion with those who have passed beyond death is deprecated, discouraged or denounced. Now and then it is even said of a clergyman who sincerely attempts to investigate this subject that he is very "brave," an expression not infrequently made regarding Rev. Minot J. Savage in his well-known efforts to gain light on this problem, and to demonstrate, if possible, its truth or its untruth. But a dispassionate observer might well ask why, in the name of all that is important, should not Mr. Savage—a professed minister of Christ, a teacher of divine truth, a leader in all that pertains to the higher life of man—why should not he of all persons, why should not all the clergy, of all persons in the world, make earnest and intelligent and reverent effort to learn whether the potent truth of the immortality of the soul cannot relate itself to the present life as a factof infinite value, rather than remain fact of infinite value, rather than remaining this question, one may be answered that the minister's supreme duty is to teach the lesson of living well the present life—of being just, generous, considerate, truthful, honest, and kind—of living with love to God and love to man. Granted; but would the further truth—if it be one—that there may be constant, natural, and recognized communion between those in the seen and in the unseen, be in any way inimicable to not only moral, but holy living? On the contrary, would not the clear realization of the mingling of the two worlds— or states—be its perpetual check upon all that was unworthy, its perpetual stimulus to all that is pure and noble, and of good report? Realizing this constant communion, could one not say of those whom death had removed:

Regret is dead, but love is more
Than in the the summers that are flown;
For I myself with these have grown
To something greater than before.

TANGIBLE TESTIMONIES.

In a book referred to by the English clergyman, there are four chapters of asserted experiences of his own; of experiences of visible, audible, and tangible testimonies of presence and intelligent communication with those in the unseen. These chapters are entitled "Spirit Knocks," "Spirit Writing," "Spirit Voices," and "Spirit Forms." The record is both scholarly and sincere. Its literary quality is unexceptionable. The defect of the book is in that the author withholds his name. Presumably, he does this because of the unaccountable popular prejudice against a minister's concerning himself with the phenomena of spirit communion. But why should it require heroism for a man to give his name to what he believes to be true? And who, so much as the clergy, should be supposed to be the leaders and teachers of this next phase of spiritual truth in case it is proved to be a truth?

The only practical difference to-day between the older and the newer phases of spiritual belief is this: That the one believes in the immortality of the soul, but regards the separation of death as final from those who still remain on this plane of life. If A is to outlive B for fifty years, then must he wait fifty years before having continued companionship with his friend, while the newer belief is that between B in the unseen and A in the seen there may be a perpetual intercourse of spirit to spirit, thus if A felt himself companioned in spirit, it would not only infinitely lessen all the anguish of bereavement, but would be the constant stimulus to live that higher life of the spirit—that life which is joy, peace, and love—that life whose joy, peace, and love can only be wrought out of the moral virtues of truth, honesty, courtesy, and flawless integrity. In fact, this belief gives the most remarkable impetus to the spiritualization of life.

The above item is from Lilian Whiting's correspondence in The Chicago Inter-Ocean. Miss Whiting never misses an opportunity of speaking a good word for the cause of truth, and the large circulation of that paper among the people who do not read spiritual papers must do a great amount of good. PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains the lecture by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago pulpit. It scintillates throughout.

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages. In order that all whom this notice may reach, can secure this address, as well as the other lectures and articles, we have made arrangements to have 10,000 copies printed to be sent out free to every new trial or yearly subscriber. This paper is well worth 25 cents. Every Spiritualist who wishes to know what has been going on should carefully read it. Our regular subscribers have, of course, had the contents thereof.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Ouija. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. They will be sent to anyone for five cents per copy, or ten cents for the two papers. Stamps received. Remember, please, that these two papers are sent out FREE to all NEW trial or yearly subscribers.

SPIRITS AND DISEASE.

Obsession and Obsessing Influences.

Promiscuous Circles, Ignorance of Spirit Control and Causes of Obsession.

One great cause of sensitives becoming obsessed or being troubled with obsessing influences, is sitting in promiscuous circles. Another cause is in trying to force mediumship, to bring out and develop it too fast. I have known persons that were hypnotized to develop their mediumship, before they were centered in themselves and had a band of good spirits established about them for protection and guidance in their spirit work, to become possessed by lower influences and spend years in misery and sorrow.

In cases of hypnotism a great deal depends upon the character and principles of the hypnotizer, and people should be very careful to know whom they are being hypnotized by. I have seen it demonstrated and proven to my perfect satisfaction, that a person can be hypnotized to do evil as well as good. The obsession or possession of people by undeveloped forces is by hypnotism. Mediums are often hypnotized by their spirit controls.

Mediums should be educated not only in the rudiments of a school education, but certainly in the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism. The phenomena of spirit control and influence should be carefully observed and studied. This will help mediums to guard and protect themselves against the power of the lower forces.

I know some mediums who have an intuitive soul-development, whose brains vibrate in unison with the spirits of higher spheres, who deliver as fine lectures as any of the cultivated and educated ones on our platforms. But this is an exception, and not the rule. I heard one of our speakers on a public platform say that she did not believe in organization; that you could not organize a truth. Neither did she believe in the education of mediums, or physical culture. Those people who sat and listened to hear her murder the English language, and saw her awkward manners and gestures, thought a little more school education and a few lessons in physical culture would do her no harm, but much good, in the furtherance of our cause; and it was a great pity such mediums should take the field to become leaders and teachers before they were prepared for it.

We often find mediums and their controls who are ignorant and use a great deal of slang and street vernacular, and they go on from year to year in the same way, seeming rather to retrograde than progress. If these mediums would set about educating themselves, they would also educate their controls, who are also sadly in need of education.

The bands of conscious mediums, who have not the intuitive or soul-growth highly developed, are more dependent upon the brain powers of their mediums; and it is all the more necessary that they should be educated. I find on a close investigation and study of spirit phenomena, that the medium's own preconceived ideas and thoughts enter largely into all phases of spirit phenomena. Then how important it is that we all lead good, true, spiritual lives that will throw around our mediums an aura of love and harmony which will make conditions favorable for advanced spirits to give to us through their instruments the grandest and best thoughts from the higher spheres.

I have not written this in a spirit of censure or criticism, but to call attention to those things which are of vital importance, not only to a medium entering the field but to the world at large.

A few years ago my wife and myself attended a few circles at the house of a friend. Coming to these circles was a lady with her two children—a young man and a girl of nine years.

This girl had previously developed clairvoyant mediumship. Some of the time her control would give very clear and correct readings to members of the circle; at other times they seemed to be mixed up and could scarcely give anything correctly.

I knew there must be a reason for this, and my clairvoyant vision being opened, I saw a band of Jesuitical influences about her who were seeking to destroy her mediumship. On inquiry I found that many people out of curiosity, and others to see what she could tell them about their beaus, came to her, thus bringing a low order of influences. I told them they would see trouble if she did not stop sitting in promiscuous circles and reading for people who wanted their fortunes told.

A few days after this lady moved to a distant town, with her children, to keep house for a brother-in-law. In a short time this girl began to have what the doctors called epileptic fits. She would fall backward upon the floor, every joint in her body would be stiff, her eyes closed, jaws set, and her body would be cold. The mother and brother would rub her vigorously and in a short time she would come to herself.

They soon noticed that she had these spells every time a certain man engaged about the premises came into the house to do chores. This man had recently come out of the State's prison. Other men that were working about the premises were hardened characters—just the right kind of element the lower forces could use to draw from to obsess this young girl. The spells became harder and of more frequent appearance.

One day, while she was having one of these spells, her mother and brother about gave up her coming to herself again, when her control got possession of her and said to the brother to rub quick and hard and she would try and hold "medy's" spirit in her body; that there were bad spirits trying to kill "medy." They renewed their efforts, which in a short time were crowned with success. The control came in again and told them to pack up right away and go back; to not stay any longer; if they did, the bad spirits would kill her "medy."

The lady came back to Northampton and brought the girl in to see me. While the mother was relating to me what I have previously written in regard to the child's case, all at once the girl was thrown violently backward upon the floor, and by the manner in which she was thrown it would seem as though an invisible force seized her. I stepped to her side; her body was rigid and cool, jaws pressed tightly together, her eyes closed and sunk in her head; and such a look of hatred, revenge and maliciousness, you do not often see depicted upon a human countenance.

Knowing it was a spirit controlling her, and wishing to retain, educate and develop him out of his low condition, instead of using force to drive him away, I picked her up and laid her upon a sofa.

At the moment of placing my hand upon her forehead, with a terrible oath the spirit of a man opened her eyes and cursed me for breaking his power; then turning to the mother he applied to her all the vile epithets he could think of and bitterly cursed her for bringing her daughter to me. After reasoning with him he promised to let her alone and aid us all he could in breaking this power that was holding her, and in restoring her to health. For four consecutive days I treated this girl, and each day from nine to twelve spirits, similar to the one above described, controlled this girl and my wife, besides those which were helped by our bands in spirit, who did not control.

The snow was quite deep at the time, and these vicious spirits would control her to run out doors if she was not closely watched, jump into a snowbank up to her waist, and then leave her. A watchful eye had to be ever upon her, as one moment she would be conversing with me or someone else, in a conscious state or controlled by her little familiar spirit, and at the next moment she would be controlled by one of the vicious spirits, and a slap in the face would be the next result.

After four days the conditions were completely broken and she was restored to perfect health, and has had no trouble from that time.

Try the spirits—do not swallow everything that spirits say, simply because they are spirits. I accord the same courteous treatment to spirits that I would to mortals. Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good.

THE ETHEREAL BODY.

Interesting Thoughts and Speculations Concerning It.

To the Editor:—In an article published in The Progressive Thinker of November 21, I endeavored to reply to one of a series of questions propounded by "Alcinous" in a previous issue. I will now attempt to throw a little light upon some of the other points on which your corespondent seeks for information.

His second question reads: "Do the phenomena presented by the ethereal body represent the true ego of an individuality, or is it stupid or more intellectual?

The phenomena presented by the ethereal body, inasmuch as they are produced by the ego employing that body as its instrument must, in the main, represent the true ego. It should, however, be remembered that this instrument has its limitations and imperfections. Like the physical body it is mutable and perishable, therefore is affected by conditions and environments, and is subject to influences brought to bear upon it by other egos. The more the ego develops the innate power which it possesses, the more perfect control it is enabled to exercise over its own. Hence the phenomena presented by the ethereal body, similarly to those presented by the earth body, represent the true ego of the individual affected more or less by other positive wills and by conditions over which it has not yet attained supremacy. The more nearly the individual approaches perfection in the mastery over his animal propensities and lower self-will, the more completely will all the phenomena presented by him, whether through the physical or astral bodies, or by mental operation, represent the true ego.

The intellectuality or absence of it (stupidity) manifested in phenomena is, consciously or unconsciously, estimated by each person according to his own intellectual and spiritual growth. The utterances of the wisest philosophers, being unintelligible to the ignorant and clownish, necessarily appear to them to be the expressions of folly or destitute of meaning. The wisdom of the spirit is folly to the worldly-wise. The ethereal body is capable of expressing more intellectuality than the physical, but if highly spiritualized its intellectuality is of a superior order. Being finite it cannot operate equally upon different planes. The loftier its spiritual development the poorer its judgment on merely material matters is likely to be, measured by the capacity of an ordinary earth brain. Objects viewed in the shadow of materiality and in the light of the spirit present totally different aspects. The intelligence of the one may be the stupidity of the other. In the full flood of spiritual light to which the ethereal body may ascend, it is not impossible that oblivion concerning earthly things may be attained. This to the materially-minded would be perfect stupidity. To the spiritually developed ego, in whom the less would be in this case lost in concentration upon the greater, the same condition would be one of sublime intellectuality.

The question next in order is: "Can the ethereal body entirely escape from its denser factor, the earth body, and leave the latter functioning for years?" To this question, qualified as it is by the word "entirely," it would appear that only an answer in the negative can be given. An entire escape implies the severance of the magnetic cord which unites the one with the other. This would constitute physical death, from which there can, for the individual, be no physical resurrection. Without the rupture of this magnetic cord the ethereal body can sometimes quit its denser factor and travel great, although limited distances. It may remain absent for longer or shorter, but in every case still limited periods. Through the connection maintained by this cord the earth body continues to perform at least involuntary functions. The heart and the pulses beat, and breath is drawn, although possibly in so feeble a manner as to be imperceptible to others. Whether voluntary functions can also be carried on; whether in the absence of the ethereal part the physical can converse, reason and work, may be considered open to doubt. I do not think in this infancy of what might be termed modern psychical research we have sufficient data to determine it. It is, however, possible that other spirits, clothed in their ethereal forms, may take possession of a body quitted by its own ego and retain that possesion for a long time. The well-known case of the Watseka Wonder would warrant us in concluding that the ethereal body of a decarnate spirit may assume the yet living physical body of another and occupy it during the absence of its owner, performing for several months all ordinary physical and mental functions. There appears to be no reason for fixing any time limit to their power. Experiments in this direction should be undertaken, if undertaken at all, with extreme care. Each ego owns, in this life, an earth body, capable of good and of ill works. It is itself responsible for the character of those works and should never surrender its control except for brief periods and sufficiently important reasons.

THE FUTURE.

Man Should Be Able to Predict It.

ANALOGIES OF NATURE—THE VEGETABLE—THE INDIANS—FISHES, SERPENTS AND BIRDS—CAPTAIN KANE'S BULL DOG.

A false education has taught us that "the future belongs to God," and that it is blasphemous for man to even attempt to pry into it. Trained from earliest infancy in this belief, probably nine-tenths of the people of the United States are disposed to doubt when they hear it asserted that the future can be predicted. They occupy a position similar to the people before the time of Galileo. Educated in the doctrine that this earth was flat, they looked with abhorrence upon all who maintained that it was a sphere, and when Galileo was imprisoned by the Pope and Cardinals for maintaining that it moved in an orbit around the sun, revolving upon its axis at the same time, the common people felt that this early martyr to science was properly punished. I have not a doubt that there are millions in the United States to-day who, should they hear me assert that man ought to, or can, predict the future, would look upon me as an enemy of God, and foolishly imagine that they could win the favor of that God by injuring me through any means, fair or foul.

I start with the proposition that man should be able to predict the future, whether he is or not. I base this upon all the analogies of Nature, wherever, in her ample domain, I have been able to explore. Commencing with the vegetable, I observe that it predicts the future, growing in a way best adapted to the contingences of that future. In New England, if the winter is to be mild, the corn husks grow loosely about the ear; if severe, then they grow closely, uniting beyond the upper end so compactly as to exclude the rain. The Indians observed this much before America was discovered by Europeans, and it was one of their "signs" for judging of the weather, the seasons, etc.

Fishes predict the approach of a storm, the changes of seasons and many other things. Serpents and birds do the same thing. Rats desert a building when its destruction is pending. Ground squirrels and gophers abandon bottom land that is to overflow the following spring, but remain if it is not to overflow. In Maine the wood squirrels lay up a large store of nuts in the fall, if there is to be a hard winter, but are not so provident if the winter is to be open or mild. Captain Kane's bull dog lost his coarse hair in the arctic regions, and in its place came out fur as fine as a beaver's. This was a case where Nature herself predicted, and in her bountiful care provided for the contingency. The otter, or any furred animal, taken to the tropics, soon loses his fur, receiving in its place coarse hair. When there is to be a high flood in the spring, the muskrats and beavers provide for it months in advance, by choosing high ground for their houses: If there is not to be much of a flood, then they build on lower ground.

I might multiply facts of this kind, but deem these sufficient to make out my case. Suppose some one objects, that in the cases cited, it was not the power of prediction, but that instinct with which God in his merciful providence saw fit to endow the lower order of animals for their protection: Well, that is a poser, sure enough! It is also a fair specimen of the clerical logic with which, from our earliest recollection, they have been accustomed to silence all spirit of inquiry or investigation in answering the objection, hoping that others may profit by the example, and learn to reason.

Prediction simply implies a knowledge of the future, and it is not of the slightest consequence whether that knowledge is instinct or reason. Such quibbling is on a par with the swell clergyman who corrected a gentleman who inquired how he traveled, by replying, "I did not travel at all; I came in my own private carriage." No matter whether the knowledge is instinct or reason; whether it comes from God or the Devil; whether it is exercised by an animal or human, so long as it foretells the future it is prediction.

We next consider that knowledge in the animal is based almost entirely upon instinct, while in man it is based almost entirely upon reason; it therefore inevitably follows that what the former does through instinct, the latter accomplishes by reason. This proposition requires no proof. I next lay down that it is just as necessary for the well being of man that he should be able to predict as the animal: further, that, as reason is a higher order of intelligence than instinct, it is far more rational to conclude that man has been endowed with the power of prediction than the animal. Intelligence in both man and beast has been found to be in the proportion of the brain to the spinal marrow, increasing as the difference increases. Thus, in the fish, the brain is to the spinal marrow as two to one; in the serpent, as two and a half to one; in the bird, as three to one; in the mammal, as four to one, and in man, as twenty-three to to one! Therefore, to assert that God has conferred the power of prediction upon the lower order of animals, yet denied it to man, not only sounds illogical, but blasphemous.

The animal predicts by the aid of instinct; the man who advertises himself as "the only living Astrologer," tries to do the same. So too, a Brigham Young, and the whole school of modern prophets, from the Indian medicine-man to the aristocratic fortune-teller, who turns up a tea cup or cuts a pack of cards. And all these must fail, for the simple reason that instinct in the human is so much more feeble than in the animal. The status of the infant proves this, for, during the first few months of human life we are incapable of exercising one particle of reason, being dependent entirely for all our intelligence upon instinct; and mark, what imbeciles we are—greater fools, even, than sucking pigs! There you may see the exact amount of intelligence put forth by the fortune-teller, for not one of them knows any more about the future at forty than when an hour old, aided only by instinct. Instinct never expands, never progresses, never learns anything, never makes a mistake. These characteristics all belong to reason. Whatever knowledge an animal may gain by experience or training comes through its feeble reasoning faculties, not its instincts.

If man would predict the future he must do it entirely by the aid of reason. The barometer predicts, but it is exclusively a product of man's reason. There are, so to speak, natural barometers, but we cannot read them by instinct. When the mariner perceives the mercury rapidly falling he knows that a storm approaches, even though not a cloud is in sight; if very ignorant, he may imagine the barometer as the cause. When the astrologer observes that Mercury is about to transit the disk of Saturn, he knows that there will be thunder, lightning, and electrical disturbance; this is one of Nature's barometers or finger-boards. Thousands of them having been learned, they constitute the science of astrology; but to learn them, man must exercise his reason. Astrology is founded purely in the laws of induction; that is, the pointers have all been learned by observation, the same as it has been learned by observation that when the mercury rises in the barometer fair weather approaches.

A DEAD MAN'S TALE.

Steps of the Process of Mortal Dissolution.

As Related by an Astral Entity.

The following very interesting account is worthy of attention as a study of the process of the dissolution of the bonds between the mortal body and the immoral spirit, as set forth by Polluto in the Chicago Herald. The narrative is weirdly realistic:

By what means the subjoined reached me is a matter of no consequence. It relates to commonplace experiences which are not often elaborated, and which are possibly curious enough to warrant publication.

As to the existence of astral bodies there is unquestionably a general unbelief. Still, there are thousands of men and women of high culture and intelligence who are firm in the faith that each human life is composed of at least two entities, the physical body and an astral body, which is semi-physical and semi-spiritual, and which is very like the ordinary frame of flesh—blood, nerve, muscle and tissue—and which differs from the other in being more attenuated in fiber. It is an etherealized quality, with human elements and the capability, at times, of separation from the corporeal frame and an independent existence. At death it does not lose its individuality, and continues to live either for an indefinite period or, possibly, forever.

It is in the nature of a vitalized sentient shadow of the body, and yet with a species of tangibility that permits it, under certain favorable conditions, to become perceptible to, and hold converse with, some in the flesh. Such are the beliefs in regard to this double of the human being that are held by some of the most eminent thinkers of the day.

I.

I who write this am the astral body of a man who lies dead before me. As his double, although I am living, I am, in a sense, also the dead man, and as if I were he, I shall speak.

The gradual approach of dissolution, the illness, the physical, mental, moral and emotional disturbances which precede and accompany it, are rarely related with exactness. What is often presented as characteristic of the moribund is a perversion of the facts.

My life, including its course and eating, was not especially remarkable. I was of robust youth; was religiously educated in the straightest fashion; had a fair education in the schools and business, and pursued an occupation which without over-exertion furnished me with a moderate competence. I enjoyed, as a rule, superb health, and also enjoyed an almost total exemption from injuries. Life thus passed equably and uneventfully until I had reached a half-century.

II.

It was at this period that slight ripples began to disturb the level of the hitherto pacific surface of the sea of life. Sleep, always undisturbed and refreshing, began to be broken. Always had I fallen asleep when my head touched the pillow, and the rest would last for hours without interruption. Now it would be hours before I would drop into a fitful and restless slumber, which would be haunted by frightful visions of domoniac forms, bottomless chasms and towering heights, adown which I was hurled like Lucifer from the battlements of heaven.

My splendid appetite began to fail; my disposition for physical and mental exertion lessened; my average good nature became tainted; my nerves, always sheathed in impenetrable defenses, became bared, as age wears the enamel from a tooth, leaving its tender fibers exposed to incessant and painful contact. Irritation took the place of the ordinary endurance of my nature. Strange and violent pains at times seized me with ferocity.

All these changes did not come in a month, or a year, or in five years. They were almost imperceptible in their approach. It was a half-score of years before all these changes forced themselves on my attention, and I discovered that I had grown thin and was losing my strength.

Well-meaning friends contributed to the hastening of my awakening from the unconsciousness of falling health.

"What in the world ails you? Have you been sick?"

"No, I never felt better in my life," I would reply, at the time a chill shuddering along my nerves as their remarks forced themselves on me as a deadly portent. "What makes you think I am not looking well?"

"Why, you're so thin and pale. You want to see a doctor."

Another effusive acquaintance: "Why, old boy, you're getting old. Anything the matter with you?"

II.

Then I suddenly began to notice the deaths among my acquaintances. It came to me with the suddenness and pang of a dagger-thrust that So-and-So, who were younger than I, were dead. I glanced about among the people I knew, searching for those who were my chums and companions ten and twenty years before, and I discovered with a throb of pain that only here and there one remained.

I began unconsciously taking an absorbing interest in the death notices. "Younger than I!" was the sinking comment when such was the fact, and for a moment I came to the verge of hating those who had thus set an example of death at their age. When the decease of the octogenarian, and those who climbed to the very summits of the century was announced, I warmed to their memories as those who afforded examples of the capacity of men for long life.

I grew weaker in health and demoralized in temperament. The slightest obstacle ruffled me, I fell into despondent moods, and lost my taste for society, amusement, labor and study. The inevitable burdens of life became unendurable and I lost all ambition. The once-populous future changed into a waste in which there was nothing save a gray aridity and a lowering sky.

Meanwhile, so far as I knew, I was possessed at that period of no malady, and yet my fancy supplied scores of diseases. I felt the languor and waste of consumption, knew absolutely that I was effected by organic heart difficulty, and at times felt the premonitory gnawings of a cancer, the insidious symptons of Bright's deadly disease and the warnings of paralysis. In this labyrinth of imaginary evils I wandered constantly and suffered as poignantly as if they had been real.

III.

I consulted medical men who examined me and found nothing—"a low, nervouse tone; a little tonic, less work and a rest. No organic trouble, some little functional disturbance of no consequence." At times, after awhile, clouds as is were, drifted over the sky of my brain and shrouded everthing in a mist. I could not always think with clearness. I now and then lost cohesion in thought; my memory occasionally was impaired, and I would forget names, dates and faces; I apprehended softening of the brain.

It was at this period that night became a gloomy and dreaded inferno, with infinite tortures. Sleep was in brief snatches, disturbed by atrocious visions. I swung over the brows of heaven-high precipices; I was chased through caverns of hideous night by monsters, and constantly awoke shivering and sometimes screaming with affright and bathed in perspiration.

The waking period between the moments of sleep were more intolerable after a time than the nightmare of slumber. They were the arenas of retrospection in which memory and conscience fought unceasing battles. A blow that I had given a baby brother; a flying cripple in the playground whom I had kicked in a moment of rage; the reproachful, gentle blue eyes of a dying dove, that I had wantonly shot in a grove, one glorious June afternoon; meannesses that I had been guilty of even to the most minute details; neglected opportunities; misdirected action—all these on such occasions gathered about me and broke the solemn stillness of the night with clamorous upbraidings.

IV.

After a time the most terrible phantom, the most pertinacious monster of them all, made its appearance, and hovered leering at me in the somber night. It was the suggestion of death. "You must die!" it said and flew away.

"Well, what of it? Tens of billions have died, and everybody living must also die. There's young Blank, with all his youth and wealth, he is sure to die some day, and so has the beautiful Miss Fleurette and the newly married couple, the Jeunesses—all of them; not one of them will be spared! Suppose I must? They'll all follow along sooner or later."

And yet these reflections that every son and every daughter of man must undergo the same fate gave me no consolation. I was not willing to share the common lot; I wanted to live—just to live, only to live! It may be that I was not more of a coward than the majority of human beings when they first begin to contemplate the approach of the great butcher. For months and months I fought his appearance; I felt for myself a great commiseration, an acute sorrow that I was obliged to die. It was only when I found him close enough to feel the breath of his nostrils that I ceased to fear him.

V.

Early, orthodox, religious training made itself felt potentially, and there were moments when the child-taught idea of an "angry God frothing with rage," and an ocean of flame rolling on forever, its sulphurous billows, with its shrieking and damned souls, filled me with indescribable horror and apprehension. Again, the suggestion of annihilation world possess me with its awful menace. To be obliterated, to be separated forever from friends whom I loved was even more terrifying than the anticipation of eternal torture.

In time the inspection of these various horrors dulled their hideous intensity, as the victim on the wheel is said to become insensible to pain after the first few blows. A species of numbness, a lethargy permeated me. The subject grew wearisome, I said:

"I am but an indescribably minute speck in the universal collection of human atoms. I am of no possible consequence compared with the stupendous mass. If there be a future in which there is a judgment of human actions, it is no more than just that I pay the penalty of my offenses. All the trillions of specks that have lived and died, and who will live and die, will have to meet the same fate. Why should I distress myself in regard to a future life any more than one of animalculae which inhabit a drop of water in the midpacific? I am of no more consequence in the mighty aggregate of the illimitable universe than this tiny and invisible creation. I will worry no longer."

In time all these phantasms, visions, doubts, and apprehensions disappeared. Then a profound peace took possession of my soul. It was not the pacific repose of hope, but the relief which came from the disappearance of the black broods that incessantly threatened dire results. It was a subsidence of the thundering waves and the castigating winds.

The turbulent sea melted into gentle swells which bore me on with a soothing, craddle-like motion. The ingoing tide drifted me along a shore from which delicious perfume, balsamic and lethal, filled the atmosphere. Twilight came, as, tranquillized by heavy odors, I floated languidly and painlessly on and on, till the twilight deepened into eternal darkness.

It is but natural to suppose that early orthodoxy,—with their indescribably horrible ideas concerning an angry God, an endless Hell of torments, surrounded by sulphurous flames and devils, and so on through the black catalogue of damnable doctrines peculiar to orthodox creeds—must have a most lamentable effect on the mind and mental experience of a dying person not wholly delivered from their influence.

The deaths of terror resulting from orthodox teachings should be sufficient to damn the whole orthodox system, in all its shades, in the minds of all right-minded people.

THE LYCEUM.

Hudson Tuttle Replies to President Barrett.

In the voluminous message of President Barrett to the National Spiritualists' Association, he at some length introduces the lyceum movement, and reflects on the books used as the cause of its not meeting with greater success. He says:

"The decline of the lyceum is no doubt due to the lack of spiritual instruction in the text-books used as lyceum guides. The books now in vogue are valuable, but the inner meaning of Spiritualism has evidently failed to touch the minds of the children. If different text-books are needed, let us supply them; if different methods of work are required, let us resort to them."

It is true the lyceum work has not advanced as rapidly as we wish, nor kept pace with the splendid achievements of our English brothers; but it is misleading to say it has declined.

To, as admitted by President Barrett, the "splendid work done by the lyceums of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cleveland, Denver, San Diego and San Francisco," must be added at least thirty new lyceums organized in the Northwest alone.

Deficient as are the books in use, according to President Barrett, these lyceums base their success on them. The lyceum is a direct inspiration of the remarkable seer, A. J. Davis, and he transposed the children's school in the Summer Land to earth, and made it a model. Will President Barrett tell us how anything can be brought forth by the "talent" which "ought to be encouraged" in the ranks of the National Association more spiritual? In his manual Mr. Davis presented the plan of a working lyceum. It was while engaged in conducting a lyceum of four hundred members that Mrs. Tuttle felt the want of appropriate music, and the repeated inquiries from those desiring to found lyceums showed that further instructions were needed. After years of labor she finished the "Lyceum Guide," as an adjunct to the manual. Any person of ordinary intelligence with the help of the "Guide" can organize and manage a lyceum without other assistance.

It is most true that should a society desire to annex a Sunday-school on the lines usually pursued by such societies, the "Guide" and the manual will prove far too "spiritual" and advanced in thought.

A Spiritual society with a Sunday-school on orthodox lines is an anomaly. There are those in high places in Spiritualism who disfavor the lyceum, and would substitute a half-way Sunday-school to gather in the weak brethren who lean toward the church and have not manliness to openly stand up for their convictions. Such Sunday-schools are in need of books especially composed for them, but we cannot infer that President Barrett has such in mind.

The "Guide" is for the home, the lyceum and societies, and a manual of physical, intellectual and spiritual culture. It contains seventy-five pages of spiritual songs and music, Golden Chain recitations, Memory Gems, Choral Responses, Programme for Sessions, Calisthenics, Marching, Banners, Standards, Band of Mercy, etc. It seeks to outline the work, leaving the leaders to extend it to the fullest. In this it instructs on purely spiritual lines, for Spiritualism is evolution from within, and not the foisting of something foreign from without on the mind. Hence lesson papers or a book of lessons, however wise, soon become wearisome. The leaders must train themselves and then lead up their groups. It is because of the labor this demands, the want of noble, intelligent and self-sacrificing teachers, that the lyceum cause does not make swifter headway.

If there was in the hearts of all Spiritualists the zeal of the mother away in the pine forests of the Northwest who ordered a copy of the Guide, saying, parenthetically, that she had a little son, and there were no near neighbors, but with the Guide she intended to hold a lyceum every Sunday morning, herself and boy being the only members, what an advance there would be!

Instead of such zeal, according to President Barrett's own words:

"It is a standing disgrace to Spiritualism to find so many children from Spiritualistic families in the orthodox and Unitarian Sunday-schools.

"Several of our most prominent platform workers are educating their children for the ministry in some church, upon the money earned by their parents upon the platform, contributed by Spiritualists."

I intended to request President Barrett to state wherein he considered the present books deficient in spiritual thought, but coming to this passage it is not necessary, for does not this admission give the cause clear as the noonday sun? If the parents do not respect the cause, can they ask it of their children? The lyceum is almost always held in a public hall, while the Sunday-school is maintained in the beautiful church, and supported by the whole power and influence of its members. The prestige, favors and inducements are on the side of the church, and against the lyceum.

Hence it becomes the duty of those who would sustain the latter to make more than ordinary effort. The sensitive child should be shielded, as far as possible, when he is put forward as the advance guard in the terrific struggle between free thought and superstition.

I recall, while lecturing before a society in a large city, that I attended the lyceum session with the conductor, who was also president of the society. On returning, I asked why his own three children did not attend. "Oh!" he replied, "they belong to the Episcopal Sunday-school; all their playmates belong there; the minister is very liberal, and the fact is they feel ashamed to go to our lyceum!" And yet this man had assured me that he had never been happy until he had partaken of the bread of Spiritualism! He willingly gave his children a stone. I repeat what I said to him, that were I conductor of that lyceum I would never cease from my labors until I made a society to which my children and anyone's children would be proud to belong.

Books may be had for money, but money will not buy the zeal which is essential for the prosperity of the cause. The "Manual" and the "Guide" have received the fullest endorsements of the Spiritual press, and the only criticism that has ever been made has been by those who did not understand that they were not for the purpose of furnishing a book like the Bible, where texts and passages were to be taken out and crammed into the mind, but a plan to be pursued, with illustrations sufficient to lead on the way. The whole library of Spiritualism, and of the world, is at the disposal of the leaders, all "revelations" and the infinite book of Nature.—Banner of Light.

If a proud man makes me keep my distance, the comfort is that he keeps his at the same time.—Swift.

The To-Morrow of Death.

...OR THE... Future Life According to Science.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY S. R. CROCKER.

A VERY FASCINATING WORK.

This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist—he even mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth;" and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, a manifest discrepancy in the author's ideas, but the well-read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

MAN

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF

Results of recent scientific research regarding the origin, position and prospects of mankind. From the German of

DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contribution which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of [illegible] to general."—Buechner.

CRITICAL ANALYSIS.

Mediumship, Hypnotism, and Progress.

There has been so much said on the subject of mediumship that one would hardly expect anything new in the way of throwing light on the dark places. We feel impelled to assert that, like many other matters of deep import, it is vastly beyond the understanding of many who profess the possession of a peculiar gift, and, also, that the teachings of spirits, so called, through alledged mediums are full of fallacies. We as Spiritualists have to submit to fallacies and unreasonable declarations purporting to be authoritative utterances of those of the higher life, when they are no more than drivelings of an undeveloped brain in the earth sphere. We must respect such crudities or be censured. We should not suspect peripatetic mediums of fraud had they no inducement to commit the same, nor would we on that account if they had not done so in thousands of instances. We should not lay to the charge of mediums and their spirit influences gross ignorance and pitiable and miserable attempts at guessing at the past, present and future of persons and events, if they were not constantly displaying these qualities.

We see individuals hunting soothsayers, here and there, wanting to know their coming luck; some to hear from their departed friends, but mostly the former, a number of whom are ready to start a bank as soon as they have been with the diviner. The fact about all this, or nearly all of the so styled business mediumship, is that it is cheap fraud. Those who take pay for such delineations are imposing on the credulity of their victims. It may be all right to do so if a person is forced to it from impecunious circumstances, and there are those who want to be made temporarily happy for a small amount, but the honor nor the smirch should not be given to Spiritualism.

Spiritualism is nothing more nor less than the all-science. It is the "to know" the all of the truth, the great and awful facts of all things, of the whole of nature its growths and products. Mediumship is the door to the great arcanum. The gift is not universal. Many knock and it is not opened unto them. It is a sad reflection that many do not know, their position when brought near the opening to the greater and grander light. He or she who has the power of susceptibility to become psychologized or psychometrized, may not, and, in many instances, has not the discrimination to discern that the impressions which are received upon the brain are only those given by external forces, other than the minds of individuals, in or out of the body, or perchance, or per necessity, in obedience to the wish of the medium at that or some other time.

Every person who has studied mediumship intelligently knows that it is impossible to keep the theories of the medium's mind out of what purports to be messages from the spirit world. It is a task requiring very fine analysis to divine how far this goes; that is, to determine whether certain utterances are from the medium's mind, illumined or not, as the case may be, or whether the same is sensitized recipient, or to take a somewhat different view, to decide where the mind of the medium ends and the spirit correspondent begins. If those to whom so called spirit messages are given possessed the acumen of mind necessary to enable them to tell this, all would be easy sailing in the spiritual school; but they are not.

It may be stated as a fact incontrovertible that, generally speaking, the intelligence of the messages given by any medium is measured by the intellectual endowment of the psyche. The capacity of an individual to become inspired depends on the sensitiveness and strength of the brain. Andrew Jackson Davis, referring to his strange power of discernment by which he wrote his first and greatest work, Divine Revelation, called it the superior condition. He did not attribute it to the intervention of a spirit nor of spirits, but to his own personal gift, enabling him to get in rapport with persons, things and principles.

Conception is only limited by want of growth and development. The former may be construed as referring to the physical machinery of the brain and the latter the means to unfold the spirit. Could human society become fraternized education might be amplified and genius would not be accidental. Then there would appear no prodigies, but all would know now the Lord (spirit), whom to know is life eternal. Spirit evolvement passes from symbolism to definite thought and ultra speech. Incinerating passion bursts out into fiery volumes that wrap the soul in flames of love. The fragments of broken hopes and despoiled ambitions seem only like the gems to a fadeless crown when one has ascended this third heaven of divine truth and elysian, yet when the cord that binds to the eternal is severed we shrink back to a physical life, "fond of our prison and our clay," and question all evidence of the positive existence of a future life. A memory picture of a medium or a sitter, produced on the medium's mind, is no proof of a present reality. The apparent form of a departed friend stands before us and we are startled, but some scene of inanimation is brought as plainly to view. And should the person, or the appearance, apparition, begin to talk, might it not be an extension of the picture? A dog or any other animal is liable to intrude itself into the field of the vision of the clairvoyant. In such a case is it necessary to discuss the question of the immortality of animals and the matter of a dog heaven? If one should have a symbol presented to his mind it might contain the history of a life in epitome.

I was once listening to a sermon by an elder in the Christian Church; not thinking much of his arguments, yet giving good attention. Closing the eyes I saw a large peacock strutting around with the tail feathers spread out full. This was intended by some intelligent force to represent the prominent feature in the preacher's character. At another time a friend asked a silent question concerning a person of a bad odor, morally speaking, and I saw a mean-looking dog getting over a fence. It is hardly supposable that these visions were the work of spirits, although they were truths more or less perfectly illustrated.

My experiences with slate writing and materialization have been meager and unsatisfactory. If it remains for those phases to demonstrate the after life as a fact, many Spiritualists must remain hopeless doubters till there is something better than dark seances and the far betweens of the regime we have been having for lo! these many years. I have had but three slate messages, and two of them had the name of Paul Castor signed, a man I never knew, but who seemed to be the stock control of every medium who claimed to heal.

In the trumpet seances I have attended I have been sure that I could detect the voice of the medium in the horns. But I conceded that the messages might have come from the spirits purporting to communicate and yet using the medium's speech.

In all the search of many individuals of fine intellect and good conscience, some of them having investigated in Europe and America, there remains a serious doubt as to the possibility of spirit materialization. That there is fraud we know; but as to the actual fact of materialization, it is in doubt. If the medium is capable of superior judgment the conscious trance is far more reliable than the unconscious This is true from the fact that the medium's mind is not subject to the light drafts that may be moving round when in the conscious state.

A person may be hypnotized to the extent of abnegation of the reason and intelligence, and yet speak the dictations of a lying spirit and of an ignorant one.

The hypnotic state is not conducive to intellectual development; that is, the complete degree of hypnotism. Development of mediums by association with the higher spirit intelligences improves the powers of thought and the moral sense. The practice of submitting to complete hypnotism deteriorates the mind and narrows the scope of intellect, and conduces to the enslaving of an individual to a state of subserviency not consistent with the happiness one should be entitled to as his or her birthright. Hypnotism (complete) is derived from the mal-application of a law of nature and stands, from a moral point of view, in the great catalogue of crimes by the side of human chattel slavery. Hypnotism is only valuable as one of the beautiful and powerful influences in the highest and purest education of the human race. It is a great misfortune for a person to become a psyche without the necessary instructions as to the uses and relations of the same. The dangers of mediumship are many and but poorly understood by some of the most valuable instruments for spirit communications. Were hypnotism an easy science many of our religious and political evils would disappear. The magnetism of a party name and the wand of the mitre often carries the day for a false and an inhuman cause.

Spiritualism already seeks to enthrone organized authority and to raise to command dictators of methods. The persecuted and downtrodden of the old world in the last throes of political and ecclesiastical agony fled from their native homes to the wilds of America that they might break the spell of the dream of a false and miasmatic sleep and become free from the hypnotism of the ages and find a home in the new domain, there to foster a new race and cultivate new principles. But the world was not yet to awaken from its slumber. Greed and avarice and a thirst for power and the spirit of domination followed the emigrant ships as the white caps trace the storm's current through the mighty depths. Unhappy America is an arena for the exploitation of the schemes of the sharks and the land pirates. When Spiritualism adopts hypnotism it makes no step of advancement except as it learns and teaches its higher uses and the avoidance of its abuses. In the present state of spiritual literature the world knows nothing about it, definitely. The average man and woman, even among sincere investigators, look upon it as a game of chance. They contribute to the fund for the support of a medium much as they would to a wheel of fortune. When they go to a meeting they often return saying: "I did not get anything." They are kept guessing all their lives, a state not far superior to the pearly gate and gold stock of the creedists. The reason of this failure of Spiritualism to reach the intelligent masses is that there are no schools of philosophy nor any methods of developing mediums. What few societies we have are crystallized, as much so as the churches in their formulas of worship. Instead of employing and unfolding the silent powers which are known to exist in every community, they are, too often, taxing the truth seekers to foist upon them a costly mediocrity which is no credit to the cause. Mediums go abroad to teach when they should remain at home until they know something to teach and how to communicate it. Whenever the desire to organize predominates over the wish to enlighten the community, then the church is the place to go to.

Spiritualism has many blessings in store for the world of mankind in society organization, but the nail of the coffin of freedom of speech is sometimes adroitly concealed in the sleeves of some self-appointed leader or leaders. The pleaders for harmony make a travesty in which argument is silenced and progress has the door slammed in her face. If those whom we essay to instruct were posted as to what mediumship is, and were hypnotism understood by the curiousity seekers who go to spiritual lectures and entertainments [?], the light would break out from the rift in the wintry cloud of spiritual doubt and gloom and religion would unfold her plumed wings and liberty would shout from the mountain tops and the valleys would sing a new song to the praise of the eternal gods.

Angels assist our mighty joys,
Your sweetest notes unfold,
But when you raise your highest strains,
All truth has not been told.

MY CREED.

I do not know if future life
Has weal or woe for me;
I only know His laws of love
Forevermore shall be.

I do not know that for my sake
A Jesus bled and died;
I think of all whom, for Truth's sake,
The world has crucified.

I do not know where God abides,
Nor of His great white throne:
I stretch my hand in darkness out,
And, child-like, touch His own.

I do not know if works and faith,
Can buy me heaven's joy;
The holy right to bless mankind
Is heaven without alloy.

I do not know that earth's frail ones,
In endless pain shall moan;
I only know that God is love,
And He will claim His own.

I do not think for one man's sin,
Labor a curse was made:
I've found this true: Those who work most,
In blessings sweet are paid.

I do not wish that for Truth's sake,
I constant praise shall find;
If no reproach came to my name,
The blessing were not mine.

I ask not anyone to bear
My sins of word or deed;
The way of right and truth so plain
Is mine with care to heed.

If I my path have crooked made,
In proud self-will and vain,
O, glorious thought! that I myself
Can make it straight again.

Among the pitfalls 'round our way,
All of us blindly move;
Be careful! If your brother fall,
Give him your hand in love.

CHRISTIANITY.

Is It of Divine Origin? That Is the Question.

The Testimony of Ancient Spirits About It.

Spirit Damis, the friend and companion of Apollonius, says; "Apollonius was endowed with marvelous spiritual powers, and his deeds or acts of spirits through his physical and mental organism transcend belief. He was the chosen medium of a band of ancient Egyptian and Chaldean spirits who wrought through him the utmost possibilities of spirit power, known to them, over the physical realm. He taught the purest morality and spirituality as the necessary condition of future happiness. He was Pythagorean in his methods of teaching, and was the equal of that philosopher in wisdom, and I believe his superior in spiritual knowledge."

Vespasian, Roman Emperor from 69 to 79 A. D. says of Apollonius:

"His was one of the greatest minds that ever lived, and he drew to his aid both in mortal and in spirit life the love and sympathy of the wisest and purest. His life and benign influence were always enlisted in behalf of goodness and truth. His virtues were made resplendent by purity and humility, and none knew him but to love and reverence him for them. He was my confidential friend and medium (as you call it) for divining futurity, and I valued his services so highly that I caused a record of his life and writings to be placed among the archives, and his statue to be placed in the temples among the tutelar divinities of the Empire. I did this, not as a superstitious act, but as a recognition of his worth as a man, philosopher and magician. The statues and pictures of Apollonius were the models for the Christian Jesus; this I am sure of."

On the non-existence of Christianity previous to its invention by the priesthood there is an abundance of spirit testimony, short extracts from which I will here present.

Apollonius says: "Not in a spirit of contention or with a desire for earthly fame, is the true history of ancient religions to be revealed, but that all may know that spiritual gifts and spiritual truths are the inheritance of all nations and ages. The world may construct its gods and religion, but spiritual light will ever reveal their true origin.

"Jesus of Nazareth should have been my contemporary by nativity, and certainly should have been known to me by virtue of the great spiritual powers which enabled me to designate in all nations the chosen instruments of the world of spirits. I traversed that country where he is said to have lived, and indeed conversed with the chief priests and rulers of the Jewish nation. I also conferred with the Rabbi Gamaliel, but I never saw or heard of this wonder-worker of Judea.

"Let not the world misunderstand the object of our work; it is not to destroy but to build an edifice that shall not depend upon mystery to conceal its weakness.

"Could I forget that millions have been deluded and suffer from disappointed hopes, I would not seek the presence of mortals to warn them against trusting in any form of worship to ensure future blessedness.

"Christianity has no right to sit as a queen ruling over the earth and demanding the homage of men. To bind the plastic intellect to a fictitious standard of faith, or to limit its fields of inquiry, is the great error of all religious systems, and notably that of Christianity.

"The time is at hand when creedal bonds must be dissolved, that man shall be able to rise to a higher conception of life and its destiny. Man is by nature a child of divine power, needing only such instructions as shall direct his mind to a consideration of the principles governing the universe."

Caiaphas, the high priest who, it is said, accused Jesus before Pontius Pilate, says:

"I come to aid you in your efforts to unravel the mystery which surrounds the connection of the Christian deity with Judaism.

"As for the records which say that I was either instrumental or accessory in accusing anyone for the crime of blasphemy before Pilate, with other charges, I repudiate them as fabrications of after generations. No such person as Jesus was ever accused before the Sanhedrim, nor would such accusation have availed anything, for the Jewish laws were annulled in all cases where they conflicted with the laws of Rome."

Pontius Pilate, himself, says:

"I come to say that all statements of any person having been crucified for attempting to found a religion or for any cause save crime, while I was Procurator of Judea, is false. I never heard of any such person as the Christian Jesus when I was in the mortal life.

"The Jews were a bigoted, turbulent race of people, continually revolting against the Roman authority, and constantly engaged in controversy among themselves about their religious superstitions. I governed them in accordance with the general Roman laws for the Province, and had such a person as is claimed been brought before me, I would have crucified his enemies before I would have allowed him to be harmed.

"I had no love for the Jews, and no fear of their anger, and all statements relative to my delivering an innocent man to them to be put to death as a malefactor, are infamous slanders."

Josephus, the Jewish historian, A. D. 50 to 90, relative to the paragraph that appears in his "History of the Jews" concerning Jesus the Christ, says:

"Is it likely that I should have penned so short a paragraph about so important a matter, when I gave chapters to things of less note? No! I did not write that paragraph, for I had never heard, then, of any such person; nor would a Jew of my age and station have been ignorant, for I was well acquainted with all the principal events of my nation, both in that and previous generations.

"I know not who the author of this paragraph may be, but the early writers of the Christian church can tell if they will. Certainly I did not place it there, and the world should know from this that however skillfully a lie may be concealed, truth eventually will uncover it."

Tacitus, a Roman historian in the first and second centuries, concerning a line that occurs in his "Annals," which reads, "Chrestus (Christ) the founder of the Christian name was put to death as a criminal under Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius," says:

"This is one of the errors that have been handed to posterity as emanating from my pen. Not only did I not write that, but much more which has been attributed to me. Could I come again as powerfully as if I had an earthly body of my own, I would rewrite the history of that era. You will find no mention of the Christians as a sect, by any authentic writer previous to the third century."

Suetonius, a Roman historian, A. D. 70—130, relative to what he is made to say about certain emperors of Rome punishing and banishing from the empire the sect of Christians, says:

"These quotations from my history are forgeries. I never heard the title Christian applied to any religious sect, and such statements bear their own refutation in the fact that no punishment for religious belief was permitted by the Roman laws, and that people from all nations were permitted to dwell freely at Rome."

Trajan, Roman Emperor from 98 to 117 A. D., concerning the letters ascribed to Pliny and himself, says:

"The ascribed letter to Pliny is a forgery, for I knew nothing of such a sect, (the Christians), nor should I have written anything at variance with the established law for such cases. I did not persecute or authorize the persecution of anyone because of religion, nor was it the custom of the governors to write such letters as have been ascribed to Pliny."

"Religious toleration was granted to all sects and individuals. It is an infamous policy which sought to blacken the reputation of rulers who governed in accordance with this principle; and that policy can be traced to the writers of a subsequent period who fabricated the religion, and sought to substantiate its claims by mutilation of the records, and wholesale defamation of the characters of men who never heard of the subject of Christianity during their earthly lives. I know whereof I speak in this matter, and defy any mortal to point to a fact in history that contradicts my statement relative to the policy of the Empire towards religious beliefs."

Domitian, Roman Emperor from 81 to 96 A. D., relative to the charge of persecuting the Christians, says:

"I have been accused of persecuting the Christians, but the truth is I persecuted no one who obeyed the civil authorities, nor did I ever authorize such action. I cannot account for the ideas prevalent among mortals which class some of the Emperors of Rome as fiends because they did not know and receive the Christian faith as truth, while those who did accept it have been recorded in history as models of sanctity, although their lives were stained with the blackest crimes.

"It may seem to many useless to deny what Christendom has been taught as truth concerning the attitude of Rome towards Christianity during the first three centuries, but as far as I am concerned I hurl back their accusations of persecution as a base fabrication. Criminals met the punishment they deserved, whatever their creed or nationality.

"It illy becomes the teachers of a faith which destroyed the records of Grecian and Roman civilization, or mutilated them almost beyond recognition, and sank the world in darkness for a thousand years, filling it with woe and bloodshed, to accuse the early Emperors of persecution, when the remaining Roman records bear witness that persecution of religions was not the policy of the nation under the Pagan rulers. A religion such as this has reason to fear the advent of spirits, for the truth once told by the men of that age will unravel the mystery which surrounds its origin, and unmask the deception practiced upon the race."

This spirit testimony on the origin of Christianity and the characters of the originators and promulgators, in the lack of moral principle, agrees well with that which has characterized its leaders all along the ages down to the present time; and it scatters the Christian's claim that it is a heaven-ordained and divine institution, as the night mists are scattered before the rising sun.

It was easy to say, "as in Adam's fall we sinned all, so in Christ's righteousness all will be made righteous," but saying it is all there is to it. It has and divine institution, as the night mists been proven by science that the Garden of Eden story, the flood, and a hundred other like contrary-to-nature stories recorded in the Old Testiment, are utterly false. And the application of the "higher criticism," which is the exercise of a little common sense, to the contrary-to-nature stories in the New Testament about a virgin-born man and God, his death on the cross for the sins of the world, and his ascension bodily to heaven, will prove them false also.

This higher criticism has made a great many infidels, but the Christian is not allowed to use it, for he would lose his soul's salvation which consists in being in a spell of ignorance necessary to Christian piety.

Prof. Buchanan says, "Paul was inspired by Jesus and taught the same religion."

They are made to agree on some things and pointedly disagree on others. They argree on the force or terrorizing method, "believe or be damned!" to make converts. But in my experience with communicating spirits, I have learned that those who tried to enforce belief in their declarations were of a low order, while those who asked the listeners' consideration of the subject of their discourse, by the exercise of reason, were much higher in the scale of being. There is no better proof of the untrustworthiness of trance or inspired utterances than the use of authority to compel belief in them.

Those Spiritualists who are so sensitively fond of the term Christian have in their minds the belief that the Christian religion was God-inspired and originated in the "Holy Land;" for this they should not be blamed; but when they learn the truth that what its reputed author, Jesus, is made to say in the Gospels he never said as a man, but it was all placed there by the priesthood, who were the real originators, to hold control of the religious emotions and intellects of mankind, in the lust of greed and thirst for power, they should be willing to drop it as a misleader, and take up a direct line of march upward and onward in the search of truth and right living, as true Spiritualism directs.

Indeed, if they accept the Christian definition of Christianity in toto as true, what is there in it that has a juster claim on their attention, as progressive beings, than what is coming to us every day from the spirit realms through intuition, inspiration and trance mediumship? If there are those who think there is that in it which transcends the truth or moral ethics of Spiritualism, they should not call themselves Spiritualists and complain because some brother or sister has learned a truth or two which they cannot grasp. They should remember that Spiritualism has no creed; its field is the world, and its mission to educate mankind. Hence, the more we know and the better we do; the happier the future.

MANY SUPERSTITIONS.

Both Ancient and Modern in Their Origin.

Compiled from the Secular Press.

HYSTERIA AND SUPERSTITION.

Mental diseases, and especially hysteria, have, from the earliest time to the present, exercised a tremendous influence upon the current metaphysical conception of the universe and upon the whole mental development, and that precisely because they not only occurred sporadically, but, as we shall soon see, attacked the masses in the form of epidemics, and so became of the highest significance and importance for the life of society as a whole, says Popular Science Monthly.

Religious enthusiasm and proneness to the mystic and the occult formed, even in the highest antiquity, an important factor of those degenerate and hysterical individuals who entertained the delusion that they were in communication with good or with bad spirits, and who by that channel influenced the masses not a little. A great number of priestesses who delivered oracular responses to the Greeks "with strong quaking of their bodies" were psychopathic subjects undergoing the hysterical convulsions well known to us to-day. Hence, epilepsy, which in those days was not discriminated from hysterical cramps, came to be called the morbus sacer, or sacred disease.

Plutarch, in his description of the Pythian priestess, delineates the typical image of a hysterical subject who in ecstatic convulsions stammered unintelligible words, into which the priests injected some sense. But hysteria, with its inclination to religious enthusiasm, was not limited to separate persons. On the contrary, we meet with it among all peoples and in all periods of history, and among all peoples we meet with it in the form of epidemic of various kinds. But never did this disease find a better or more fertile soil in which to thrive than the middle ages of northern Europe, marked as they were by ignorance and superstition, and accordingly we find that epidemics of hysteria then assumed dimensions surpassing those of any similar outbursts in other centuries. A great many fine books have been written about the individual and epidemic crazes of those ages. The French have made particularly careful researches into the matter.

Calmeil describes a great number of hysterical epidemics in different forms. One of the principal eruptions of Germany was demonomania, or teufulswahn. "In the year 1549," says Calmeil, "a delusion called vaudoisie prevailed in Artois, that the devils carried many secretly in the night to the assemblies, where compacts were made with Satan. Without knowing how, the participants of the nocturnal meetings found themselves next morning back in their dwellings."

HORRID SUPERSTITION.

We all know a horrid custom of the past, which was that of human sacrifice in conjunction with the erection of a building or the construction of a bridge. It was supposed that no such superstition was discovered among the Dravide Tibetan races. A correspondent writes to Nature that this belief does exist, There was a ridiculous story rife in Bengal, not so long ago, that the Queen of England, for some purpose unknown, wanted the heads of five children from each village. All the villagers hid and were prepared to fight for their children. It took months before the people could be made to believe how utterly absurd was the story. After awhile it was found out that the report of children having been wanted arose from the fact that a foundation was to be built for a great railroad bridge. It was discovered that among the people living in the past it had been the custom to sacrifice a victim when anything of importance in the way of building was undertaken, Then the stories of former ages, when these acts were carried on, had not passed away and they remain in folk-lore. At least the dread of the Bengali coolies was based on tradition.

ODD SUPERSTITION.

The most remarkable belief or superstition concerning the human eye which we remember of having met with is one that is current in Australia. Among the natives of that country it is the general belief that the left eye of every chief becomes a star the moment the chief in question is done with it. The sun, they say, is the eye of the "greater god," and the moon the eye of the "lesser god." All the stars were once the left optics of human beings of high rank. Shungle, a celebrated chief, once ate the eye of a valiant chief, thinking thereby to increase the brilliancy of his own "eye-star." But the eye burned through Shungle's belly and killed him, whereupon his own left eye became joined to the one he had eaten and the two may now be seen as a beautiful double star, lying just to the east of the southern cross.

CURIOUS TRADITIONS.

Traditions are not good things to go on in the writing of history, yet traditions are interesting, nevertheless. It is well to know that, according to some legends, the capital of France derives its name from Paris, son of Priam, who is said to have fled there Twhen roy was captured. These also tell us that Troyes was built by the Trojans; that Nuremburg was named after Nero, Jerusalem after King Jebus, and the Humbert after a king of the Huns, who drowned in it. From the same sources we also learn that the Gauls derive their origin from Galathia, a descendant of Japhet, and that Prussia is called after Prussus, a brother of Augustus; that the Scotch are descendants of Scota, a daughter of Pharaoh, and that the city of Naples was founded on eggs.

THE OPAL SUPERSTITION.

A Topeka, Kansas, man, who has always laughed at superstition and even made his engagement ring an opal one, has been gradually getting poorer all the time until a short time ago, when his wife—he had married her since—broke the opal and threw the ring away. Since then his salary has been unexpectedly raised, his wife has secured three boarders, his widowed mother has secured her long desired pension, and two of his heaviest creditors have died. Now he is picking up pins and carrying rabbits' feet and buckeyes.

EUROPEAN SUPERSTITIONS.

Tales of superstition from darkest Europe are more plentiful than black cats. The latest is from the Bukowina, a dependency of Austria. A soldier of the reserve died lately at Bojane and the military authorities requested his parents to send back his passport. In reply came the information that the order could not be complied with because the passport had been put in the coffin "that the dead man might have the less difficulty in entering into heaven."

KEEP CHURCH AND STATE SEPARATE.

Those who call themselves freethinkers and advocate the principles of State secularization, writes B. F. Underwood in the Chicago Record, in reply to a Rev. Behymer, are opposed to the recognition by the State of Sunday as a Sabbath or sacred day, and to the compulsory observance of Sunday as a day of exceptional sacredness, but one rarely hears among these freethinkers any objections to Sunday as a legal rest day or to its observance as a sacred day for religious worship by those who so wish to observe it. Freethinkers claim the right to enjoy Sunday and all other days as they see fit, provided they do not disturb the rest or worship or interfere with the rights of others. They are opposed to such laws as those under which in Tennessee, Maryland and other States, Seventh-Day Adventists, honest and honorable men, have been imprisoned for doing such work on Sunday as infringed on the rights of nobody.

It is not necessary that one should be an atheist to be opposed to amending the Constitution of the United States so as to make it recognize God as the source of all authority, Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations and the Bible as the supreme law of the land. The great mass of Christian people are opposed to thus evangelizing the Constitution, because it is a secular, not a theological document, and because government and theological creeds should be kept separate in this republic, where the church and State are not supposed to have any legal connection. We have the authority of Washington that the word God was deliberately omitted from the Constitution for these reasons, and not because those who adopted it did not believe in God.

Secularization of the government does not mean secularization of the people; it means only the separation of the functions of government from those of the church, leaving the people of all denominations and those of no religious creed to worship as they wish or not to worship at all, the only legal requirement being that in following the dictates of conscience in religious as in all other matters worshipers and non-worshipers must avoid interfering with the just and equal rights of others.

If Mr. Behymer would understand the French revolution, he should study the social and political conditions which preceded that great event—conditions for which the church was largely responsible and which at length became intolerable. Religious disbelief was not the cause of the excesses of that revolution, which brought a religious freedom that had not existed from the days of Constantine, the distribution of land which had been held by the church, and other great reforms, and proved to be one of the most beneficent movements ever inaugurated against kingcraft and priestcraft and in the interests of the people.

Of course, the person who said that he would "rather breakfast with the Devil than with a clergyman" showed an "anti-theological bias" quite as offensive as any of the usual expressions of religious bigotry. Much that was said at the convention referred to was crude and said not in the best spirit. For this freethinkers should not be held responsible, and by this the principles of secular government should not be judged. Some of the speakers persistently confounded with the principles of secular government what is called secularism—a system of thought or a kind of practical philosophy which Mr. George Jacob Holyoake some fifty years ago formulated in opposition to the too much other-worldliness, as he thought, which existed at that time in England; but those who are in favor of completing the secularization of the State by the removal of all those vestiges of the union of church and civil government which once prevailed throughout Christendom include many who do not accept secularism—many, indeed, who are in the Christian churches. Not a few orthodox Christians believe with Grant and Garfield in taxing church property. "Sabbatarianism" is to-day vigorously opposed by some of the most devout Christian believers, as is also the judicial oath, the issuing of religious proclamations by the president and governors of States (which Jefferson refused to do and condemned), the employment of chaplains to pray in our legislatures, the use of the Bible in our public schools, etc. Neither secularism nor materialism nor Spiritualism, nor any other ism, can be fairly identified with a reform in which all who are in favor of keeping the government separate from religious dogmas may consistently join.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

"Mahomet, His Birth, Character and Doctrin." By Edward Gibbons. This is No. 6 of the Library of Liberal Classics. It is conceded to be historically correct, and so exact and perfect in every detail as to be practically beyond the reach of adverse criticism. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"Mediumship and Its Development, and How to Mesmerize to Assist Development." By W. H. Bach. Especially useful to learners who seek to know and utilize the laws of mediumship and development, and avoid errors. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will be furnished until further notice, at the following terms, invariably in advance:

One year $1.00
Clubs of ten (a copy to the one getting up the club) 7.50
Thirteen weeks ..... 25 cts
Single copy ..... 5 cts

REMITTANCES.

Remit by Postoffice Money Order, Registered Letter, or draft on Chicago or New York. It costs from 10 to 15 cents to get checks cashed on local banks, so don't send them unless you wish that amount deducted from the amount sent. Direct all letters to J. R. Francis, No. 40 Loomis Street, Chicago, Ill.

CLUBS! IMPORTANT SUGGESTION!

As there are thousands who will at first venture only twenty-five cents for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER thirteen weeks, we would suggest to those who receive a sample copy, to solicit several others to unite with them, and thus be able to remit from $1 to $10, or even more than the latter sum. A large number of little amounts will make a large sum total, and thus extend the field of our labor and usefulness. The same suggestion will apply in all cases of renewal of subscriptions—solicit others to aid in the good work. You will experience no difficulty whatever in inducing Spiritualists to subscribe for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, for not one of them can afford to be without the valuable information imparted therein each week, and at the price of only about two cents per week.

A Bountiful Harvest for 25 Cents.

Do you want a more bountiful harvest than we can give you for 25 cents? Just pause and think for a moment what an intellectual feast that small investment will furnish you. The subscription price of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER thirteen weeks is only twenty-five cents! For that amount you obtain one hundred and four pages of solid, substantial, soul-elevating and mind-refreshing reading matter, equivalent to a medium-sized book!

TAKE NOTICE!

☞ At expiration of subscription, if not renewed, the paper is discontinued. No bills will be sent for extra numbers.

☞ If you do not receive your paper promptly, write to us, and errors in address will be promptly corrected, and missing numbers supplied gratis.

☞ Whenever you desire the address of your paper changed, always give the address of the place to which it is then sent, or the change cannot be made.

THE NINE DEMANDS.

Inquiries are frequently made as to the distinctive teachings of the American Secular Union. They are embodied in what is known as the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which we quote below. Their object is to divest the government of everything sectarian, and place it absolutely, as its founders intended, on a secular base. They propose no war upon the churches, but are unwilling to share in the expense of sectarianism, which is ever struggling to subordinate everything, including the public schools supported by monies drawn by taxation from all the people, to their narrow creeds. Spiritualists, without probably an exception, will cheerfully indorse these Demands:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the Navy and militia and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the Government shall be abolished, and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a textbook or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States, or by the Governors of the various States, of religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the Government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis, and whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly and promptly made.

NOT SUCCESSFUL.

Mention was made in these columns some months ago, that churchmen anxious for Bible-reading in the schools of Chicago, were getting up a book with selected passages from that relic of barbarism, which they hoped not only to get into use at home but in all the schools of the country. We notice that Addison Blakely, Esq., an attorney of this city, in writing to a New York paper, says:

"An attempt was made to introduce the book here which was met with so determined opposition on the part of the friends of religious liberty, that the matter was temporarily dropped. Chicago has gained two victories during the past year for religious freedom; one was in killing this measure, and the other was in getting the Illinois Sunday law declared unconstitutional."

MYSTERIOUS PROVIDENCE.

Providence was kind to Col. Ingersoll, and he was let off for what our orthodox friends call blasphemous utterances, by a severe prodding which made the wretch swear, instead of pray; for observation had taught him the latter was liable to be punished by immediate death. Reports say the Colonel is greatly improved in health. If he takes the gentle hint in the spirit it was offered, he may orate a good while yet.

Praying has been the capital offense of Providence, the principal one calling for immediate death; but now comes another malady closely related to it, and that, singing in a church choir. G. W. Nelson, of the First Baptist Church, Chattanooga, on Thanksgiving Day, had completed his vocal exercises, and the preacher had pronounced the last words of his benediction, when Mr. N. fell heavily to the floor, dead. If Col. Ingersoll's affliction was an infliction of Providence for blasphemous utterances, is it not also evident Mr. Nelson's singing incurred divine displeasure?

Resolution is omnipotent.—John Foster.

In our judgment of human transitions the law of optics is reversed; we see the most indistinctly the objects which are close around us.—Whately.

HOWLING DERVISHES.

Recent statistics, gathered by the Federation of Churches in New York, show that 18.9 per cent of wage earners in that city are employed on Sunday, and are working seven days a week.

Those agents of the churches, had they pushed their investigations still further, would have found that in no case did ten hours exceed a day's labor, while in many cases they were limited to eight hours, from fifty-six to seventy hours a week. Only a few years ago in the workshops and among farm laborers, from 5 o'clock morning to 9 o'clock at night constituted a day's labor. Multiplied by six, and we have ninety hours as what then constituted a week's labor. Increased longevity, even among wage workers who ply their craft seven days in a week, suggests that the laborer is the gainer by distributing his toil equally between seven days instead of doing the same amount of work in six days and idling or loafing on the seventh.

The workmen are the persons to determine for themselves whether they shall labor or idle, though the church is very anxious to usurp that right, and compel all parties to stand uncovered while they sing.

But who are the terrible sinners, nearly one-fifth the entire population of a great city, who toil seven days in the week, and who escape the penalties for Sabbath desecration? First in the long catalogue are the police, ever on the lookout to prevent crime; then the watchmen who are guarding public and private property. Close along side are the firemen, who have discovered idlers set more incendiary fires on Sunday than on any other day in the week. Then come the printers who are putting the preachers' sermons in type for the Monday morning paper; the janitors in public and private buildings, and in churches; the bell-ringers; and the sexton with his retinue of servitors who assist in burying the dead. The attendants on hospitals; the hostlers at livery stables; the coachmen who drive the preachers in magnificent style to the churches; and the servant girls whose labor is more exacting on Sunday than any other day in the week are on the list. Instead of one-fifth being engaged in toil, and losing their souls in consequence, if an accurate count was made, omitting the preachers who earn their daily bread on that day, we apprehend the number would exceed forty per cent.

What is true in every large city is also true in the country. One in five on an average in every home is compelled to labor from morning to evening, with no limitation of hours, to prepare food for the idlers.

We own to great disgust for these howling dervishes, who are ever alert for trivial misdemeanors, the evident object, to divert attention from the crimes of churchmen as presidents and cashiers of banks, who are so often caught embezzling public and private funds, which from their frequency, would seem the special prerogative of the Lord's anointed, and particularly of Sunday-school superintendents.

HOLY ZEAL.

It is probably true, for it comes from a clergyman, a class of people everybody knows never lie, that "The Protestants of Glasgow cover their birdcages on Sundays to shut out the light, because birds are not allowed to sing on that day in Scotland." Some one hearing this statement, remarked: "In a young ladies' school in Edinburgh, on the occurrences of a total eclipse of the sun, the head of the house directed the blinds to be closed to prevent the breaking of the Sabbath by looking at the phenomenon."

This devotion to a day was characteristic of our New England ancestors, the Puritans, who were many of them descendants of those Scotch Covenanters, whose Sunday zeal is illustrated in the above incidents. The successors of those Puritans are as zealous now to get God in the Constitution, as were the sticklers of piety two hundred years ago to prevent husbands kissing their wives on God's, alias priests', sacred day.

WORDS OF WISDOM.

Mr. Watts, of England, at the late session of the American Secular Union, in this city, said some good things to which Spiritualists cannot take exception. Thus:

"Our object is not to destroy Christianity, but to destroy Christian error; to free the mind from superstition, ignorance, and prejudice. We object to those things which have dwarfed the human mind and blighted civilization. We war not with Christian truths, but with the errors which surround those truths. Orthodoxy teaches that the universe was created 6,000 years ago; but science proves that man existed long before that time. Can you conceive of a time when there was no time? Can you conceive of a place when there was no place? * * * We accept the good and true in every book and in every religion, whether it is sacred or not; but we do not accept anything because it is one or the other. Whatever Christianity may have been one thousand years ago, it is not sufficient for to-day. Work to hasten the dawning of that day which shall dispel the clouds of ignorance and superstition."

We can all join hands in the support of such utterances.

"ANOTHER BRUTAL ARMENIAN MASSACRE."

The Armenians are a model people, let the missionaries tell the story. But the press dispatches place them in an unfavorable light. At Lynn, Mass., there is a large colony of these Christian pets, who have come all the way from Asia Minor to get away from the terrible Turk. A meeting of these malcontents was held at Lee Hall, in Lynn, on the evening of the 22d ult., where some 250 were in attendance, their object to form a union of discordant elements, to be known as the Henchagist Revolutionary Society, their purpose being evidently to overthrow the Turkish government, aided and abetted by the missionary element. The peaceable character of this people was shown on the occasion mentioned, when knives were drawn, chairs were thrown at each other, and a lively fight of the Kilkenny cat variety was set up. Unfortunately for future tranquillity, the police rushed in, and interrupted the destruction of the belligerents. Will this affair be heralded to the country as another awful Armenian massacre, by the brutal Turkish officials?

THE LIBERAL PRESS.

Some Facts in Reference to It.

THE BAD LUCK THAT HAS FOLLOWED THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL—THE LANGUISHING SPIRITUALIST PRESS—THE SAD FATE OF THE ARENA.

In a former issue of The Progressive Thinker we asserted that many of the liberal or spiritualistic papers were languishing like "sick kittens." We thought those two words, besides being highly expressive, were also deeply impressive, and would fasten themselves without any serious detriment on the minds of our readers. We did not intend to seriously injure the "sick kitten" by alluding to them, nor had we the least intention of hurting the feelings of any of our brothers of the press. We alluded as follows to the Religio-Philosophical Journal:

"The grand old Religio-Philosophical Journal, which had a circulation under S. S. Jones of 25,000, dwindled down to a circulation of about 1,500." This statement had nothing whatever to do with the Philosophical Journal, yet the editor of that paper takes umbrage thereat, and flies at us, claiming that we have injured him. Poor fellow, has the warm and genial climate of California threatened him with softening of the brain? We hope not. In connection with the above extract we had the following:

"The Religio-Philosophical Journal eventually fell into the hands of an excellent man, Mr. Newman [who changed its name to Philosophical Journal] and it finally drifted to California for recuperation, where its proprietor said that he did not have money enough to move it from San Diego to San Francisco."

The statement therein made that Mr. Newman had not the means to move his paper from San Diego to San Francisco, was based on an editorial item to that effect which appeared in his own paper; and because we made the same statement in The Progressive Thinker, he takes offense, and says that we have a "sting!" and will have to make reparation. What nonsense! What superb folly on the part of Mr. Newman, whom we spoke of as an excellent man. We don't wonder that he finds publishing a paper in California uphill business.

We have become weary in endeavoring to educate the people in regard to Spiritualist papers. We have repeatedly said that a first-class Spiritualist paper cannot be sustained in California. The gifted Mr. Schlesinger tried it and failed; so did the erudite Mr. Owens. Their papers were first-class in all respects, and far superior as to size and matter, to the Philosophical Journal, however good it may be at the present time. Other attempts, too numerous to mention, have been made to start Spiritualist papers on the Pacific Coast, resulting in ignominious failures. And why? Simply because there are not Spiritualists enough there to sustain them, and none of them can possibly get a foothold in the East.

There is a constant stream of literature from the East over the Rocky Mountains, but comparatively no returning current. However meritorious a publication may be, if published on the Pacific Coast, there is but little returning current eastward.

We were invited to take up our abode in California with The Progressive Thinker, and in reply to the invitation we simply said: "Have you taken us for a semi-idiot, to extend an invitation which, if accepted, would end in disaster? Pacific coast literature cannot it seems, freely pass the Rocky Mountains eastward."

And now a word as to the Religio-Philosophical Journal: Every one who has had a property interest in that paper has had very bad luck follow them. It is strange but true. John Smith, a well to-do farmer almost beggared himself in trying to sustain it. He took $10,000 in stock, and when that was squandered he mortgaged his farm for several thousand more, and that, too, was wasted, and he passed down to the grave a broken-hearted man. Others were beggared who invested in the paper. S. S. Jones finally became owner, and he was murdered, and the paper fell into the hands of Col. Bundy, his son-in-law, and his death was hastened by the bad luck that seemed to follow the paper. It embittered the life of Mrs. Bundy, an estimable lady. Finally B. F. Underwood became its owner, and through one of the foremost of literary lights in this country to-day, the bad luck of the concern still continued, and he was glad to drop it.

It was to be hoped, then, that there would be a turning point, but even the old type of the office seemed to have failure and bad luck written on it. A young and energetic man used it in publishing an excellent Spiritualist weekly paper called the "Mental World," which soon resulted in ruining him financially. Mr. Newman only inherited part of the name of the paper—"Philosophical Journal," and moved it to that graveyard of Spiritualist papers, California, and then he soon suffered financial embarrassment by a bank's breaking, and the end is not yet.

While we have the best of feelings towards all laboring for the advancement of truth, it should not be forgotten that there have been over seventy attempts to start Spiritualist papers, some of them the grossest swindles, and it should be borne in mind, that a peripatetic Spiritualist paper, thus far in the history of Spiritualism, has never long survived.

What we said of the Spiritualist and liberal press languishing is true in every respect, and the half has not been told. And now comes the Arena, which has languished worse than a sick kitten. The following comes from Boston, Mass., December.

"Judge Dunbar, in the equity session of the Superior Court, to-day gave a hearing on the bill in equity brought by Frederick T. Jones vs. The Arena Publishing Company, asking that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the affairs of the defendant company. There was no opposition.

"The defedant is a Maine corporation, having an authorized capitol of $150,000, and it publishes the Arena Magazine, B. O. Flower is the editor. The amount of claims against it is between $60,000 and $70,000, and its main asset is the good will of its business, which is estimated at about $100,000.

"Creditors holding claims to the extent of $59,000 were in favor of the appointing of a receiver, as were also the stockholders. A receivership is sought to prevent the assets and property from being wasted, and to continue the publication until a reorganization can be effected. The court has not yet named the receiver."

The Arena has been the one liberal magazine, publishing articles and stories illustrating the grand truths of Spiritualism. It has been one of the best (if not the best) magazines published and its hard run of luck will be regretted by all.

THE WORLD IS PROGRESSING.

To the Editor:—It appears from the New York World that one of the interesting phenomena of our time is the new and changed activity of the pulpit. The preachers seem newly awakened to their power as public teachers.

When in one day Dr. Dix preaches on the relations of classes and masses and Dr. Parkhurst takes up the moral side of the monopoly question, and when such pulpit orators as Dr. MacArthur, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, Mr. Dixon, Dr. Rainsford, Dr. Huntington, Rabbi Gottheil, Mr. Peters and others habitually preach upon matters of immediate and living importance, instead of discussing the niceties of creeds and splitting theological hairs over questions of eschatology, it is not too much to say that we have fallen upon a new era in preaching.

Even Mr. Moody and the Rev. Sam Jones—perhaps the strictest types that survive of the old brimstone orthodoxy—have felt the change in pulpit atmosphere. One cannot read one of the sermons of these revivalists preached ten years ago and compare it with the World report of their present-day utterances without seeing that a revolution has been wrought in their conceptions of preaching and in their attitude towards their work.

The change which has thus come over the pupit is unquestionably a wholesome development, and one that adds pulpit force to the influence of the newspaper in promoting progress. Its definition may be found in the simple statement that our preachers now take for their themes matters of present human concern. Instead of urging men to straighten out their doctrinal beliefs in order that they may save their souls after dwarfing them by lives of narrow selfishness, they now seek to save men in this present life from the blight of wrongful conduct and the blot of evil living. They have less to say of faith and more of faithfulness to duty. They talk less of doctrine and more of conduct.

Instead of learned discourses in reconciliation of infinite mercy with Divine justice, they preach to men the duty of themselves practising both justice and mercy in this present life.

And where once they condemned "sin" in the abstract they now stand up bravely and tell men of the sins they are actually committing by wronging their fellowmen. Dr. Parkhurst's denunciation of trust conspiracy as "the Demon of Theft and Murder" was of more practical value than a whole year of discourses upon mint, anise and cummin.

The change is a development in the line of progress, and a very helpful one. But like all such developments it is attended by some dangers. The new spirit is apt to inspire indiscreet men to extravagant utterance, to overstatements that rob truth itself of its effectiveness. In the practice of weak and vain men—of whom there are unhappily some in the pulpit—the new method is constantly a menace of mere sensationalism.

To guard against these dangers is a very serious duty, but, so guarded, the new spirit and the new method promise to make of the pulpit again a civilizing force, second only to the newspaper in its helpfulness to progress.

The above are the sentiments of a great daily; and are worthy of the careful consideration of every reflective mind. S.

A DICTATORIAL POPE.

News comes by way of Montreal, that the Pope at Rome will not accept the terms of settlement made between Manitoba and the Dominion government, relative to the vexatious school question. The old dotard is hugging his waning power, as the miser does his gold when in the embrace of Death.

THEY DON'T LIKE IT.

Some of the clergy dislike to see themselves complimented in the Liberal press. They say it compromises their standing with their parishioners. It has been the policy of The Progressive Thinker, from its first issue down to the present, and will continue while under the management of its projector, to applaud when merited, and condemn when not approved. Every advanced step of the clergy will be encouraged; and its fossil teaching, coming to our knowledge, will be discouraged, whether the preachers like it or not.

A SUGGESTIVE INQUIRY.

The North American Review for November contains a well written article from the pen of Rev. Madison C. Peters, wherein he claims the exemption of churches from taxation is the increasing of taxes on other property, a proposition which a bigot cannot deny. He favors the equal taxing of all property that is protected by law. He made the nice point that lightning rods are placed on churches for their protection, and then: "If God does not exempt church property, why should the State?" We give it up.

THE CELEBRATION.

Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

To the Editors—The Board of Trustees of the National Spiritualists' Association at the last convention were instructed if they thought it wise to do so, to arrange for the celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism, in March, 1898, S. E. 50, at Rochester, N. Y.

Believing that such a celebration should be arranged for at once, they have selected Mr. Frank Walker, of Hamburg, New York, for Business Manager.

Mr. Walker desires at once to hear from all superintendents in regard to their views of how this anniversary shall be celebrated. All are therefore urged to correspond with Mr. Walker; state what financial and other aid they will give, so that by January 1, 1897, he shall receive the concensus of opinion of our people and know how they wish him to proceed with this gigantic undertaking.

Mr. Walker has gained for himself the unanimous endearment of all our people, who, it is believed, will rally around him and pledge not only their support but cash and "good works."

Shall we not all unite and in these last days of this wonderful, progressive century, hold a "Grand Jubilee" in commemoration of that great occasion when the Angels of Light visited the earth to bring not only proof of immortality—but also to usher in the reign of "Peace on earth, good will to men."

SOME PLAIN FACTS.

They Speak an Impressive Language.

THEY COME FROM AN ORTHODOX PULPIT, AND SHOW THE INHERENT ROTTENNESS OF SOCIETY.

To the Editor:—Give your readers these plain, unvarnished facts: The Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, in the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York City, on one occasion lately delivered a vigorous sermon to a large congregation. He took for his text, "Be thankful unto him and bless his name; for the Lord is good." (Psalms, c., 4-5.) He said in part: "I do not know how many unfaithful husbands or wives there are in this community, but I should calculate that there might be well on toward a quarter of a million. The love between husband and wife is kept true in some cases by the possession of children; but I have learned enough to know that in the case of any couple that might present themselves before me to be married I would not at any premium issue an insurance policy on their conjugal felicity good for more than five years unless on the contingency of offspring, or on the basis of their common faith in God. Conjugal devotion that is not braced by something besides the direct regard of each person for the other—in other words, conjugal devotion that is both childless and atheistic, lacks just that consummating ingredient of tenacity which can alone secure marriage from being anything but a sentimental experiment.

"Educating a man does not change his impulses any more than whetting steel converts it into willow, or sharpening a wolf's teeth makes of him a kitten. Look at the condition of Europe at the present time. Almost every every nation is studying its own distinctive interests, with a concentration of intensity that is terrific, and every one almost of the great powers would like to get the other by the throat, and we are all imagining that one of these days there will come a grand convulsion that will tear Europe into geographical flinders. There would be nothing strange in that. That is only the natural outcome of egotism, educated to the extreme.

"If you do not look upon your neighbor as a brother you are to all intents and purposes looking upon him as an outlaw. Owing to some peculiarities in the quality, or at least in the form of modern civilization we are less likely than our ancestors a few hundred years back to deal with outlaws in a manner offensive to refined tastes, and to string them up summarily or to chop them into odds and ends, but that does not prevent our treating them as though they were legitimate spoil. If a lady goes to the store and buys an article that she is sure is marvelously cheap, and cannot understand how such a piece of handmade goods can be procured at so pitiable a figure, she knows, if she knows anything about the world she lives in and the industrial conditions that prevail, that some poor girl in some sickly back alley has been half paid for her work, and she, the elegant lady goin shopping in her carriage, gets the benefit of it. This city is full of this, and so is every other city. She does not kill the girl outright, but she helps to kill her by inches. And then, when she has got the first wear out of those articles that she has half paid for and that the sewing girl has paid the other half of by her health, perhaps, and very possibly by her virtue, she encourages herself in imagining that she is not a bloodsucker and a murderess by joining a relief or rescue society and packing off the unavailable portions of her wardrobe to be distributed among the poor servant girls in the back alley. You ladies want to think of that sometimes when you are swarming around a bargain counter.

"If a number of men engaged, for instance, in the mining of coal agree together to cut the output to such and such a figure, and to put the price up to such a corresponding figure, and do it not because the legitimate exigencies of the business require it, but because they have things in their own hands, and because the exposed veins of the people are supposed to be bared for the purpose of giving bloodsuckers an easy opportunity to drink; and if then the members of the coal mining company are able to go through the winter in warm and comfortable elegance, aided thereto by the money of the poor, who through January and February shiver over their little bin of coal which is so little because coal is so high they cannot afford enough to keep warm; then the suffering that accrues from it and the deaths that are sure to be the outcome of it are chargeable directly to the coal magnates. I have put this sentence together carefully. There is in it no wholesale accusation and no jumping at conclusions. I am only saying that if coal companies or coal combines or coal trusts—put it any way you like—use their power to the end of drawing off into their own treasury as much of the poor man's money as they can or dare, to the impoverishment of the poor, to the reduction of their comfort, and to the sapping of the currents of health and life, then such companies are possessed of the demon of theft and murder, and there is no other just and Saxon way of characterizing it. And this is no more applicable to dealers in coal than to the dealers in any other commodity."

The above is a sad, sad picture of real life in a large city. With such corruption and on the increase, too, will not New York City eventually disappear from the earth like many ancient cities? Spiritualists, you have a work to do. JUS TICE.

A MISNOMER.

Several correspondents have applied Mrs. to the name of Dr. S. C. Adams. Why, we know not, but as he is of the masculine gender, and the prefix is a misnomer, it is hoped all will omit it from this forth. Mrs. Adams is an invalid at this time. Whether she writes for the press we are not advised, but if she does The Progressive Thinker will gladly welcome her to its columns.

A NEW CULT.

Novel Faith Which Heals Ills Through the Soul.

Its Name Is Soul Culture.

High Priestess Is Mrs. Katherine Fitts, of Chicago.

SAVES HEALTH AND MORALS—SAID TO HAVE GAINED MANY CONVERTS IN CHICAGO—PRINCIPLES OF THE PHILOSOPHY.

To the Editor:—It appears from the Chicago Tribune, that this city has a new cult. It is in the psychical sphere, and so far as is known it is the only organization of its kind in the world. It is called Soul Culture. The originator and high-priestess of Soul Culture is Mrs. Catherine Fitts, and her home is on the South Side.

The basic aim of Soul Culture is to unify the body and soul. The unconverted—they are not known by that name, but it is the easiest way of classifying those who do not accept the belief—have souls and bodies which do not work together. When the soul and body have been taught to operate in concert Soul Culture has been attained. The immediate effect of this is found in the ability of the disciple to lead a perfect life; a state of being which entails perfect happiness, an absolute freedom from physical disease, and a correct appreciation of the problems of existence.

The cult, however, is not, as might be supposed, of a mystical nature. It is far removed from anything of this character. Clairvoyance and hypnotism have nothing whatever to do with Soul Culture. It is as open as the day, and of its beliefs and ends nothing is concealed.

The great cardinal principle upon which it is based is expressed in the motto: "Never do anything to please anyone else unless it is right." This is the foundation of all things so far as Soul Culture is concerned. When that truth has once been absorbed, the beginner has done much toward acquiring the faculties necessary to lead a perfect life.

CHANGES STUDENTS' IDEAS.

After that it is only a matter of time and application to reach the goal.

One of the first effects observable by the student of Soul Culture is that he no longer regards the forms of religion in the same light. If he has been a church member and after becoming a believer in the new cult goes again to hear a sermon preached he does so with an entirely different feeling from any he has ever experienced before. He finds himself in a new attitude. In the words of Mrs. Fitts he is no longer a slave to creeds and dogmas but a thinker. He listens to the preacher as he would to a lecturer. This is because he has come to believe that there are no such things as personalities and definite localities. God is not God, but an ever-living principle and heaven and hell are not places but states of being.

The Soul Culture Cult has existed in Chicago for some time and, it is claimed, has made many converts. Indeed, though the workings have been so quiet and undemonstrative that it has never before been brought to the attention of the general public, its friends declare that it has spread over all parts of the city, and even to other cities. So favorably has its underlying idea been received by those interested in philosophies of life and health that many residents of other places have made journeys to Chicago to see Mrs. Fitts personally and receive instructions in the cult.

The adherents of the school all speak of it with the greatest enthusiasm. According to their accounts Mrs. Fitts has brought about many moral reforms and cured numberless victims of bad habits. Through the cultivation of their souls patients, if they may be so called, have been saved a journey to Dwight, for the liquor and tobacco habits both give way before her efforts. People with complaints of almost every sort have appealed to her for assistance. Men in business trouble, parents who are having trouble with their children, and unfortunates of many other sorts have sought her for assistance and gone away improved in mind and spirit.

The converts to the new sect are from all castes and grades of society. The idea has taken hold of both high and low.

OPINION OF A BANKER.

"This soul culture innovation," said a prominent Chicago bank official, "is one of the most remarkably beneficial projects with which I have ever come in contact. You would be surprised if I were to enumerate the many names of Chicagoans who have been benefited by coming in contact with it. I have personally investigated the philosophy, and have been to talk with Mrs. Fitts, and I can frankly say that it is one of the best things I ever found in my life. The clearness and beauty of the philosophy render it such an evidently advantageous assistance that it will be easily grasped by those who come into contact with it. I know of many instances in which the good accomplished by Mrs. Fitts has been of such an astonishing nature that it really seemed little short of miraculous. She claims that her system of mental treatment benefits a wide range of ailments. If people are troubled or worried mentally or spiritually, or, on the other hand, have physical ailments, it makes no difference, she seems to do them all good."

Until now Mrs. Fitts has refused to say anything for publication regarding herself, though she has more than once been questioned. The soul culturist is an intelligent appearing woman, of perhaps 40 years of age. In stature she is quite tall, and is rather heavily built. Her blue eyes are clear, and her round plump face is kindliness personified.

Since she began her work she has held communion with numerous people in Chicago, and many who have come from other cities. Her encouragement has been such and so urgent does she feel her call to the work that she will continue it the rest of her life.

WHAT MRS. FITTS SAYS.

"I first turned to this work," said Mrs. Fitts, "because of what seemed untruths to me which I heard uttered in the pulpits of the churches. This turned my attention towards the development of truths through the culture of the soul, and I have been engaged in the work ever since.

"The whole trouble is this: People do not harmonize their souls and bodies. They do not seem to know that these two beings should be friends and march together hand in hand. I do not use the word 'conversion,' but that would perhaps more nearly express what I have to effect in those who come to me for assistance. The soul and body must be unified. That drives out physical disease, which will never enter into the body. Thus, those who have have once taken the course in soul culture and have thoroughly digested it will never again suffer from any deep physical disease. Whatever little ailment may ever come to them they will never again be ill and death will come only when the body wears out.

"Now as to the spiritual and intellectual side of life. Soul culture brings peace and happiness. I don't believe there is as happy a woman in the city of Chicago as I am. Every day of my life I am doing good to somebody, and that brings me happiness. This education once given to people banishes their selfish thoughts and ambitions and they begin to look upon life as they really should, from more of an impersonal standpoint, so to speak. Their sordid passions and evil desires are vanquished and they live life as it should be lived.

"I never have seen two souls alike in the world any more than you have seen two faces alike, and when it comes to individual treatment I never handle any two in the same way. I see how each soul is cramped or warped and treat it accordingly. After it has once been placed in a receptive state it is so easy to lead it gently along the paths of truth, and that is all we aim to accomplish."

This new cult is just tinged with orthodoxy, but not enough to render it very unpalatable. It is no doubt under angelic guidance, and will be instrumental in doing great good. We extend the right hand of fellowship to this liberalizing movement. DIVINE WRIGHT.

CHALLENGE THE ENEMY

W. H. Bach at Springfield, Mass.

New Light on the Music Question—How the Brave Women "Hold the Fort."

The Progressive Thinker has just arrived, and it comes like a visit from old friends. Brother Francis, I think the success of the paper can be laid to the columns headed "General Survey" as much as any one thing.

Everybody has something good to say in this week's paper it seems to me. By the way, whenever our Moses opens his mouth, or pushes his pen on the questions relating to the Bible he always has something good to give forth. How much better it is to learn the true meaning of things than to go on continually in the dark and say: "I don't believe it," when you don't know what you are believing or disbelieving.

By the way, is it not strange how many people are seeking to know more of the Bible and trying to inform themselves so they cannot only meet their orthodox friends on their own ground, but can even throw down the gauntlet and challenge a discussion? This has been done by our leaders many times but never have I seen it manifested among the laymen as it is to-day.

Last Sunday evening before the meeting of the Ladies' Aid Spiritualist Society of this city, whom I am serving for the season, I spoke on "Bible Spiritualism" and at the close of the meeting there was but one fault found: "It was too short." Then all through the present week, when I have met the members of our society they say: "Give us some more like last Sunday." I will now begin a series of lectures on "Spiritualism and Mediumship from the Bible."

I noted the criticism on President Barrett's report on music. H. D. Barrett does not need the feeble words I say to defend him either on the score of music or any other point that may be taken up. His travels over the country have given him an opportunity that is not given to those who are located in one place and never get but a few miles away from home. I will add that after traveling over twenty-six States of the Union, and Canada, that I can heartily endorse every word Brother Barrett has said on the subject of music, as well as other matters. A writer in another Spiritualist paper takes him to task on the question of lyceums, claiming that lyceums are increasing instead of the contrary. Well, perhaps they are, but as statistics show that they have "increased" from nearly 1,200 to between thirty and forty in the last twenty years, the statement of Brother Barrett does not suffer much at the hands of his critics.

Music is an essential to our work but it must be the proper kind or it is worthless. Wherever we go we hear one or two old orthodox songs until we get sick and tired of them. "Nearer, My God, to Thee," "Sweet Bye and Bye," and "Beulah Land." These are sung over and over again. Certainly no one criticises the appropriateness of Longley's music. No one can find fault with the Spiritual Harp. If the publishers of that book could see their way to reduce the price of it from $2 to $1, I feel satisfied that their increased sales would justify it as well as the singing of Spiritualists would be improved.

What we want is a book of suitable music, containing not less than two hundred pieces, gotten out by musicians who understand their business, containing four parts and sold at not over one dollar a copy and about nine dollars a dozen, and you will find no trouble in inducing the Spiritualists to sing.

Spiritualism is in good condition in this thriving city of about 55,000 people. The society I represent is a society of ladies, organized under the laws of the State, and very ably officered and managed by the ladies. A men's society held sway for a time and the ladies acted as an auxiliary to it. When the men gave it up, the ladies came bravely to the front and held the fort, and have conducted regular meetings ever since. The action of these hard-working and self-sacrificing ladies deserves the unswerving support of the Spiritualists of the city. They have a hall which they rent by the year, own their own furniture and carpets, piano, dishes, stoves and, in fact, everything necessary to conduct both the social and devotional part of the society. They sublet their hall, which brings in a small revenue. They hold a social and supper each Thursday evening, which is well attended, and the spirit of harmony is everywhere manifested. Mrs. Hortense G. Holcombe is its president and I believe has held that position for eight years. It is a society to be proud of. We have music that is distinctly Spiritualistic, and there is no fault found with it either by our own people or by visiting brethren.

We have a children's lyceum, and are now arranging for a library with nearly $200 worth of books donated. This is business. W. H. BACH.

"Cosmian Hymn Book." A collection of original and selected hymns, for liberal and ethical societies, for schools and the home; compiled by L. K. Washburn. This volume meets a public want. It comprises 248 choice selections of poetry and music, embodying the highest moral sentiment, and free from all sectarianism. Price, 50c. For sale at this office.

"Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." Church people are cautioned not to open this book, as its comical pictures, based on Bible texts, tend to induce uncontrollable levity. It is a book for the freethinker who wishes to rest from busy cares, and drive away ennui. Price, in strong board covers, $1: cloth $1.50. For sale at this office.

A PROPOSITION

For a Spiritual Camp at Hydesville, N. Y.

Stirring Words from a Hustling Organizer.

To the Editor:—As I have been designated by "The Progressive Thinker," as a "hustler," at organizing camps, and as I have been engaged in that particular business for the past three years, it has been the means of calling my attention to the proposal of Bro. Geo. W. Kates and several others in regard to establishing a camp-meeting at Hydesville, N. Y., and if possible on the very spot where the Fox sisters first demonstrated the fact of another life beyond this earth existence.

I have been asked, by letters and by personal applications, why I did not respond to these several demands, and take the initatory steps toward forming an association with this special object in view. Therefore I will make this proposal to Bro. Kates, Bro. Wm. Cleveland, Bro. S. B. York and others: That I will make the first one on that committee to collect money for the the purpose of establishing a camp at Hydesville, N. Y., and if possible purchase property enough there for a permanent camping place and a meeting to be held every year; also, that I will act for this committee as chairman and treasurer, giving a bond, if required, for all moneys put into my hands for this purpose. I will say that my business standing is good enough without a bond, but I will give a "Bond" with four good sureties or responsible persons' names attached.

The committee ought to consist of one person, or even two persons, in each large town in the States and in the Canadas. I can find one in Hamilton, Canada; one in Rochester, N. Y.; three in Buffalo, (but one will do), possibly one in Dunkirk, N. Y., and one in Detroit, Mich.

I would say further that I will visit Hydesville if required and will attend at the first camp-meeting and aid in forming a camp association, as I have done at other camps, and I will do it in the same manner as I have done at other camps. All members of this committee will be required to collect funds for this purpose and give receipts for same; and if The Progressive Thinker will do so, each subscriber will be acknowledged in the columns of that valuable journal. I have been offered money this very day here in Buffalo for this purpose and I can raise money in Rochester also. Rochester is only a few miles from Hydesville.

Now if anyone has a better plan than mine, let them promulgate it, and I will step down and out.

If no one has a better plan, than let those that are interested write me at once and say that they will act with us in this grand work, and if we cannot raise enough funds this year, we will work until we can raise it; and you can put me down at the head of the list of subscribers. Hoping and waiting, I am fraternally yours. J. W. DENNIS.

Buffalo, N. Y.

THE LINCOLN BAND SOCIETY.

To the Editor:—About two years ago Mrs. H. E. Lepper, who has been for years noted as a successful psychometrist and healer in Minneapolis, Minn., received a commission from Abraham Lincoln to commence the organization of liberal minded people into a society, having for its avowed object "The propagation, and advancement of moral, religious, and spiritual thought." It was stated to her that in co-operation in this movement another band would be formed on the spirit-side of life, and to every person who joined on this side, another in sympathy would join the organization on the unseen side.

She was instructed to get one hundred names of persons of good moral character who were in favor of such a movement, and then to organize and incorporate under the provisions of the law of the State of Minnesota under the name: "The Lincoln Band Liberal Spiritual Society."

Mrs. Lepper received this commission as a sacred one, and has since been carrying it into practical operation. She fitted up a neat and suitable hall in her residence, at No. 309, Washington avenue, S. E., on the Inter-Urban Electric car line between the Twin Cities in which she has been holding meetings on Sunday and Thursday evenings, with seats free, and these have been well attended by thoughtful and intelligent people, who have been admitted to full membership to the society from week to week until the membership now reaches considerably over one hundred. A special meeting was called for Sunday, Nov. 29th, 1896, at 2 p. m., for the purpose of adopting articles of incorporation, and by-laws and effecting a full organization as originally instructed, and a liberal number of the members responded to the call on the specified time. Articles of incorporation, under the law of the State, were prepared, together with a suitable set of by-laws, for the future working of the society, which were adopted, and a board of nine trustees was selected, who reported the names of the following persons as the officers of the Lincoln Band Liberal Spiritual Society of Minnesota. President, Mrs. Emily L. Lepper; vice- president, Mrs. S. M. Lowell; secretary, O. W. Smith; treasurer, Henry E. Lepper. These persons were then elected to hold office until the first annual meeting of the members of the society, which will be held on the second Thursday of July, 1897, when their successors are to be elected as provided by the by-laws of the organization.

The Lincoln Band Liberal Spiritual Sosciety is, therefore, now a regularly incorporated religious body, and its avowed object, "The advancement and propagation of moral, religious, and spiritual thought," is believed to be broad enough to enlist the sympathy and encouragement of all workers in humanity's cause. It's platform will be free, and open for the discussion of all themes which have for their object the elevation of humanity to a higher moral, religious, or spiritual plane, and the only requisite for membership is good moral character, and pledging co-operation in the avowed work of the society.

Regular meetings will be held for the present at Mrs. Lepper's hall, No. 309 Washington avenue, S. E., in Minneapolis, on Sunday and Thursday evenings of each week. All seats free. Notices of the Sunday meetings, with name of speaker and subject are published in the Saturday evening and Sunday morning Minneapolis papers.

A STRONG APPEAL

To Spiritualists to Rise in Their Might,

And Cleanse Their Ranks of All Fakirs and Pretenders.

To the Editor:—I notice trenchant articles lately in your columns regarding mediums, who resort to deception at times; may they awaken earnest thought among Spiritualists. I wish to speak of another and growing necessity for reform, and to point out the ease with which it can be accomplished. It is a work which does not require this nice discrimination between the intentionally fraudulent worker and the one who has met antagonistic patrons; it is a work in which all can unite without fear of doing injustice. I allude to the fortune-tellers, charm-sellers—the tramps in the rear of our army who of mediumship and befool and fleece the public by means of its sacred livery. There are a large number of Spiritualists and investigators in every community, who never read a Spiritual paper or attend a lecture. This is not best for them, it is true, nevertheless it is a condition which has been and seems to be a fixed feature. By far the greatest number of these people investigate Spiritualism through the "ads" in the daily press just as they seek their theater, coal, groceries, dentist, or lawyer through this channel. Managers of societies often feel this almost a personal grievance; that it is a fact no one doubts. I for one can not see why a medium should not insert his card in the daily press; neither can I see why the public should not investigate through this channel. Are Spiritualists

THEIR BROTHER'S KEEPER?

It is the public—the great uninformed, unthinking masses—which needs the educating forces of Spiritualism, and which Spiritualists and mediums wish to reach. People who are ignorant of the tramp followers which disgrace our cause, and record the thoughtlessness of Spiritualists, reason that as they have heard of the miracles accomplished through mediums, so these people who advertise to change luck; to unveil the future; unfold all things; to be the greatest medium on earth," etc., etc., ad nauseam; must be mediums or they would not be allowed by Spiritualists to thus advertise contrary to law and the usual standards of human interest in their religion.

There are in Milwaukee to-day several charm-selling, fortune-telling madames and male bipeds of the same species, and the vileness which fills the "classified" column of the daily press in fake "ads" is enough to forever less just, less holy, than ours; enough to forever banish from the public mind anything but Spiritualism; enough to damn as idiots or reprobates anybody who believes in spirit return, in the minds of intelligent people who do not yet know where to investigate.

The question is, do not Spiritualists owe a duty to the public—especially a duty which is so easy of fulfillment and so wholly devoid of embarrassing features? Americans have many "sins of omission" recorded on these shores of time, and Spiritualists are not free from this peculiarity, by any means. Old-time Spiritualists, when told of the wrongs done to innocent seekers of the benefits of mediumship, merely laugh when reminded of the pretenders who disgust the public, and say: Well, let them do as I did—go to the genuine medium.

They do not stop to think of the lives directed wrongly; of the confidence which generally never is restored; because it is a matter so easily righted, and yet is left undone.

We as Spiritualists have enough to suffer from the limitations of mediumship which are not understood by some of our less well-informed mediums and Spiritualists without carrying the load of distrust thrust upon our backs by known fakes. Ten,—yes, fifty years from to-day, Spiritualism and Spiritualists will still be looked upon with unutterable disgust by tens of thousands who have unwittingly investigated it through the fortune-telling class; and years from now Spiritualists will feel the effects of this deluge of fraud in their business and social relations; in their lyceums and meetings.

Years from now, hundreds of people will be in the shadow of ignorance and the sorrows of death's visitations, through the failure of the Spiritualists, either as committees from their respective societies or as individuals, to take the half-hour necessary to warn these fakes who so boldly violate the law, to leave town; or failing that to call on the chief of police and point out the advertisement or circular.

"But," says one in alarm, "the police arrest everyone; all will suffer." I for one do not believe that. Whenever the police find that Spiritualists are earnestly striving to eliminate fraud, acknowledged workers will not be molested.

THEN, AND NOT TILL THEN will we have the respect of the investigating and non-investigating public.

If honest mediums are arrested unjustly in the blundering or malicious efforts of the police, it might as well be one time as another, for it certainly comes after on with this state of affairs unchecked. I believe that every wholesale arrest of mediums which has been made in the last ten years has been led up to by the criminal thoughtlessness or indifference of Spiritualists in allowing charm-selling and fortune-telling in their city under the name of mediumship.

The dearest friends I have or ever expect to have are Spiritualists, and I love Spiritualism, or I should not have turned my back as hundreds of others have done, upon church friends to cling to it. I certainly never had a greater number of friends either in or out of the Spiritualist fold than I have in Milwaukee; neither do I speak of the fortune-telling, charm-selling nuisance from lack of patronage myself. I have a large private work in this city; as I have also had in each city I have visited for any length of time. so I cannot be accused of ulterior or inharmonious motives in thus commenting upon the general negligence of Spiritualists in this regard.

May our people awaken to their position as having received this greater knowledge and recognize that they thus have a stronger incentive to LEAVE NO DUTY UNDONE.

If you do not want fellowship with the angels, why seek to touch the hands of those ministering hosts who toil and watch unceasingly that these truths may find cleanly channels through which to reach those yet in the mortal life? Why become a Spiritualist at all, unless you are willing to realize that it brings to you added duties?

I have a dear friend in Lexington, Ky., who feels that his guides have promised him mediumship. He does not get it readily, because he does not understand the laws; but he perseveres and says he never will meet his loved ones in the higher life with the possibility of their saying that he was not faithful in trying.

How many of us, dear brother and sister Spiritualists, are so faithful in our trying to help humanity to understand these truths that we can face the patient workers of with calm hearts; and unflinching souls when that change called death comes to us?

A public medium has many responsibilities thrust upon him. Inexperienced young people seek him to obtain confirmation of their hopes or fears; marriages are many times made upon information given regarding the character of the opposite party; business investments are dealt with according to information obtained by the psychometric; failings of temperament which often would bring utter misery in business and home life are corrected by the kindly advice given by the guide of the medium; harmony is often restored in the home; sorrowing souls sitting within the shadows of death's visitations, are made happier, and people on the downward grade are helped upward by the ministry of spirits through the honest media of the day.

Spiritualists as a body do not dream of the importance of this work or its extent. The most delicate affairs of life, the most sacred sorrows, the most unutterable joys, are brought to the medium (by people who do not, will not, can not, and are not willing to try to understand our philosophy) for assistance, assuagance or confirmation. Call this confidence silly, if you will, yet it is nevertheless a fact. The medium holds this position through powers of revealment; the fortune-teller obtains the victim's confidence sometimes from credulity on the sitter's part, but generally on the strength of the work done by the honest mediums of the day. This position as participant in heart secrets has never been held so wholly by any other class of people unless by confessors in medieval times.

Then shall it not be be held by those who strive to do right, by those who will at least allow the sorrowing, grief-stricken or trusting soul to depart from that sanctum sanctorum, the seance room without being by these human vampires who sell "magic belts and charms," and who, in their endeavor to keep customers, give advice for the future sure to coincide with their patrons' views rather than to redound to their advantage

Each fortune-teller using the name of medium, crowds out an honest medium; and the thoughtlessness of Spiritualists in allowing this condition to exist, upon fraudulent work, discourages and disheartens those who seek to do right, and eventually through starvation drives morally unbalanced younger mediums to herd with these gutter-snipes and harpies.

PLACES A PREMIUM

The remedy is so easily applied that it is to be hoped that societies will unite all along the line; from committees for that purpose and stop this burglarious use of the name of mediumship by those who advertise in this manner, and who so very, very commonly use their rooms, supposed to be devoted to the most sacred scenes of earth, for purposes of assignation and prostitution.

To-day fortune-telling and charm-selling by those who call themselves mediums clothes the disreputable in satins, sealskins and diamonds; houses and nourishes them elegantly and gains even a large patronage from Spiritualists; while mediums of times luxuriate in perhaps one barely decent suit, one or two square meals per week, and the smallest, cheapest housing obtainable!

That these are facts are patent to all who know aught of the subject. The columns of the daily press of our large and small cities furnish the key to the situation. Those printers' bills, forty and fifty dollars per month, must be met some way. Honest mediums, outside of a half dozen exceptions, find it impossible to spend at the rate of two or three hundred dollars per month, without disgracing the fair word which means so much to humanity.

This is a large responsibility, so far unassumed by Spiritualists the world over, which must be lifted to their shoulders and nobly borne.

I would suggest that the N. S. A. advise all local societies to appoint a committee for this purpose alone, and that all other organizations co-operate.

In order not to be misunderstood by those who read hastily, I wish to again state that so far as I am concerned, I do not by this article wish to impugn the motives of any one Spiritualist or of Spiritualists as individuals. A people which is disorganized always works slowly; yet the responsibility is no less theirs. We have many hundreds of honest mediums, yet it certainly cannot be considered their portion to cleanse these augean stables of fakirism, and I am tempted to again remark par parenthesis that we always have enough unkind criticism from those who do not understand our motives, when we speak or write of these matters, to induce most of our mediums to prefer to let the matter rest until the Spiritualists themselves awaken as a body to the needs of the hour for Spiritualism, and to their duties in this matter.

My last public work in Michigan was at Augusta, where I lectured and gave tests and inspirational songs and my little daughters sang. Out of a population of five hundred, two hundred and fifty attended the services in the a. m. and over three hundred were present in the evening. Spiritualists in small towns should feel more encouraged in giving of the bread of life to the multitude. We were very pleasantly entertained while there by Mesdames Henry Wilson, Cichester, and Piper. I am now so situated that I can respond to calls. Those from the South solicited. Address is 524 Jackson avenue, Milwaukee, Wis.

CARRIE FULLER WEATHERFORD.

A new edition of "Three Sevens," by the Phelon's, is just issued. The May Arena says: "The gist of such books as Dr. Phelon's "Three Sevens," and other works descriptive of or alluding to the various occult societies, which seem to have existed for ages, has never, until recently, been said so openly and plainly that 'he who runs may read.'" Cloth $1.25, postpaid. For sale at this office.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and well repaid by its perusal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Great Roman Anaconda." By Prof. Geo. P. Rudolph, Ph.D., ex-priest of the diocese of Cleveland, O. A sharp and pointed letter to Bishop Horstmann. It is good reading, and should be widely distributed, that people may be enlightened concerning the ways and methods of Rome and its priesthood. Price 15c. For sale at this office.

MATERIALIZATION SEANCES.

And Other Spiritual Phenomena.

"* * * And then I dived,
In my lone wanderings, to the caves of death,
Searching its cause in its effect, and drew
From withered bones, and skulls, and heaped-up-dust,
Conclusions most forbidden. * * * I made
Mine eyes familiar with eternity."
—Byron.

Believing that an account of the manifestations occurring in the presence of Annie Wheeler, as the medium, will be interesting to those who have never had the pleasure of witnessing such phenomena, I will relate a moiety of what has transpired in two or three of the hundred seances I have had with that matchless medium.

By way of preface, I wish to say that I am always surprised and pained to hear Spiritualists express a doubt as to the genuineness of materializations in general. Possibly particular instances might not be entitled to full credence, but to assail that phase of manifestation in general is unjust to mediums who are always honest, and uncharitable to those who are occasionally placed in a position where justice and candor might hesitate to accuse or applaud.

Lord Byron informed me, at a recent seance, that there was, practically, no limit to the power of the spirit world if the proper conditions were provided, and the necessary media employed.

Mr. Wheeler now gives his materialization seances while he is locked in a solid wooden box, put together with cleats on all the corners. Every sitter is invited to closely scrutinize the box before and after he is placed in it, and at any time.

We used a bed-room, adjoining the parlor, to place the box in, and hung a pair of black curtains at the door. Mr. Wheeler was locked in and the key kept by the incarcerating committee. The music-box was started; a song was sung, and the spirit manager walks out in a fair light, with sleeves rolled above the elbows, and kneeling in front of the curtains he rubs the carpet of black until a little heap, resembling cotton waste, or snow, is piled before him; this he rapidly transforms into a fabric of surpassing beauty and considerable magnitude. No mortal hand or loom ever wove such delicate patterns of film. Could they, it would require many months of unremitting toil (we should judge thirty-six) and when completed

"Doubloons a hundred I would pay,
And think its ransom cheap that day."

If the sitters are congenial, Fritz walks around the circle and permits them to inspect it.

Next Lord Byron appeared, attired in his spiritual robes of spotless white; upon his head was a crown of stars, and artistically arranged upon his clothing were more of these symbols of superior attainments. He bowed, and placing his hand to his head, in the manner of a military salute. The stars were extinguished during the time that the fingers remained in contact with the hair; raising them the stars simultaneously appeared, and as quickly disappeared when he again touched his hair. This was done several times in order to show, by this metamorphosis, that the apparition before us was a spirit entity, clothed in a mundane garb, and not the result of mortal legerdemain. At other times he appeared when the astral emblems of sublimity consisted of a bracelet upon the wrist only, and not much larger than the end of an unsharpened leadpencil. This was invariably the case when the sitters were not of poetic tendencies.

Geo. Washington next came through the parted curtains, dressed in his military uniform. His figure and bearing was majestic and "every inch a king;" and though entitled to more than regal homage, with the magnanimity of a noble nature he declined to accept as his own the result of the revolutionary struggle. As he stepped back behind the curtain I quoted this from Lord Byron's ode to Napoleon:

"Where may the wearied eye repose,
When gazing on the Great;
Where neither guilty glory glows
Nor despicable state?
Yes—one—the first—the last—the best—
The Cincinnatus of the West,
Whom envy dared not hate,
Bequeath the name of Washington,
To make man blush there was but one!"

As this citation was in the nature of an encore, he again appeared before the curtain and, with deferential gravity, bowed his thanks to me, and then saluted the audience with a bow and a courteous gesture of the hand.

I again quoted from Byron's allusion to Napoleon:

"Can tyrants but by tyrants conquered be,
And freedom find no champion and no child,
Such as Columbia saw arise when she
Sprung forth a Pallas armed and undefiled?
Or must such minds be nourished in the wild,
Deep in the unpruned forest, midst the roar
Of cataracts, where nursing Nature smiled
On infant Washington? Has earth no more
Such seeds within her breast, or Europe no such shore?"

"Yes, but the chief credit for the outcome of that struggle should be given to those who helped us in our hour of need," said Washington.

My spirit wife next came between the parted curtains, carrying a willow rocker which had been much used by her; this she placed about three feet in front of the curtain. She then stepped behind the curtains and turned on the light to its full strength, and walked out in a light that permitted every lineament of her features to be fully identified, and smiling showed the gold filling in a front tooth.

Robert Burns came out in the costume in vogue in his country at the time of his demise, bowed to the audience, and retiring behind the curtain took a flower from the vase and passed it through—not between but through—the solid curtain. Later a trumpet was thrust through the curtain while a spirit conversed with a sitter. No rent was made in the curtain, and after a two-minute conversation the trumpet was dropped, falling to the bottom of the curtain. If the fibres separated for the material trumpet to pass by they must have closed instantaneously after the passage, for the eye could detect no opening. At another time my handkerchief was borrowed, and while the curtain was held taut by invisible hands, the spirit operator, who was visible, passed it through the solid curtain. A lady at the end of the circle was immediately called up and her hand was placed on the particular locality on the curtain from whence the handkerchief had issued. (She afterwards said, that as the handkerchief came through, the thought ran through her mind that there must be a hole in the curtain, and the spirit operator reading the doubt in her mind, immediately satisfied her on that point.) A handkerchief of solid linen was again borrowed from a sitter, and the spirit operator commenced at one corner and changed it into a lovely lace affair in something like fifteen seconds, and after it had been examined it was slowly reinvested with its original form, i. e., made into a solid cambric square handkerchief again.

To show that the bodies built up are susceptible to sudden changes from specific to general, and from general to specific again, Fritz makes a salaam to the sitters; when his head touches the floor the form is that of a short man; it rises instantly, but it is now a lady at least six or eight inches taller than Fritz, and with all a woman's loveliness of feature.

It seems in this case that Fritz's spirit, which is invisible to us, has vacated the form unperceived, and as imperceptibly another spirit has taken possession of the tenement.

At one seance two children in the audience were called to the curtain, and two little Indian girls came out and stood up to their backs, to be measured; then the Nitchie maidens, as the little Chippewa calls herself, looked over the children's clothes; inspecting them with mingled curiosity and looks of wonder. Then one of the little Indian girls backed up to the child she measured with before, and, standing on her tip-toes, exclaimed facetiously: "My! I've growed an inch!" Five minutes, probably, were spent by the two spirit and two mortal children in youthful amusements.

For the benefit of your readers, who may be sceptically inclined, I will say that Mr. Wheeler is about five feet and four inches, and that the spirits exhibiting themselves were from three feet to six feet and six inches. There were two or three Indians taller than Washington.

I may, at some future time, say something about the slate-writings and trumpet seances I have had with Mr. Wheeler. Should anyone desire to be placed in communication with him, I will engage to do so provided a stamped envelope is enclosed.

PHILANTHROPIC WORK.

School for Boys in Jail Is Established.

The Woman's Club of Chicago and particularly Miss Florence Hathorn, its representative, has found a fruitful field for its work of noble philanthropy in attempting to build up the moral and mental stature of the boys who come as prisoners to the County Jail. The first effort to rescue these children from some of the debasing influences of their environment was made about eight years ago, but not until the Woman's Club took up the project and Miss Hathorn volunteered to be the active agent in the work did there appear any convincing signs of success.

The most that can be done is to subject the novitiates in crime to a brief experience in a generally unfamiliar atmosphere of honesty and industry, and this is accomplished through the medium of a form of school. But the pupils remain for so short a time that it is impracticable to attempt any elaborate system of instruction and greater attention is paid to diverting to honorable channels such knowledge as the children may possess and to implanting germs of right-living that may bear fruit when the recipients return to the world. Aside from this scheme of general instruction the children are brought into close contact with a practical and sincere sympathy that is able to discern the really true hearts which have been only slightly blackened with vice. These children, who might be termed the better ones, are the objects of special solicitude and care and are so zealously and patiently nurtured, not only while in the jail but after they leave it, that many instances of restoration to absolute integrity are recorded.

The character of the work, which is not confined to a routine but is adapted continually to the changing conditions, is beneficent in the extreme. It attacks with the most effective weapons the world of crime in its most vital part. The children who have been barely launched on the downward path are still susceptible to honest precepts and ambitions and may be turned back to decent lives by even a slight, if sincere, show of interest. A little training, a little instruction, a little advice, and, above all, a little genuine human sympathy at this crucial age when character is forming may change the current of an entire life. Such changes have been made in this jail school and more will be made as the work progresses.

But there is room for greater endeavor in the same field. Similar work should be done in every institution where boys are held as prisoners, and girls also should be brought under the same wholesome influences. A vigorous and concerted attack on crime when its clutch on human hearts is still disputed by conscience will go far to raise the standard of the next generation.—Chicago Tribune.

"History of the Inquisition." Every citizen of our country should read this concise history of that Romish churchly institution known as the Inquisition. The animus of Romanism against all institutions, beliefs and parties not in conformity with the ruling powers of the Romish hierarchy is plainly shown in these statements of veritable history. The devilishness and murderous malignity of the "Holy Inquisition" is scarcely paralleled in all the world's records of inhuman atrocities. It is for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid for 25c.

"Angel Whisperings for the Searcher After Truth." By Hattie J. Ray. A volume of genuine poems, of such fine moral and spiritual tone that all will be pleased and benefited by it. For sale at this office. Price $1

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. W. M. Lockwood. Prof. Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents an succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. For sale at this office. Price 25 cents

"The Philosophy of Spirit, and the Spirit-World." By Hudson Tuttle. A most able and interesting presentation of a most important subject. Every Spiritualist and every inquirer into the proofs and philosophy of Spiritualism should have this excellent book. Cloth, $1. For sale at this office.

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records," Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

A PROGRAMME.

ENTIRELY NEW AND PRESENTED TO OUR MANY READERS.

Three Excellent Books Furnished at Cost.

The Progressive Thinker is published not alone to promote the prosperity of its editor and publisher, but it has the welfare of its numerous subscribers at heart. With that end in view we put the price of the paper at one dollar per year, and during these hard times we have been able to maintain it at that price, without begging for assistance or without having debts or obligations to accumulate to harass us. Our main object is to promote the interests of Spiritualism; to make each family feel that its members are enriched in mind and spirituality by the presence of The Progressive Thinker. And in order to continue in a measure that status, we have changed our programme somewhat.

We have just published a remarkable book, the title of which is "The Next World Interviewed." It is intensely interesting and instructive, and should be in every family. Hon. Arthur MacArthur, at one time Judge of the Supreme Court, thus speaks of the work:

"The Next World Interviewed," by Mrs. S. G. Horn, is a book of power and interest to all those who are inclined to the study of spiritual phenomena, or who desire to know something about the sublime teachings that come from supernatural intercourse. The revelations are of such an extraordinary character that the attention is not only attracted by the nature of the communications, but the mind is filled with amazement at the range of thought and the grand views that are presented of the invisible life.

The communications are varied according to the character of the communicator, and each relates an experience of his own. For instance, the poet Longfellow, when the lethargy, that for a few seconds had enthralled his senses, had passed away, heard a great chorus of voices singing words taken from his own Psalm of Life. De Quincey finds that the splendors in the visions of an opium eater grow pale before the transcendent realities that open to a spirit's sight in the Land of Souls, and Darwin affirms that could he have lived an hundred years longer, he would have been able to demonstrate the evolution of an angel from a man.

The book is composed of communications received through the mediumship of Mrs. Horn, while in a trance condition, and reveal the influence of a high order of spirit intelligence on every page. The scenes described and the vivid spectacle of the Heavenly life are full of grandeur, and recall the highest passages in our best poetry.

Nothing can be finer than the description of the homes of our departed friends. The life of usefulness they lead is very different from the current views on that subject. Instead of the supposed indolence of Spirit-life, each one is constantly employed in some work of self-improvement, or in some effort for the general good.

Titian paints in his spirit-home among the stars, where he has a studio, and his splendid color realizes the ideal in that land of love and beauty; the patriot soul of Lincoln loves and watches over the country for which he lost his life, and John Stuart Mill, who could find no proof of any life but this on earth, reveals the undying principle stamped upon his spirit that renders him immortal.

Indeed, throughout all these wonderful sketches, the mind realizes the full grandeur of its own destiny, and the great future in which it is to live forever. Scenes of surpassing loveliness and a boundless prospect of man's activities are disclosed in this new sphere of existence, and one cannot but feel that he is reading messages of plain and honest truth from those who speak, and know and see what they relate.

It is an animating thought that springs up in the mind on the perusal of this book. The beauties of life in the world of spirit are laid open to our gaze and the various changes that are wrought in the views and opinions that were entertained on earth by the greatest thinkers, show how far knowledge and science have been from grasping the laws of the spiritual spheres, and how much grander existence is when it becomes immortal. The humble and great often reverse positions, and the inequalities of earth conditions are rectified by a just and equitable balance, that has for its foundation the work and worth that have marked the life of each member of the human family. Let these pages be read with candor, and skepticism and atheism would be converted into belief, and a devotional sense of reverence and joy would take the place of hesitation; and even the professed Christian will find his doubts of the future swept away, and his views of the everlasting goodness of God corroborated by the most infallible assurances.

There is no phase of philosophical hesitation or indifference but what would be startled by this mighty blazon of the unknown and invisible universe, and if the devotees of science would read and ponder these marvelous pages, their disdain would be turned into awe and admiration at the grand world of life and wisdom which they reveal. The soul who can contemplate these messages of love and truth without emotion is not in a condition to receive the proof of one who should rise from the grave to testify to the same things, for there is an air of reality and naturalness that attracts the common feelings of our better self against all the suggestions of prejudice or tradition. The world of sense is confronted with the direct revelation of a higher form of life. Those who have lived great lives here below come back to inform us of their experience there, and to give us the assurance of their great souls that they still live, and that the world of spirit is as real as this one; they give their names, they state their views, they relate the facts, all in perfect conformity with their individual gifts and peculiarities, and call upon their friends who linger below to read and believe as if they stood with them face to face, after the manner of earthly intercourse, and this transcendent appeal is couched in terms so exquisite and appropriate as to show that only the wise, the gifted and the cultured ones are the authors of these divine passages. The philosopher, the poet, the man of letters, the orator, the statesman and the divine, the doubter, the religionist and the unbeliever unite in this grand testimonial of the eternal existence of the soul.

It is a noble array of genius, learning and character to the greatest and grandest truth that any of them had ever examined or proclaimed, and they now come from their glorious abode to communicate the glad tidings of immortality to all the children of men.

In conclusion we would say that the rare mediumistic gifts of Mrs. Horn are singularly free from every selfish or mercenary motive. She exercises them for the good of her friends, and scarcely ever appears in public work. Her gentle and lovely character is a testimony of the exalted nature of the intelligence that controls her, and of the purity and good faith of whatever appears in this volume.

The plates of the above remarkable book have been presented to us by Henry J. Horn, of Washington, D. C. One edition only had been issued, and it sold for $1.50 per copy. This book is published as "The Progressive Thinker Library," and is only one of a series to be published, to be furnished to our subscribers at a nominal cost. Just think, Spiritualists, of the great good that can be accomplished through the instrumentality of the plan!

"The Next World Interviewed" contains communications from many distinguished individuals, and they are, indeed, highly interesting and instructive. It is neatly bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and will be furnished to our patrons, post paid, for 35 cents a copy. That is, anyone sending a year's subscription for The Progressive Thinker can have the book at that price, 35 cents, postage paid.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes, containing an aggregate of 1050 pages, will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription, on the following terms:

"The Next World Interviewed."

The Encyclopædia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I of the Encyclopædia	$ .45
Vol. II of the Encyclopædia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

☞ Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

Drs. Maybe and..... Mustbe.

You choose the old doctor before the young one. Why? Because you don't want to entrust your life in inexperienced hands. True, the young doctor may be experienced. But the old doctor must be. You take no chances with Dr. Maybe, when Dr. Mustbe is in reach. Same with medicines as with medicine makers—the long-tried remedy has your confidence. You prefer experience to experiment—when you are concerned. The new remedy may be good—but let somebody else prove it. The old remedy must be good—judged on its record of cures. Just one more reason for choosing AYER'S Sarsaparilla in preference to any other. It has been the standard household Sarsaparilla for half a century. Its record inspires confidence — fifty years of cures. If others may be good, Ayer's Sarsaparilla must be. You take no chances when you take AYER'S Sarsaparilla.

The Molecular Hypothesis OF NATURE.

BY PROF. W. M. LOCKWOOD.

The only treatise ever offered the reading and thinking public in the interest of modern Spiritualism, that is absolutely free from the theories of superstition, and which

Demonstrates continuity of life and our environment of spiritual influences, from the data of modern physical and physiological science.

To the Spiritualist, an impregnable foundation of scientific data and verified facts.

To the materialist and skeptic, a revelation of the invisible energies operative in Nature's formula of evolution.

To the ecclesiastic, a new heaven and a new earth. A book to read, to study and think about. A condensed volume of scientific information for 25 cents. Address your orders to

GENERAL SURVEY

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Doings, Etc.

Bear in mind, please, that we cannot publish weekly reports of meetings. Whenever a change is made in speakers, or anything of special interest, send us a brief item, please. A great deal can be expressed in a dozen lines; but long reports will not be used. Meetings are of local interest only. We extend a cordial invitation to all speakers to send in their appointments to lecture, and general movements, which will be read by at least 40,000. We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion.

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

An entertainment and hop was held by The Students of Nature, at Merrick's Hall, corner Milwaukee avenue and Rockwell street, on the evening of November 28, at which a very fine programme was selected. Praise is to be given to all who appeared upon the stage and entertained the audience by very fine and instructive speaking, mostly done by small children ranging from 5 to 14 years. After the exercises were finished, the floor was cleared and dancing was indulged in until a late hour. The Students of Nature society feel proud of having had the opportunity of receiving and greeting their many friends, and thank all for their kindness and the good will they have shown to them.

Amae Wheeler writes: "I have been filling some very successful engagements at Broken Bow, Lincoln and Omaha, Neb. My route is now westward through Nebraska and Kansas, with La Junta, Melrose and Aspen, Col., as objective points. Parties at intermediate points, desiring my services, can address me at Avoco, Iowa, and it will be forwarded to me en route. My phases of mediumship are full form materialization, light seances, trumpet speaking and independent slate-writing, in bright sunlight, all given under strict test conditions."

Wm. H. Fuller M. D., writes from Ionia, Mich.: "I often look back to the year of '63, when my wife and I became converted by the phenomena of Spiritualism, although we were both members of the Baptist Church, in good standing. Our oldest daughter took malignant scarlet fever and only lived twelve hours. About her last words, she said: "Mamma you will never dress me more, for an angel has come fore me, and I want to go with him to be an angel." Soon after her death, we began to hear those tiny raps, in and about our sleeping room. We began to think her spirit had returned to communicate with us. We had formerly attended circles and heard the knockings, as they called them, but we were skeptical; however, these raps were so different from any we had ever heard, it set us thinking." Through the mediumship of a Mrs. Thompson they received conclusive evidence of spirit return, and since then he has developed as an automatic writer.

Emma B. Fenimore writes: "A literary, musical entertainment with supper, was held at the South Chicago Spiritual Church, 93d and Erie streets, on the evening of November 24th. A large, intelligent, and appreciative audience assembled, although it rained. The pastor Mrs. Lee Norie Claman, gave some wonderful tests and psychometric readings. Songs and recitations by local talent were appreciated. Mr. Ben. Claman gave some dialect impersonations and sang well, two beautiful songs. Table-tipping by four beautiful white robed little girls was a novel feature much enjoyed by the audience. A city friend of the pastor gave a short talk on Spiritualism, growth and prayer ending her remarks by reading an inspired poem written by her for the occasion entitled 'At-one-ment.'"

Dr. T. Wilkins reports excellent results in his magnetic treatments on the South Side. He can be summoned to any part of the city by postal card.

Mrs. Delia Karcher is located at Deadwood, S. Dak., and desires to correspond with former friends and acquaintances.

Mrs. Virginie Barrett desires to make engagements with societies in the State of New York and other States, for camps for 1897. Has some dates open for 1897. Terms reasonable. She will organize societies. For this month, address No. 12 Purdy street, Bath, N. Y.; or 499 Seventh street East, Indianapolis, Ind. Would like to hear from the Lockport, Buffalo and Elmira societies.

Mrs. Sadie Cook writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "On Sunday evening, November 22, at Scottish Hall, a seance was given by Edward K. Earle, and certainly it was the finest ever witnessed in San Francisco. Every seat in the large hall was occupied by an intelligent and appreciative audience. After the opening exercises, he left the platform, passed among the people, giving some fine verbal tests. In independent slate-writing some forty-five or more slates were filled with messages and many names; the writing on a number being in four or five different colors."

Mrs. J. W. Kratz would like to correspond with some good test medium, one either with phenomenal phases, such as slate-writer, or a good clairvoyant—some one fitted for public work. She desires some one to assist her for the winter. She is ready to fill engagements both for societies and camp-meetings. Her phases are psychometry and inspirational speaking. Address her at No. 1 Madison avenue, Evansville, Ind.

N. S. Bonfield writes from Lowell, Mass.: "Theo. F. Price appeared before our Psychic Club Saturday evening. He is a logical speaker, a good test medium and a genial gentleman." Mr. Price, we understand, is to come West soon to fill engagements.

Geo. L. Barrus writes: "Bro. Will C. Hodge, the genial gentleman and able Spiritualist lecturer, who has been visiting with home friends in Beloit, Wis., for the past two weeks, left for Chicago to-day. While here he gave a parlor talk at the residence of Mr. Munson, and last Sunday evening he delivered a fine lecture at Fenton Hall, to a fair-sized and appreciative audience, who will always give him a cordial welcome should he consent to speak again. Mr. Hodge's subject was: 'Spiritualism—What is it, what is it here for, and what does it design to accomplish?' He also had on exhibition some spirit portraits, produced through those fine mediums, the Bangs sisters of Chicago."

A. W. S. Rothermel is open for engagements to hold seances. His line of travel will be between Omaha and Cleveland, Ohio. His address is General Delivery, Omaha, Neb.

Mrs. C. H. Hinckley writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "New societies here are going ahead and seem to be doing well. All are friendly to each other so far as I know."

Mrs. Clara Burkholder writes from Cottage Grove, Ore., an interesting account of a seance with Mrs. Brockway. As we published a long article concerning the Brockways, in our last issue, we now merely state that Mrs. Burkholder received very fine tests under what appears to have been satisfactory conditions.

S. E. Spaulding, Cambridge, N. Y., asks: "Will Mrs. Frances Ruddick, of Franklin, Ind., if she should chance to see this in The Progressive Thinker, please let us know why she has not replied to our last two letters?"

The board of trustees of the Illinois State Association have just finished the printing of the new charters, ordination certificates and constitution and by-laws, which piece of work gives great credit to the association and cause in general. Inasmuch as this work has been carried on against innumerable obstacles and discouragements, success should crown their efforts. It is to be hoped that all Spiritualists will catch the inspiration coming from those energetic workers, and correspond immediately with the secretary, Mr. D. G. Hill, or Mr. G. L. S. Jenifer, or Geo. F. Perkins, 587 N. Clark street, for particulars in regard to organizing new societies, etc.

The address of G. W. Kates and wife during December, will be 283 Seventh street, Buffalo, N. Y.

Mrs. Steelman-Mitchell is filling a return engagement with the First Spiritual Church of Louisville, Ky., for November. For engagements she may be addressed 109 VanVoast ave., via Newport, Ky.

Mrs. S. E. Hall, inspirational speaker and test medium, has open dates for the year 1897, and would like to correspond with societies for engagements. Address her at 27 Albion street, Roxbury, Mass.

Bear in mind that Will C. Hodge can be addressed for engagements at No. 3 South Elizabeth street, Chicago.

E. W. Sprague, the lecturer and test-medium, writes from Valparaiso, Ind.: "We are stopping here for the present, visiting Mrs. E. V. Wilson. My engagement at Erie, Pa., for December having been canceled on account of that society disbanding, I have no regular engagement for this month. I also have January free. We go to Philadelphia, Pa., for February. I would be pleased to hear from any society or persons wishing my services as speaker and platform test medium. My address will be 91 S. Locust street, Valparaiso, Ind., until December 10. Letters addressed to 965 Grove street, Meadville, Pa., will be forwarded to me wherever I am."

Moses Hull will lecture at Bridgeport, Ct., the 20th and 27th of December.

Prof. W. F. Peck will be in Philadelphia during December.

Dr. J. M. Peebles writes from San Diego, Cal.: "This is December 1, warm, beautiful, sunny, and yet everything in my room is in commotion, for I am packing to leave in a few hours for San Francisco. I am to be the guest of Dr. Schlesinger until I sail December 5th. Dr. Schlesinger thinks of accompanying me. I stop five days in Honolulu, visiting the great volcano, which is now pouring out volumes of lava, and the leper hospital on an adjoining island. I want to see if the leprosy of the Hawaian Islands is of the same type as that of Madras, India and Syria, which I saw on my second tour. The three great objects of this tour are, to disseminate the grand truths of the angel ministries, study chronic diseases and their treatment, and gather documents for a large, illustrated volume to be published upon my return. Hundreds have written me that I am too old to take the journey. They remind me of the humidity of Ceylon, the fevers of India, the barbarism of natives, and think I will never come back alive. One good Boston brother reminds me of the fate of Wm. Denton, but none of these things move me. I do not know what fear is. Whether dead, so-called, or not, I shall be in the universe, over which and through which God reigns, and all ultimates, seen or unseen for the best."

Hon. H. V. Moulton is open for engagements at points within 200 miles of Grand Rapids, Mich. He will go to Washington, D. C., in January, April, July and October, to meet with the National Spiritualists' Association Board, and would be pleased to make stop-over engagements en route, going or coming, at any convenient points.

Moses and Mattie Hall have settled at Stoneham, Mass., where they can be addressed for engagements. Mr. Hull spoke last Sunday at Stoneham. On the 13th he lectures at Paine Hall, Boston; the 20th and 27th in Bridgeport, Ct.

WAS BURIED ALIVE.

Story of a Death Struggle in a Coffin, from Juneau, Alaska.

To the Editor:—A horrible tale of living inhumation comes from Juneau, Alaska, in a letter received by George P. Wirtz, of Portland, Ore. The victim of this cruel death was Carlton F. Wells, who left southern Oregon almost two years ago for the Arctic gold fields, where it is said he succeeded in accumulating $20,000, when he was, to all appearance, stricken down with heart disease in Juneau last May.

Just prior to Wells' apparent death he forwarded the bulk of his little fortune to his wife, now living in Trenton, N. J., whither he was bound when death overtook him. A little more than a month ago the undertaker who buried Wells received a letter from his widow asking that the remains be exhumed and shipped East for permanent interment. The instructions were in process of being complied with when a ghastly discovery put a stop to their execution.

When the coffin containing Wells' almost decomposed body was opened the remains were found in a strangely cramped position, the face turned toward the side of the coffin. This could not have been produced by escaping gases from the body, and close inspection showed beyond any doubt that Wells had awakened from a death-like trance after burial. The impression was accentuated by the fact that in the skeleton of his right hand was clutched a guttapercha plate bearing three false teeth, which in his agony, Wells must have torn from his mouth. Near the place where his right jaw rested in the coffin was also found a plain gold ring, which the deceased had worn on his fourth finger of the right hand.

In view of this terrible discovery the undertaker and the doctor who had attended Wells decided not to send the remains East unless forced to do so by a legal process. What excuse these people have formulated to appease the widow is not known.

The above is a horrible tale, and sustains the position taken in Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, that hundreds are buried alive. TRUTH.

"Talleyrand's Letter to the Pope" will be found especially interesting to all who would desire to make a study of Romanism and the Bible. The historic facts he states, and his keen, scathing review of Romish ideas and practices should be read by all. Sold at this office. Price 25 cents.

THANKS! THANKS!

Many Especial Reasons for Thankfulness.

Set Forth by a Worker Who Is Devoutly Thankful.

To the Editor:—"Thank you!" means a great deal when properly applied and understood. Proclamations have been issued by the many State executives, in compliance to the chief at Washington, D. C., that all those who can conveniently, should assemble at their several places of worship on the 26th of November, ostensibly for the sole purpose of expressing thankful sentiments to an overruling power for our present blessings, including the past favors of a year.

The discussion of the orthodox view of the necessity of such a day is not the purpose of the writer: But, leaving all church worship aside, and taking the psychological effects of such a day, is more in our line upon this occasion.

From our standpoint it is decidedly beneficial to set aside a day for universal expressions of gratitude to something, if nothing better than to each other, for the liberties we enjoy; for the opportunities and possibilities for advancement as a people; for the blessings of physical life; for the liberty of mental growth, by thinking, as we have an inclination; for the right to let everything go by, accepting none of the chances laid at our feet to inform ourselves upon any subject, and be an ignorant brute, fool, or a rascal, just as we desire. We have this right to either grow physically, morally and spiritually, or not.

The spirit is no respecter of persons; the principle of inspiration is for the fool or philosopher, the good or bad man.

What a privilege to learn of the wonderful possibilities of a future existence? What an infatuating study is the growth and development of the human soul!

All of these things come to us from the gifts of mediumship, by numberless methods. Some people, during the past year, having been abundantly blessed by the satisfaction of spirit communion, are correspondingly thankful: others are not—they are still racing after the same phenomena, making no application to their own future life or present existence—simply fascinated with the entertainment provided for the moment.

Some noble, self-sacrificing souls are working, as they have labored for years, for the purpose of teaching the world the philosophy as well as the phenomena, and endeavoring to make proper application of the same; but they, no doubt, feel discouraged and are not as thankful as they might be. But to these let it be said: Praise God and the angel world for the opportunities laid before you. Thank your immediate friends for their timely assistance in doing what has been done for you and your cause. Be especially grateful for the consolation you have brought to thousands of tired, weary, heartsick mortals during your term of labor.

Thanks for the fact that, one by one the people all over your broad land are becoming awakened to the necessity of the proper consolidation of your forces. That selfishness is gradually being worn off, and efforts are being made to properly organize in cities, States and nations; that better and more satisfactory results may be obtained thereby.

Be thankful, you Spiritualists in Illinois, that the State organization is not dead, but decidedly alive; that a new charter, constitution, by-laws and papers have been drafted and are in the printer's hands.

Sing hallelujah, that because of the grit and loyalty of a few, you will in the near future, be glad to receive the benefits of a State organization, even though it has cost you nothing.

Be much obliged for the generous donations from the audiences of "The Beacon Light Spiritual Church" of the North Side, Chicago, also at Bricklayer's Hall and at The Progressive Church; and don't forget that the few had to exert themselves to draw the attention of the people assembled to the objects of so worthy an organization.

Speakers and mediums, passing through Illinois should know that through the untiring zeal of a few, who are still working, the attempted crushing out of mediumship was successfully squelched some few years ago.

GEO. F. PERKINS.

THAT "APPEAL."

It Is Warmly Supplemented by Lyman C. Howe,

Who Adds His Earnest Exhortation.

So many appeals are made for different objects and beneficent work, that they doubtless impress many readers as an advertisement, who give them a glance and pass them by. I know people that entertain such a prejudice against all kinds of advertisements that they lose the zest of choice literature because it is found associated with advertisements. Such people often miss the best things, and opportunities, from ignorance of what advertisements would have told them.

In the Progressive Thinker I read, with interest, an "appeal" from the Veteran Spiritualists' Union, which made me wish I was a millionare. What would I do if I were? What do those overburdened with wealth usually do?

Hold on to their possessions and clutch their pocketbooks a little tighter, lest in some superior mood an impulse might tempt them to respond with a donation. Perhaps I would do the same, were I a millionare; but I should need to be as greatly changed in my mental character, as would be my financial conditions, if I failed to put a large share of my possessions to some such use for the betterment of the world, and relief of suffering humanity.

The Veteran Spiritualists' Union is a reliable association, with high aims and broad humitarian objects; a whole representation of the best teachings of Spiritualism. It is not only humanitarian, but educational, and the plans outlined in this appeal ought to inspire every man of means to contribute a generous quota to the fund, and speedily equip this noble enterprise with abundant means to execute and extend the splendid work designed. I do not write this to help any selfish scheme, or to advertise any personal enterprise for the financial benefit of an individual; but to call attention to the objects, and enterprise, to which Spiritualism leads, as it materializes in such organic stability as the Veteran Spiritualists' Union. No one has asked me to write this. It is a "spontaneous combustion" of my enthusiasm for the grand good work aimed at, and which can be made an easy success, if those able all over the land will show their appreciation by their acts.

I do not advocate public or private begging for anything but objects that mean something for the healing of the Nations. There have been several instances where calls, or appeals, have been made in behalf of individual, whose valuable services and great sacrifices for an unpopular cause have made the public their debtors; and such appeals are not begging, but a call for a show of justice, an equivalent for services rendered. On two occasions such appeals have been made for me, but, in both cases without my consent or knowledge. Though I worked about eight years for the cause before I ever set a price, or asked for pay—not even so much as to ask for a collection—and since then have devoted time and labor that in secular pursuits would have earned thousands of dollars, for which I received no pecuniary reward, yet I have not complained, nor have I ever asked for charity, or authorized anyone to ask it for me, publicly or privately. But what has been freely and voluntarily given I have accepted thankfully in times of financial pressure, though realizing that, for the most part, those who thus generously remembered me, were not the ones who had received my labor and offered no compensation.

Dr. Buchanan disclaims any need that should be met by donations; but he needs the ready money to enable him to give to the world the treasures of his matured genius, and it is the world that is to be the recipient of a bountiful donation, not Dr. Buchanan.

An appeal was made for A. J. Davis, some twenty-five years ago, which enabled him to do for the world what he could not have done without it; and cavil as we will, vent our spleen in bitter invectives against him, while prejudice boils over in undeveloped and narrow minds—it cannot be denied that A. J. Davis has given to the world such a wealth of wisdom and spiritual truth as has rarely, if ever, been given to the human race by any other man. That he is human all will agree—himself included. That he has made mistakes, perhaps many and serious ones, is also to be accepted, as of every other human being. But his works still stand, like an infinite tower, gilded with the glory of the eternal world, the puzzle, the wonder of the 19th century. He did more to infuse a philosophical and scientific spirit into the Spiritual movement in its early days than any other man in this world or any other; and we cheat ourselves if we allow personal prejudice—no matter what the provocation—to rob us of the spiritual values to be derived from an unprejudiced reading of the various works of A. J. Davis.

The paltry dollars donated as a token of the appreciation in which his works were held, were as a molecule weighed against the world, when estimated by the enduring values of his "Divine Revelations," in the balance against gold. But I have digressed. I want to emphasize the importance of the "appeal" by the Veteran Spiritualists' Union.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

THE MODERN PHARISEE.

Flourishes To-Day Just as He Did in Christ's Time.

If Christ should come upon this earth in person once more he would find many more Pharisees, proportionate to the population, than when he was here and denounced them for their sins of omission and commission, says the New York Advertiser. He would find them now, as of yore, occupying high seats in the synagogue, making broad their phylacteries, robbing widows' houses and for a pretense making long prayers. He would find them making the outside of the platter so clean as to be radiant, while within they are like unto ravening wolves.

The modern Pharisee is no improvement upon the ancient one, although he may wear more fashionable clothing and live in a more comfortably arranged house and dine from a much more varied menu. He still wears the odor of sanctity, even if he doth not possess the substance, and most of his leisure time is spent in thanking God that he is not like other men.

He believes in a Christ, but it is one dressed in purple and fine linen, one with whom he is on a perfect social and business equality—nay, even a little superior to, perhaps, as the vessel often outshines the cunning potter who formed it. He believes in the cross of Calvary, but it is made of sandal wood, spiced and fragrant and gleaming with precious stones. He believes in the divine sacrifice, but with a well-formed impression that it was an exclusive affair, designed for an exclusive circle of which he is the central and much admired ornament.

He believes in the resurrection but is almost entirely satisfied that its power and glory will be exercised only over those whose wealth has enabled them to be laid away in costly mausoleums, much more grand and imposing than the average dwelling-place of the living. He believes in a heaven, but its features to his mind blend harmoniously with the swell receptions and banquets that he is in the habit of attending.

So the modern Pharisee looks out upon the world and condemns it and upon himself and sees that all is fair. He charges some poor widow 10 per cent a month for a loan on her furniture and is thoroughly satisfied that said widow is on the broad road to hell because on a hot summer day she takes her children to the park instead of occupying a back seat in his church, especially prepared for the poor by having no cushions on the seats.

Six days in the week does he follow the Devil as closely as he can without getting too near the penitentiary, and on the seventh day he sits in a cushioned pew and feels a glow of sweet and precious peace surcharge his veins as a well-paid pastor consigns to utter darkness those who cannot believe that it was a creed and not a fatted calf upon which the prodigal son feasted.

He gives $1,000 to send the Bible to some alleged heathen 10,000 miles away and buttons up his pocket with a frown when the beggar at his own gates holds out a gaunt and pleading hand.

He is much more than the above Mr. New York Advertiser—you have him very nicely "sized up," but you have omitted much for which that arch-hypocrite, the modern Pharisee, is also noted:

The modern Pharisee maketh many promises before election—from which may always be known what will not happen if you place him in office. He celebrates his political victories by grand feasts but with no thought of any other starving class of mortals save his own.

He regards free thought with abhorrence, for it stirreth up his pet delusions and reveals his true inward cussedness.

He would imprison mediums and healers because they interfere with his red-tape sky-pilots and pill-butchers.

He holds up his hands in holy horror when Spiritualism is spoken of in his presence, and speaks of an eternal hell with much relish of expression.

He regards poverty as a crime, toil as unclean, and virtue as a superstition.

He holds power, place and pelf above integrity, mercy and charity.

He abideth with our "Christian" civilization even unto its end, for he is of it and its chief promoter.

Such is the modern Pharisee—who finds a pretext for every villainy, a law for every robbery, and an injunction against every help for Humanity.

Passed to Spirit-Life.

Passed to spirit life, from his home, in Independence, Ia., Friday, October 30, Mr. Orville C. Fonda, aged 69 years, 7 months, 4 days. Mr. Fonda was born in Glenville, N. Y. His early manhood was spent in Green Brush, N. Y., where he learned the miller's trade, and where he labored for a number of years. In 1850 he removed to Janesville, Wis., where he also followed his trade. In September, 1852, he was married to Miss Isabol Taylor. In August, 1853, Mr. and Mrs. Fonda came to Independence, Iowa, and until the spring of 1856 he followed his trade of milling. At that time he entered into the mercantile business with his brother, A. H. Fonda. They continued in the business until 1859. In the spring of 1864 he enlisted in the 47th Iowa Infantry, and served until honorably discharged from service in November of the same year. Soon after his return, again he entered into business, which he successfully carried on for twenty-five years.

He leaves a wife, a daughter and a son to mourn his loss. The funeral services were held at the house, Sunday, November 1, and were conducted by Rev. Wm. H. Hunter, assisted by R. Jacobs. A large number of friends and acquaintances were present, and followed the body to its final resting place in Oak Grove cemetery.

For the last forty years Mr. Fonda has been an earnest worker in the good cause of Spiritualism.

GEO. A. UNDERWOOD.

John D. Dunlap, aged 54 years, passed to the higher life on the morning of November 27, 1896, from the home of his sister, Mrs. John Lindsey, Grand Rapids, Mich., after a short but very painful illness.

Death held no terror for him; few remaining ties were left to hold him here. He fully trusted that cherished dear ones were waiting for him in the great beyond, "out of this land of shadows."

He was conscious to the last, giving hopeful parting words to his dear sisters, Mrs. Lindsey and Martha Lewis, who, with bursting hearts, drank in his every word, not without hope of reunion, but suffering at the thought that the dear earth form was passing from them. His last words were: "Lift the lights." He was one of the "brave boys" who went at their country's call and fought to maintain her freedom, at the expense of his health. His was a kind and loving heart, and well we know rewards are his on the angel side:

Where, we trust, each day from the golden strand
His bark glides swift to the earthly land,
With garlands of flowers plucked fresh from the shore
Where sickness, death and despair rule no more.

A FRIEND.

Translated to the Summerland, at 960 Polk street, on Saturday, November 28, Mrs. M. E. Moore, wife of G. A. Moore, in the 63d year of her age. After a short, but not supposed to be dangerous illness, the end came. On Monday afternoon, agreeably to her request, her remains were cremated at Graceland. The services at the home were conducted by Rev. Doctor Thomas, and at the crematory, by the Hermetic Brotherhood, of which she was an active, earnest member. Here, just before the Angel of the Fire received the dissolving body, her loving comrades bade adieu to the physical robe, in which the real ego had worked so cheerfully and patiently. Thus has passed from mortal life a faithful wife; a tender, loving mother, and a staunch, loyal friend.

Her psychic powers were far above the average, in accuracy of prevision, but were always modestly held as a sacred trust, always at the service of her friends. She lived in the love and affection of her family and friends. The love that bridges the centuries will ever flow from her to those left behind. By her earnest desire there was no display of black or other symbols of mourning. All the ceremonies simply emphasized the fact that she had but gone before.

W. P. PHELON, M. D.

Casper S. Wyland passed to his spirit home, at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. T. Jeff. Decker, East Washington Thursday evening, November 26, 1896, aged 70 years. He was ill with pneumonia one week.

Bro. Wyland was born in Germany and left there when 2 years old. He was a veteran of the late war, having served his country through it all. He was a genial, whole souled, honest man and numbered his friends by the thousands. He was a charter member of the First Society of Spiritualists, and an outspoken, able advocate of our cause. The writer was, perhaps, his closest Spiritual friend, and many an evening's communion have we spent together.

To any who may waver or doubt the fact of spirit return, I will say: Bro. Wyland and I pledged that the one that passed over first should come with a test. At 12 o'clock, noon, on the 27th, I visited his home, and found that he had passed out. I cut from his head a lock of hair, and raised my hand three times above his head, touching it and repeating: "Come and tell me of what I do." That night, at a trumpet seance, spirit A. B. Caldwell came and said: "Friends, there is a spirit here who has just passed out: he is weak; he wants to speak to you; help him all you can." Immediately the spirit of Bro. Wyland came to me with the trumpet, and gave me his name. I asked him to tell me what I did that day, as a test. He then told me I did what I relate above. Others in this circle heard, and I then explained.

He was a constant reader of The Progressive Thinker. His good, sensitive daughter, who has investigated with him this beautiful truth, has the sympathy of all, and to her we say:

"All around us, though unseen,
The dear immortal spirits tread;
In all the boundless universe
There's life—there are no dead."

Laboratory, Pa. J. C. D.

Passed over, November 12, 1896, and buried at Everett, Wash., November 13th, Mrs. Lucy Brockway, aged 64 years, mother of Waconda and Charles Brockway. It was her request that Mrs. J. R. Nagell should officiate at her funeral, which she did. She passed away happy in the belief that she could return. She has been a believer in Spiritualism a number of years.

CHARLES BROCKWAY, JR.
Everett Junction, Wash.

Mr. James Scott Evans, born in London, England, August 25, 1866, passed to spirit-life November 1, 1896, aged 30 years. Mr. Evans was a devoted husband and father; he leaves a wife and little son, 7 years of age, to to mourn for his mortal aid and care; but not without the sustaining influence, as received through the proof of immortality, as given by our angel friends. Mrs. Evans is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. O. A. Bishop, 191 Warren avenue. Mrs. Bishop is well known as one of our most worthy mediums in this city for a number of years. She has consoled the sorrowing hearts of many. May the strength be given her to condole her daughter at this time is the desire of all who know the depth of so great a bereavement.

The funeral service was conducted by the writer, November 4, at the residence of the parents of Mrs. Evans.

MRS. MARY C. LYMAN.

A Tender Appeal for Assistance.

Will you please help me a little in my hour of affliction? My husband is near death's door, and we have two little children dependent on us. The kind people here have helped us they could, which has relieved us greatly. Now, if the kind readers of this paper will send us what they can spare, God will bless them. We have been staunch Spiritualists all our lives, and always helped every one in need.

Now, in the name of suffering humanity, help us a little and the angel world will bless you. Adddress

ATLANTIS.

The Antediluvian World. Illustrated.

BY IGNATIUS DONNELLY.

THE QUESTION OF A ONCE-INhabited but now submerged part of this globe known as Atlantis, is one of much interest. The data gathered from ancient and modern sources—from classical authors—from traditions, legends and mythologies; from the deep sea investigations of modern scientists and antiquarian researches in the mounds and the ruins of ancient cities found on the American continent—are here arranged in compact, literary form, in this very interesting volume. The book possesses especial interest to Spiritualists because of its affording corroborative evidence of the genuineness and truth of the statements purporting to be given by spirits of ancient Atlantians concerning the fact of an Atlantis and a great people of the name, once existing on this earth. VOLNEY'S RUINS

—AND—

THE LAW OF NATURE,

TO WHICH IS ADDED

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens o the Ancients.

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

Joys Beyond the Threshold

A SEQUEL TO

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was writen to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE THRESHOLD" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. THE EVERLASTING GOSPEL.

A COMPILATION OF THE LECTURES given by the Spirit Band through the mediumship of Mrs. Magdalena Kline. This volume consists of a series of lectures, messages and poems, written and delivered in public through the mental organism of Mrs. Magdalena Kline, a trance, clairvoyant and inspirational medium. Their tone is excellent and their spirit good; and even though one may find some ideas that differ from those he has held, yet he will find much to please, benefit and instruct. The reverence with which Jesus is mentioned will please many, although the ideas advanced concerning Jesus and Christianity are not after the orthodox standard. The book contains 488 large pages, and will be sent postpaid for $1.50. For sale at this office.

MARGUERITE HUNTER.

A Narrative Descriptive of Life in the Material and Spiritual Spheres,

Transcribed by a Co-operative Spirit Band, combined with chosen media of earth. It was given through independent slate-writing. The illustrations were given in oil paintings on porcelain plate by Spirit artists. It is not a fiction, but a narrative of real life, without a parallel in the literature of Spiritualism, being a clear and succinct exposition of the philosophy, religion and science of Spiritualism. The book contains 260 pages with six illustrations in half-tone, and twelve pages in original independent writing. It is beautifully bound in blue silk cloth, stamped in silver. Price, $1.25. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

"Frank P. H.:" Q. I was in the Catholic Church previous to my investigation of Spiritualism, but I became convinced. Now I am told by spirit communications that I am a medium, or will become one, and yet, after sitting occasionally, I have no results. Why do they tell me this, and continue to do so?

A. Without considering the harm that it may do, spirits, too often, make unwarrantable prophecies; perhaps these are taken too unqualifiedly. They cannot positively determine, without trial, and this mainly depends on the facilities afforded by the receiver. In making a test, occasional sittings are not conclusive. Such sittings must be held at regular intervals, better with a well-selected circle, nor should the expectations be fixed on any especial phase. If it is, disappointment is almost sure to follow.

"Bible Student," Grand Rapids: Q. Does not the resurrection of Jesus Christ prove the resurrection of all men; and hence why the necessity of Spiritualism?

A. While the value of the Bible, as interpreted by theologians, depends on the belief in immortality, it has not proved the existence of man beyond the grave in such an absolute manner as to remove doubt; and yet, of all evidence it is designed to give, that on this point should be the most complete and irrefutable.

The resurrection of Jesus Christ proves nothing, even admitting it in its most absolute form. If Christ was the Son of God and God himself, he was unlike ordinary mortals, and what is true of him is not necessarily true of them. His physical resurrection does not prove theirs. Admitting similarity his bodily resurrection after three days, while his body remained unchanged, does not prove theirs, after they have become dust, and scattered through countless forms of life for a thousand ages. If, with some sects, the resurrection of the body be discarded, then the resurrection of Christ has no significance, for it is expressly held that his body was revivified and taken from the tomb.

The resurrection of a God-man does not prove the resurrection of ordinary men. Hence, if we have positive evidence of a future life it must come from the revelations of Spiritualism.

"Investigator," East Liverpool: Q. We have been holding circles, but have become almost discouraged, for we receive such conflicting communications, and can place no dependence on the communications we receive. How shall we avoid this, and gain truthful answers?

A. This complaint is by no means singular being so common as to be characteristic of most attempts to investigate. It is a complaint that alike comes from those who use the planchette and other instruments to receive communications. On inquiry, almost invariably it is found that the circles are held at such times as are most convenient, to while away a leisure hour, to gratify curiosity; with skepticism, credulity and wonder in varying proportions.

There is instead of the clear, pure and harmonious atmosphere which should surround the circle, one of mixed and contending influences, dark with the crossing waves of the individuality of the members.

Every communication is made up of these dominant forces; that of the medium, the circle, and the spirit attempting to communicate. These often blend in a manner impossible to unravel, and leave it difficult to determine the source of the message received, or its credibility.

Every one who has made the slightest investigation has met this difficulty and many have turned away discouraged, without awaiting to determine the cause. It has been a source of regret and a potent weapon in the hands of opposers. Yet had investigators sought to make the difficulty as great as possible, by furnishing the conditions to make it impossible for spirits to transmit their thoughts correctly, they could not have better succeeded.

First, the members of the circle should be more interested in the subject which calls them together, for the time, than in any other. They should feel the sacredness of the hour, the place and the purpose. I use the word sacred with full thoughtfulness of its meaning, for what can be more sacred than the presence of the dead? those whom we have dearly loved; who have disappeared from mortal sight beyond the shadows of the grave?

Spiritualists are constantly talking of "conditions," and yet they are less regardful of these than the churches. It is in accordance with spiritual laws to dedicate the church to the uses of worship and allow nothing else to come in confliction. The very walls become saturated with the thoughts of the worshipers who, year after year, congregate within them. The minister thus has a strong influence back of him, of which he forms the center and point of direction.

Contrast with this the public halls which are usually occupied by Spiritual societies. Week days and evenings given once to every form of entertainment, from Punch and Judy shows to dances and the combats of partisan politics. On Sunday the sensitive speaker, vibrating like harp-strings to every influence, is expected to shut out all these discordant elements and speak with a seraph's tongue. If he fail in doing this he meets with condemnation. It is not astonishing that there are failures, or sad breaks in the influence, but it is wonderful that anything spiritual can be given under such antagonistic conditions.

Let us suppose that there has been a building erected and devoted to the one purpose of spiritual instruction. It is decorated with toned colors, and there is a restful hush from the beautifully upholstered seats to the artistically appointed rostrum. The place becomes filled with the "power of the spirit," and the speaker feels no discordant jar and is truly baptised with spiritual power.

The same may be said of the circle. Its ideal would be to have a beautiful room dedicated to its use—the table, paper, pens and pencils, every appointment, exclusively dedicated to use. The members should be in sympathy, and should feel that oneness in spirit that sinks all earthly life in the grandeur of the spiritual, which has eternity before its awakening possibilities, and, like a caged eagle, desires to know of the realm beyond the horizon of the physical senses.

Let these circles be formed. They are the doorways to spiritual unfoldment and knowledge. Let them be formed in every home, for nowhere else do the departed loved ones more desire to come than to their old homes. Let such circles be formed on the lines here given and the one united thought be for the coming of the spirit of instructive truth. If spirit friends come, allow them to communicate by such means as they find most available. Do not press them for tests, but allow them to give such tests spontaneously at such times as they find themselves able to do so. If discrepances occur, be not in haste to assign them to evil, or lying spirits; rather seek to find the imperfection in the circle, or the conditions.

After the best efforts of science, inventive skill and life-long training of operators, how often messages go over the wires that are imperfect! We go to the telephone that ordinarily gives distinct utterance, and the responding voice comes imperfectly, or mingled with so many other sounds we do not understand it. We do not say that the friend at the other end of the line is a fraud or a liar, but that the line is imperfect, or that it catches the vibrations from the earth or other lines. When Edison stretched a telephone line around a mountain expecting to hear the detonations in the sun, he said he would have succeeded had he been able to shut out all the other influences, but it appeared that all the universe was playing on that circuit of wire! Not only the sun, but the moon, the planets and the stars, and the magnetic currents of the earth mingled their vibrations in the trembling circuit, a bedlam of the elemental forces of creation.

Yet no one will accuse the telephone of recreancy, that it does not enable us to separate these blending voices.

"A new convert," San Diego: Q. As the change from the religion of our fathers' must be one of growth, had we not ought to have an intermediate course of teaching between the Bible teachings of the churches with their orthodox interpretation, and the religion and ethics of Spiritualism, as taught in our lyceums?

A. There is no "intermediate" ground for truth to stand upon; the ethics of Spiritualism are either true or false, and, if true, ought to be taught in entirety. What will the intermediate teachings accomplish? A half-truth is the most harmful form of a lie, and such teachings are confessedly only half-truths because the people just from the church cannot hear the whole!

They are too weak to hear more than half the truth crusted over with a lie!

O, do not so slander the people. They are strong and will resent this namby-pamby instruction. The only way to have the truth accepted is to bring it before the people in its wholeness. They may at first turn aside, but will soon go over to its side. The half-way reformer is a cheat, and passes away into oblivion. Only he who states a truth and stands firmly by his conviction, is honored by the generations that follow.

"Ignorance:" Q. When undeveloped mediumship is checked by disturbing, outside elements, can it ever be regained?

A. The restoration of the conditions which made mediumship possible in the first place, would restore it after loss by adverse circumstances, if the organization of the person remains the same.

It is somewhat rare for such changes to take place, and hence this correspondent may feel assured that when relieved of the depressing burdens, the old light will again burn as brightly as before.

OUR TO-MORROWS.

"Every to-morrow has two handles. We may take hold of the handle of anxiety or the handle of faith."—Extract from The Progressive Thinker.

We oft may make our day seem fair and clear,
Or dark with many a gloomy doubt and fear,
Heavy with sighs, and many a bitter tear.

If we trouble borrow,
Look for grief and tears,
Usher in the morrow
With our gloomy fears,
Trouble sure appears.

In another manner
We may greet the day,
Making hope our banner,
Brightening all the way;
Ours the choice to say.

If we meet each morrow
With an anxious face,
Harboring each sorrow
In a close embrace,
Gloom will come apace.

With forebodings heavy
We thus meet the day;
For a storm make ready,
Seen no brightening ray
Gleaming on our way.

Anxiously beholding
Each small cloud in sight,
We may watch it growing,
Shutting out the light
Of all sunshine bright.

But when starting hopeful
Of the new day's plans,
Then the day, all fruitful,
At our faiths' commands,
Full of victory stands.

Then as our assistants
Faith and Hope obey;
Then at firm resistance
Troubles pass away;
Cloudless seems our day.

Shall we let our sorrow
Darken all our views,
And each fair to-morrow
All its brightness lose,
When 'tis ours to choose?

OVER THE RIVER.

There are friends that are over the river,
And they call from the other shore;
And they show me a lining of silver,
When the clouds of this life are all o'er.
And the hands from over the river,
That beckon me on to my rest,
Draw me nearer to God, the great giver
Of all that is good, pure and blest.

And the spirits of those gone before me,
As they stand on the glittering strand,
Seem to reach out their hands to support me,
And to guide to that bright spirit land.
Forms of father, mother and sister
Seem floating about by my side;
And a glorious light breaks the vista
Of darkness that hangs o'er the tide.

Forms of friends long gone to that bright shore,
Pass before me in countless array,
And I know, when my life shall be o'er,
That I, too, shall pass through the spray
Of the surf that hangs o'er the river,
Past the darkness and trouble and strife,
To a rest by the side of the giver
Of peace, happiness, and eternal life.

EDSON S. LOOMIS.

"FATHER WILLIAMS."

A Veteran Spiritualist and Good Man Gone to His Reward.

Passed suddenly to the higher life, at two o'clock on the afernoon of Wednesday, Dec. 2, 1896, at his residence, A. H. Williams (familiarly known to Spiritualists as "Father Williams"), after a brief illness, in the 79th year of his age. He was born in the State of Maine, Oct. 13, 1818, and was one of a family of twelve of which the sole surviving member is Sarah Ann Tripp, eighty-four years of age, now a resident of Englewood, Ill. All of the family, with the exception of one, lived longer than the usual time allotted to man—all exceeding three score years and ten; one reaching the age of ninety-two.

At a comparatively early age, and at a time when such a course brought obloquy and opposition in business, social and religious circles, he began a persistent investigation of the phenomena underlying the philosophy of modern Spiritualism, and becoming convinced of their reality and of their presenting indubitable proofs of the continued individual existence of man beyond the grave, embraced Spiritualism, of which he was a consistent adherent for nearly half a century. Nor was he one who hid his light under a bushel. Many thousands were brought to a knowledge of this glorious truth through his efforts. Being mediumistic in a high degree, he was frequently the channel through which messages of cheer and comfort were transmitted from the other side of life to the sorrowing ones of earth, and many remarkable cures of disease were wrought by his magnetic hands.

Guided by the unseen influences in a most wonderful way, he undertook a journey to the far West, for the purpose of righting a wrong done to the young and defenseless children of his deceased brother, and still directed by these spiritual influences he succeeded in doing so, though his dealings were with strangers of whom he had never before heard.

Positive in his convictions and statements he was yet sensitive to the influences of the spirit-world and did a great work for the advancement of the cause. Many who have been and are now prominently before the community as mediums and lecturers, owe their recognition to his words of encouragement and to his introduction of them to the public at the Spiritual meetings he conducted in this city for years.

Nor did his hands bestow the blessings of ease and health only, but they were ever open to the call for material help in times of poverty and distress. Generous beyond his means, no one ever applied to him for assistance vainly. With a heart larger than his head, relief was granted immediately, regardless of sex, color, moral standing or previous condition—the fact that the appeal was made was the "Open Sesame" to his sympathies and purse. Bounty first; investigation, if any, of the merits of the case, came afterwards. Many more than will ever be known were the recipients of his favors, and to these he was indeed a "Father."

On the evening of the 13th of last October, his 78th birthday being the occasion, there was an interesting family reunion held; at which members of four generations were present—from the venerable "Father" Williams himself to the toddling great-grand children which surrounded his knee. It was a scene long to be remembered. He was a great lover of music and was an accomplished vocalist. In response to a general request, he sang a song which he had often sung before and which had always thrilled the hearts of his auditors. It was "The Old Musician and His Harp." Though weak and tremulous, he seemed, as he sang, to become suffused with spirit influence and sang with a vigor which surprised all, and when he reached the following lines his voice became vibrant with what must have been a prophetic inspiration:

"Soon I'll be among the blest,
When the weary are at rest,
Soon I'll tread life's golden shore,
Singing praises evermore.
Now my boat is on the stream,
I can see its waters gleam;
Soon I'll be where angels roam,
Dear Old Harp, I'm going Home."

It was the last time that he ever sang it. He has since gone home, and no doubt is in the full realization of its glories and the beloved companionship of those gone before.

Such is a brief outline of a life filled with good works. His "taking off" at the last was extremely sudden. On the day of his transition he appeared to be better in health than he had been for several days. He felt better, he said, than he had for some time. But it was like the flaring of a candle in the socket before the final extinguishment. Almost in an instant and without warning he was gone.

"So be my passing;
My task accomplished and the long day done.
My wages taken, and in my heart
some late lark singing,
Let me be gathered to the quiet west,
That sundown splendid and serene transition."

The funeral services were conducted by Mrs. S. F. DeWolf, who spoke fervently with her usual eloquence and vocal selections were effectively rendered by Mrs. Frankie Cole and Miss Maud Williams. C.

BE KIND TO MOTHER.

My boys, be kind to mother,
For she's been kind to you;
She's sought to lead you safely
Your life's brief pathway through.
She's cared for you and loved you
And tried to save you pain,
And give a kindly counsel—
I hope not all in vain.

She wants to see you happy,
She wants to see you true,
Her hope and pride are centered,
Believe it, boy, in you.
How much of joy and comfort
Is in your power to give
This faithful, loving mother,
If rightfully you live.

Be manly, true and honest
In everything that's done,
And show her that her counsel
Is treasured by her son;
Be kind when old age sprinkles
Its snowflakes in her hair,
And make her last days happy
With loving words and care.

WHY CHURCH?

Has No Use for "Church" or "Christian."

Plain "Spiritualism" and "Society" Are Good Enough for Him.

In the last number of The Progressive Thinker, the subject "Why Christian?" had ample justice done unto it. Now I would like to ask "Why Church?" or why should any Spiritualist society that has any common sense left in the brain of any of its members use the name of "Church" or "Spiritual Church," unless they wish to ape after some other denomination? Webster's dictionary defines "church" to be as follows: "Church, a building set apart for Christian worship;" "A formally organized body of Christian believers worshiping together; a body of Christian believers worshiping together and observing the same rites and acknowledged the same ecclesiastical authority;" The collective body of Christians; ecclesiastical authority," etc. Well, Mr. Editor, a few Sundays ago I stepped into a hall where I had supposed that a society of Spiritualists meet, to hear Lyman C. Howe deliver one of his grand lectures, and after he had done his best to instruct as I supposed a house full of Spiritualists, a lady arose on the platform and announced that in "this church," on Monday night, there would be a social held, and then she repeated that it would be held in "this church." Then a gentleman followed who announced that "This First Spiritual Church Society," would hold a dance on such an evening.

Upon another occasion it was given out that "The Woman's Progressive Union, which owned this church," would give a grand entertainment and a masked ball at and upon such a time; and I observed what a broad grin covered the faces of about two-thirds of the audience before me, as it was announced that the First Spiritual Church would have a dance and a masked ball, where all the toughs could come under masks, of all descriptions, and mix with the "Church Spiritualists;" and the question arises: Do the Spiritualists who form this "Church" believe as all church people do, or is the name "Church," a catch-penny game to catch the Christian people? While I was sitting puzzled over the matter, a lady—a Christian, I suppose, or one of the members of this church—approached me and wanted me to buy a ticket for the dance, and I told her that I did not patronize churches; and then she very tragically enquired of me, why was I there? and I meekly replied that that I had made a mistake in coming and that I would not do so again, and I have not done so any more.

So, Bro. Francis, there is no Spiritual Society in Buffalo any more; it has merged into a "Christian Church" and the meetings are held in a church, and the people are church members. I begin to agree with the old maxim of "what fools these mortals be!" and also the one that says that "A little nonsense now and then is relished by the best of men," and Spiritualists too, for that matter, and the question is, "Why do we need the useless, worn-out, worm-eaten, decayed, bad-smelling, bigoted, believe-or-be-damned, Hell-fired, old fossilized, out-of-date, theoretical mixture called church, attached, like a tin kettle to a dog's tail, to our pure and true Spiritualism of this 19th century.

Do we ask any odds of the churches? Not at all; if if we did we would not get it. Are we Christians? If so, drop the word Spiritualist and come out as Christians. Are we Spiritualists? If so, then let us be all Spiritualists and not a mongrel bastard, of a breed that is half one and half another, and not much of either. I never did believe in mixing or mincing matters, so put me down as a Spiritualist, pure and simple—a man believing and knowing of the natural laws that govern this universe of worlds, and knowing that Spiritualism is as far removed from church theories as time and unlimited space will permit them to be.

I notice that Chicago has its full quota of "Spiritual Churches," and I would enquire of you if the "Spiritual Churches," are of any better quality than an ordinary, common Spiritual Society? Not any! you will answer.

Why is it thus, and what is the matter? Are the Christian churches capturing our societies? I don't know, but it looks that way.

We have a couple of moderately just, good spirit-mediums here that are "Palmists," so-called, and they sail under that cognomen, and they catch a lot of Christians and church people as Palmists, and then they give them a good reading, just as any medium would do, and it is all right as long as it is done under cover, and Spiritual mediumship is hidden under "palmistry," "what fools these mortals be," and "a little nonsense now and then, is relished by the best of men." Yours fraternally,

Buffalo, N. Y. J. W. DENNIS.

MY SUMMERLAND HOME.

I would sing of my Summerland home
In the land of sunshine and flowers,
Where the ocean's deep tide, in its billowy pride,
Whiles away the soft, dreamy hours.
I would sing of the roses and white lilies fair,
That grace my cottage pathway,
Where the blue-eyed violets and the sweet mignonette
Sparkle with morn's dowy spray.

I would sing of the mountains—ancient of kings—
Bathed in a gray mist of light,
Where the hermit-thrush and mocking-bird sing
Thro' the watches of the star-stilly night.

I would sing of the valleys cradled in light,
And the landscape that stretches away,
As visions at night open wide the soul-sight
Thro' the aisles of infinite day.

I would sing of the mower's bright, gleaming scythe,
Of sweet-scented hay of fruitings and wine,
Of the circle of friends, warm-hearted and blithe,
And one loving heart, faithful and mine.

I would sing of my home 'neath tropical skies—
A dream of the days summer-time,
While above me there lies, as the day gently dies,
A vision of heaven's fairer clime.

THE CAUSE IN INDIANA.

It Is Flourishing and Has Good Prospects.

To the Editor:—With a few minutes' time at my disposal, perhaps I could not use it to better purpose than send a word to the army of readers who peruse your columns from week to week.

The cause is flourishing in Indianapolis, and Bro. Wiggins—laboring for the First Spiritual Church—is creating a deep interest in the minds of all thinking people who chance to come into his presence, as he gives forth evidence of the continued existence of those whom they had considered dead and gone to that bourne, etc.

Last week we were called to Alexandria, Ind., to administer to the society in that city. We found a good organization there, composed of many of the best citizens, and we were greeted with good audiences which manifested much interest in all that was said by our guides. We feel sure this society will be heard from in the future, as there are faithful and earnest workers there who recognize the needs of humanity and will see to it that the light of truth in their midst shall not be kept under a bushel, but rather be placed where its rays shall radiate and illumine all who come within their wondrous influence.

Dr. McAlister and wife, of Chicago, are in Alexandria, teaching a class in occult science, and through courtesy of the Doctor we enjoyed the privilege of sitting in his class one evening. To say the Doctor is a success in elucidating its hidden beauties and creating a profound interest in the minds of all, is doing slight justice to his ability as teacher. Any society or community desiring a teacher who thoroughly understands that about which he seeks to enlighten, can do no better by looking elsewhere. Keep the Doctor busy—he is doing a good work—leading the minds of his pupils out of the darkness into the light of spiritual comprehension.

Bro. Francis, it is superfluous for me to say we found The Progressive Thinker every place we went, and that only words of praise for its many good qualities are sung by every tongue; but such is the truth, and we are adjured to "speak the truth though the heavens fall."

We are in the field for labor and solicit correspondence with societies and camp associations who need workers, lecturers, public tests, etc.

"The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional." This book, by the well-known Father Chiniquy, reveals the degrading, impure influences and results of of the Romish confessional, as poved by the sad experience of many wrecked lives. Price, by mail, $1. For sale at this office.

"Voltaire's Romances," translated from the French. With numerous illustrations. These lighter works of the brilliant Frenchman, and invincible enemy of the Catholic Church, are worthy of wide reading. Wit, philosophy and romance are combined, with the skill of a master mind. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

"Atlantis: The Antediluvian World. By Ignatius Donnelly Sums up all information relative to the lost continent of Atlantis. He regards the description of it given by Plato as veritable history It is intensely interesting. Price $2.

"Religious and Theological Works of Thomas Paine." Contains his celebrated "Age of Reason," and a number of letters and discourses on religious and theological subjects. Cloth binding, 430 pages. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds." By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical bodies and their psychical bodies with universal nature, and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the Spirit-world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

"THE LIGHT OF EGYPT,"

OR THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL AND THE STARS.

Finely Illustrated With Eight Full-Page Engravings.

BY AN INITIATE IN ESOTERIC MASONRY.

It is claimed that this book is not a mere compilation, but thoroughly original.

It is believed to contain information upon the most vital points of Occultism and Theosophy that cannot be obtained elsewhere.

It claims to fully reveal the most recondite mysteries of man upon every plane of his existence, both here and hereafter, in such plain, simple language that a child can almost understand it.

The secret and Occult mysteries of Astrology are revealed and explained for the first time, it is affirmed, since the days of Egyptian Hieroglyphics.

An effort is made to show that the Science of the Soul and the Science of the Stars are the twin mysteries which comprise THE ONE GRAND SCIENCE OF LIFE.

The following are among the claims made for the work by its friends:

To the Spiritual investigator this book is indispensable.

To the medium it reveals knowledge beyond all earthly price, and will prove in real truth "a guide, philosopher and friend."

To the Occult it will supply the mystic key for which he has been so long earnestly seeking.

To the Astrologer it will become a "divine revelation of Science."

OPINIONS OF PRESS AND PEOPLE.

"A noble, philosophical and instructive work."—Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten.

"A work of remarkable ability and interest."—Dr. J. R. Buchanan.

"A remarkably concise, clear and forcibly interesting work. * * * It is more clear and intelligible than any other work on like subjects."—Mr. J. J. Morse.

"A careful reading of THE LIGHT OF EGYPT discovers the beginning of a new sect in Occultism, which will oppose the grafting on Western Occultists the subtile delusive dogmas of Karma and Re-incarnation."—New York Times.

"It is a volume likely to attract wide attention from that class of scholars interested in mystical science and occult forces. But it is written in such plain and simple style as to be within the easy comprehension * * * of any cultivated, scholarly reader."—The Chicago Daily Inter Ocean.

"However recondite his book, the author certainly presents a theory of first causes which is well fitted to challenge the thoughtful readers' attention and to excite much reflection."—Hartford Daily Times.

"Considered as an exposition of Occultism, or the philosophy of the Orient from a Western standpoint, this is a remarkable production."—The Daily Tribune (Salt Lake City).

"This work, the result of years of research and study, will undoubtedly create a profound sensation throughout the philosophic world."—The Detroit Commercial Advertiser.

"It is an Occult work but not a Theosophical one. * * * It is a book entirely new in its scope and must excite wide attention."—The Kansas City Journal.

Beautifully printed and illustrated on paper manufactured for this special purpose, with illuminated and extra heavy cloth binding.

"THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS."

A Primary Course of Lessons in Celestial Dynamics.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT."

This important primary work is the first practical exposition of the Astro-Magnetic forces of Nature—in their relation to man—that has yet been issued by the American press. It contains fourteen special lessons, embracing each department of human life, in such plain, simple language that a child can understand the elementary principles laid down. And in addition to these lessons is an Appendix, containing a full explanation of all technical and scientific terms in general use upon the subject, thus forming a brief, yet practical Astro Dictionary. This work is illustrated with special plates.

For Sale at This Office. Price, Fifty Cents.

CELESTIAL DYNAMICS,

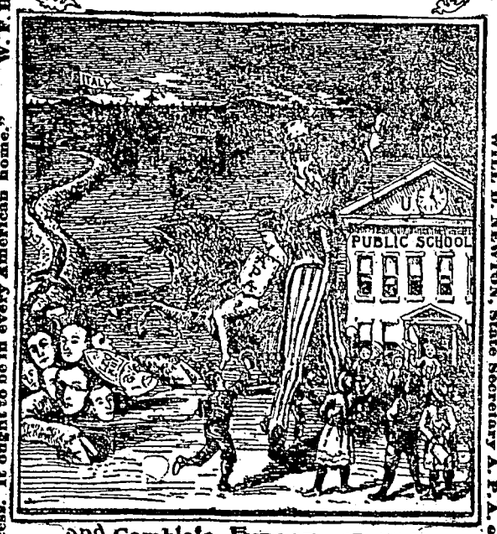
Being a Normal Course of Study in the Astro-Magnetic Forces of Nature.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT," "THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS," ETC.

A magnificent and complete course of Astro-metaphysical study, embodying Vital Principles of Life, Mental Force, Sickness and Disease. With the only true and really Scientific method of treating the sick successfully.

Mental Healers, Meta-physicians, and all who practice the Healing Art Divine should give "Celestial Dynamics" a thorough and impartial study, and thus learn the real cause of their frequent failures.

No Astro-Student can afford to be without this work, if he would understand the Meta-physics of Astrology.



This work was specially prepared for publication to meet the demands of a large and very earnest class of people who cannot afford to pay for a regular course of instruction under a qualified teacher. And those who can afford this privilege will find the work an invaluable text-book to their studies.

The Price is One Dollar Only, and is within reach of all who seek light. For sale at this office.

"I have examined the Manual for the A. P. A. I think it is a valuable document in its references, history and light shedding information upon the Romish question and the servitude of enslaved Americans. I think it will have a tendency to lift from their minds so that they can perceive the acts and actors upon the stage of this republic."
H. F. BOWERS, Past Supreme President and State Pres. of Iowa.

"Your A. P. A. Manual received, read and reread, and am happy to say that I have never read a more concise, clear and forcibly interesting work. A treasure among our members and I do earnestly hope that it may be a successful means a success. It ought to be in every American home."
W. F. HOUGHTON, M. D.

"I have examined the Manual and find a 'multum in parvo' volume of most important matter. I can freely say it is one of the best compilations of the kind that I ever read, and I hope that the same will be freely distributed by our Councils."

GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE . .

CURES CONSTIPATION!

And Many Liver and Kidney Troubles. It is a Most Pleasant Drink.

Among thousands of testimonials we receive, the following from W. H. Morse, Therapeutist and Consulting Chemist, of Garwood, N. J., speaks for itself:

"Let me commend to your notice the GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE, manufactured at Ayer, Mass., by the company of that name. It is not only a grateful, refreshing and stimulating beverage, relished by all, but, as well it is mildly laxative, health-promoting and thoroughly scientific in composition; in these essentials altogether unlike any other beverage for this purpose. It is well worthy of being brought before the public. W. H. MORSE."

A small package will be sent to any address for 35 cents, and a larger package containing twice as much, for 50 cents. This package will go as far as four pounds of coffee. All can drink this coffee that pure coffee will not agree with, and it DOES cure constipation. State rights for sale to manufacture and sell this coffee. A great money-maker!

The Cause in Wichita, Kansas.

To the Editor:—I am glad to be able to report that in this city where there are several hundred Spiritualists, that a society was organized the first of September, and that we have been successful in holding meetings each Sunday evening since. We have had during October and November Mrs. M. Theresa Allen for our speaker; and she has given excellent satisfaction. We hope to retain her until January 1.

For several weeks we met each Sunday morning in conference session. At these meetings only a few seemed willing to participate in the discussions. That all might become interested and benefited, we changed the conference sessions into a progressive lyceum, organizing different ages into groups, each with a leader, and each selecting its subject for consideration. This change we find very beneficial and satisfactory. Much interest is manifested. We have not been able yet to introduce those features that would be most pleasing and attractive to the young, yet we feel that all should have a chance to learn spiritual truths, and not learn orthodox errors that they will have to unlearn.

We expect to charter under the Kansas State Association, and also with the N. S. A. We feel encouraged, and expect to steadily go forward, feeling we are endorsed by the spirit forces and will ere long become a successful society and accomplish good to those within our influence, and aid in disseminating truth.

A hindrance we experience now is a limited treasury to suitably reward speakers. We expect to do all we can in this line, and cordially invite lecturers who travel in this vicinity to stop, and we will furnish hall, and advertise and reward as we may be able.

T. A. THOMPSON,
President Spiritual Society.

A MATERIALIZING SEANCE

Which Was Interesting and Convincing.

To the Editor:—I wish to mention through your valuable paper, one of the most remarkable seances I ever had the pleasure of attending, occurring at the home of Mrs. Francis Ruddick, of this city. It was a trumpet circle, and at intervals the spirits would materialize in the middle of the room—the room being light—and shake the hands of those in the circle, and three and four spirits talking at the same time.

Of the most remarkable spirits, I would like to mention Maj. Simpson, formerly of Madison, Ind., a great friend while in earth-life of A. J. Grayson, of Madison, and Dr. Chadwick, my wife's guide; the two talking at the same time, one in the trumpet, the other independent, on subjects that would interest the most learned men of to-day. At the same time the voice of a babe could be heard talking at our feet. Beautiful spirit lights flitted about the room. We were enchanted with those beautiful manifestations and the gifts of this most wonderful medium of whom enough can not be said. Those who call themselves Spiritualists in our place, although small in number, feel proud to add their testimony to the worth of this wonderful and gifted lady. JOHN JACKSON.

ROME HOWLING.

Slattery Has a Narrow Escape.

Police Reserves Save the Ex-Priest from a Howling Mob.

A dispatch from New York says it took all the police reserves in Newark, N. J., to save Slattery, the ex-priest, from being mobbed. He lectured in that city recently, and at the close of the lecture a crowd of some 1,500 gathered at the doors to wait for his appearance on the street. A guard of twenty-five policemen then escorted him to a cab which was in waiting. Then the cabman lashed his horse and attempted to break away through the mob.

Orders had been issued for the police reserve, who came double-quick to the scene of the trouble. A shower of stones and other missiles greeted this action.

Slattery and his wife had just got safely aboard a train bound for New York when the crowd began to pour into the depot.

These are the beautiful, high-toned Romish "citizens" who would suppress free speech. They would like to burn Slattery, and take possession of this country.

MOSES AND DANIEL.

To the Editor:—Moses and Daniel were two prominent Jews. Moses and Daniel W. Hull are two prominent Gentiles, and what they don't know about the Jewish Scriptures and the New Testament, is hardly worth consideration. For the proof of this fact, read their different books on the Bible. I have just finished reading "Christianity as it was Before the Apostacy," by D. W. Hull. Every person interested in searching the Scriptures, seeking the truth should study this masterly work by this master mind.

OF AYER, MASS.

QUICK CURES! SMALL DOSES!

Send age, name in full and two 2-cent stamps and leading symptom, and we will send you a diagnosis of your case FREE, and we will try and make the price of treatment right to you. Remember, please, that we do not wish to take your case unless you are dissatisfied with your present treatment. Do not ask OUR opinion of this doctor or that one, because we never express an opinion, nor have we any one connected with us that is allowed to speak ill of any one or even to express an opinion. We know some doctors do so, but we do not.

The day of shot-gun prescription is past: drastic drugs in large doses will not be given ten years from now. We believe in the certainty of medicine and in specific medication, but specific medication requires specific diagnosis. He who understands the action of drugs, and who is gifted with the power of correctly diagnosing, is the successful physician to-day.

FROM THE GOLDEN STATE.

Receiving an Influx of Spiritual Power.

Mrs. Maud Freitag, of San Diego, Cal., whose fame as a test medium is becoming widely known, is serving here Sunday mornings, and at Santa Barbara Sunday evenings, and her audiences have increased until there is not standing room, and with a fee at the door. Sceptics are confounded and go away mystified to return to the investigation with increased interest and conviction of the truth of spirit communion. Even the Spiritualists have had the last lingering doubt removed, and are manifesting a zeal quite commendable, and encouraging to the cause here and the future prosperity of Spiritualism. Quite an influx of spiritual power seems to be flowing into the Coast from speakers and gifted mediums from the East; an awakening life is manifest in the minds of mortals and immortals, and the cry of reform runs the changes, from all classes of thinkers—the ground-bird up to the sweet-voiced nightingale echoes the acclaim of the angel choir: "Behold, I bring you glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all men."

I am resting from the platform work, but watch with deep interest the work here and all over the country, as from week to week The Progressive Thinker comes freighted with a wealth of thought coined from the mint of reason and the soul of worth, from its noble and able contributors.

BISHOP A. BEALS.

FOR OUR PHILOSOPHERS.

What Is the Relation Between the Ethereal Body and the Earth Body?

To the Editor:—In your issue of October 31, I asked fifteen questions. I was much interested in Mr. E. J. Bowtell's answer to the first question, and trust he will go into greater detail on the subject at some future time. The question was: What is the relation existing between the more ethereal body (called astral body by some), and the earth body?

Will Mr. Bowtell give his reasons for saying that "spirit per se is formless"? What objections to the propositions assumed in the following statements?

1. The universe is an essence composed of mind and matter acting and reacting upon each other.

2. That all elements and all manifestations of life in Nature are the phenomena of life-entities, human in type, expressing themselves in infinite forms.

3. That sex, from the single life-forms to the complex, furnishes an evoluted protoplasm or ovum suitable to the growth of the entities re-embodying on their path or round of evolution.

4. The physical body is a microcosm made up by entities which are being humanized by the ego of the body—the God of the little world.

5. That all breathing forms breathe in and expel entities, of varying forms and color of aura.

6. That thought sets diversified entities in motion peculiar to the thought, who send off an aura corresponding to the character of the thought and its associations. ALCINOUS.

MODERN WONDERS!

Or What Psychic Force, Coupled with Scientific Knowledge Can Do.

Testimonials in Favor of Drs. Peebles & Burroughs.

To successfully treat and cure a patient, it is essential that the physician understand fully the diseases and lesions affecting the patient. Bombastic assertion and unsupported claims carry no weight with the public. The thousands of cases which Drs. Peebles & Burroughs have diagnosed in the past year, without a single failure, demonstrate that they do understand diseases and the causes producing them. We submit the following few from the many which are received every day, testifying to the absolute accuracy of their diagnoses:

In regard to the diagnosis of my case, it is perfect in every respect.
MEEDIE SHAFER.
Sedgewick, Ark., Nov. 18.

Your diagnosis of my case received and will say that it is correct in every detail. GEORGE A. WOOD.
West Pullman, Ill., Nov. 24.

Your kind letter of the 16th came to hand yesterday, giving a diagnosis of my case, and I must say that it is a very true and correct one, far better than I could have described it myself.
JOHN L. LINDELEAF.
Hollister, Cal., Nov. 22.

I am in receipt of your letter, and would say that you told me how I feel better than I could myself.
MRS. F. A. APPLEBEE.
Ashtabula, O., Nov. 5.

I received your diagnosis of my case yesterday, and will say that it is entirely correct, CLARA PARKER.
Colorado City, Col., Nov. 23d.

Your answer to my letter of inquiry came last night, and greatly surprised me, for I think you diagnosed my case correctly. MRS. J. O. DISHER.
St. Edwards, Neb. Nov. 26.

The most enlightened and successful treatment practiced to-day is the psychic. The wonderful results achieved without the administration of medicines is something wonderful. We set forth no exorbitant claims, but the following will demonstrate that this feature of our treatment is rarely, if ever, duplicated:

To-day when your letter came, I was suffering with neuralgia in my face. I took your letter in my hand and laid my head on the table, and in ten minutes the pain had left me, and has not returned. MRS. R. M. HUGHES.
Central Falls, R. I., 29 Ill. street, October 10.

Last Thursday eve, during our half-hour sitting, I asked you to visit a lady in Springfield and relieve her of her mental depression. I insisted upon it, feeling sure that she would feel better. I have since been told that she did feel better and slept all that night and worked all day Friday, and said she had not felt so well for four years.
ADA L. STONE.
Chicopee, Mass., Oct. 28.

One month ago it hurt me so between my shoulders that at times I could not lean back against a chair. Last Tuesday I ached from my neck down to my kidneys, but that eveving no sooner had I touched your signature than my right hand flew upward, and then I commenced to rub myself, and when I had done this, I found my aches were gone.
MRS. SADIE UPDIKE.
Mancelona, Mich., Oct. 9.

But the many cases that are thoroughly chronic in their nature, the causes producing the lesions dating back many, many years, require in addition to the foregoing, the most skillful and scientific medical treatment and the wisest discretion in the selection of medicines and their doses, it being an established fact that what is a dose for one person will produce disastrous effects upon another. In our hands, medicines act like magic, as the following will demonstrate:

Pursuant to your request for information as to my case at weekly intervals, I write to say that from the first dose, I have noticed an improvement.
O. H. BARKER.
Peoria, Ill., Oct. 14.

I am feeling in splendid health at this writing, thanks to your kind treatment and the help of God. Dear Doctor, I hope you will live 200 years that you may still bless suffering humanity. I have taken your treatment three weeks, and received more good than from all the medicines I have taken during the whole six years I have had asthma. Wishing you more and still better success, I remain your ever-trusting patient, MRS. ANNA DANCE.
Evans City, Pa., Nov. 14.

of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.

With affectionate regards, very truly,

MUSICAL WONDER.

A Boy of Eleven Years Creates a Sensation.

To the Editor:—Enclosed find letter received by a friend of mine that I visited at Terre Haute, Ind., on my return. The writer is a young lady, just 17 years old; an only daughter of a family living near Terre Haute. She, too, they say, is a genius in music, and so anxious to complete her musical education that she undertook this journey to Europe two years ago, unattended. I thought the latter part of the letter was worthy a place in your paper, as we all understand the power back of this boy. What a pity mortals cannot see things in their right light.

MRS. J. W. KRATZ.

Braustrasse 6, Part. r., Leipzig.
Mrs. J. W. Kratz, Evansville, Ind.:—

I must tell you about a little boy who is studying at the Conservatorium. Perhaps I told you about him before, but I do not remember. His name is Willy Bachhaus, and he is about 11 years of age, with very fair hair and large, dreamy, blue eyes. To see him you would think him just an ordinary little boy; but he is a wonderful pianist; a perfect genius. Last Friday he played a difficult Beethoven concerto, with orchestra accompaniment, and played it beautifully—entirely from memory, too. You should have heard the applause that was sent up after he got through. It filled the hall. The teachers prophesy he will be a second Mozart. He has already composed something, and in class one day he transposed and played at sight a difficult fugue of Bach that his teacher said he could not have done himself. It seems wonderful to see his little fingers flying over the keys, and he brings lots of tone out, too; his playing is not weak like a child's, it is finished, like an artist's. Whenever he plays, all the students go wild with envy. I wish you could hear him.

FLORENCE A. WARHURST.

A NEW SOCIETY AT ROCHESTER.

To the Editor:—Mrs. Kates and self have been laboring at Rochester, N. Y., with apparently much success. Our time has been fully occupied. The hall meetings have taxed its capacity. Our lectures have been well received and seemingly created a better understanding of spiritual philosophy, but the tests and delineations by Mrs. Kates and her controls have captured the town.

The readings are nearly always said to be "fully accurate." A lecture to ladies only attracted a hall full, and was reported to be a meeting of great use and interest. We have promised to return here for February and March. We may spend a great portion of the coming year in Rochester, as the cause here needs to be helped and some earnest souls are determined to make it nearer what it should be in the birth-city of Spiritualism.

We have organized "The First Spiritual Church of Rochester," and are determined to get into shape for the semi-centennial Jubilee to be held here in 1898. The anniversary in 1897 will be celebrated with all the eclat local workers here can accomplish, as a preliminary to the great occasion to follow a year after. The Jubilee Committee to act for Rochester, and to co-operate with the N. S. A. has been appointed, and is as follows: G. W. Kates (chairman), Dr. Sanford, W. W. Mosier, Mrs. C. A. Hammond, and Mrs. R. H. Joslyn.

They will ask help from all who can render it. With hopes to soon erect a "Fox Memorial Hall" here, we shall press on to perfect means to properly espouse the cause ushered in by the "raps." Rochester should be at the pinnacle of effort to present Spiritualism to the world, but it has been behind other localities. We hope that good people will help good spirits to redeem it and place it amidst the galaxy of star cities now prominently shedding spiritual light upon the world.

A BEAUTIFUL TEST.

Rose L. Bushnell writes from Sterling, Ill.: My husband, who has been in the spirit world nine months, has kept his promise; and returned several times unmistakably. The last time that he came and communicated was two days ago in early evening. I was coming up the basement stairs from the dining-room where tea had just been served, and when half way up, I met him coming down as it were, I came so close to him that I saw the gleam of his dark eye and involuntarily said: "God bless you, my beloved William." I opened my arms, and he came within their circle, and in that tender way we went on up the stairs. As we neared the top the light from the hall shone upon his dear face as he whispered, "Darling, it is true," and was gone.

Ere his departure to the "other shore" he promised, if possible, to return and tell me the truth of a question that weighed upon my mind with a doubt that I could not remove; but now I know, thanks be unto my beloved, who would not have told me, if he had not found the truth in that land where he is free to pursue his research. I am well aware that some of the "doubting Thomases" will say, 'All delusion!' I only can pity those who have not the power to grasp the truth and hold it fast, but rather let glad hopes grow weary and sink into death. I cannot tell you how dear was this morning of light to my soul, and I will let no opposing power darken the truth that springs like a brooklet from the heights of love. We are at best in this present incarnation cramped by the circumstances born with the day. With unceasing labors of our loved ones, there are but few waves that can reach the door of the soul's citadel, in comparison with vast and mighty throng striving to free us from fetters which bind.

ROSE L. BUSHNELL.

"NEXT WORLD INTERVIEWED."

To the Editor:—Of the beautiful books already furnished by The Progressive Thinker, The Next World Interviewed delights me most.

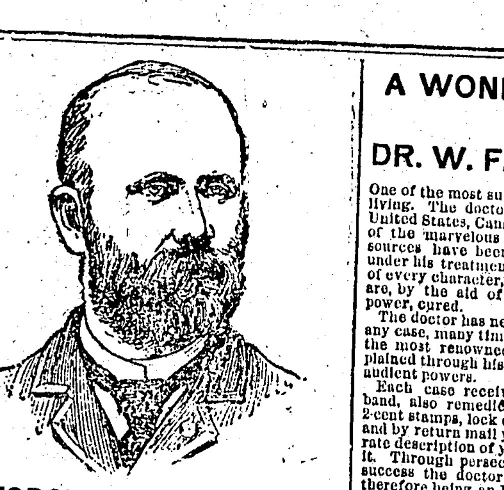
Any attempt to review this grand work would come far short of its wonderful merit. It shows us, as no other book does, the real condition of things in that great world to which we are all fast hastening, and the earnest reader will find more to instruct and encourage in the true path of life than in any other book of its size.

I cannot do better than repeat the words of Judge MacArthur. "Let these pages be read with candor, and skepticism and theism would be converted into belief, and a devotional sense of reverence and joy would take the place of hesitation; and even the professed Christian will find his doubts of the future swept away, and his views of the everlasting goodness of God corroborated by the most infallible assurances."

To the investigator it is a boon beyond price; to the confirmed Spiritualist it is an excellent help in instructing the uninitiated, and even to those who do not know or believe this beautiful philosophy, its naturalness arising from its evident truthfulness, will produce conviction though the reader may be unconscious of it, because it brings to his view the well-known historical characters pursuing, as on earth, their favorite occupations.

The whole book is a splendid confirmation of the truth of our philosophy as taught by our best mediums and lecturers.

Frauds do not escape exposure, and, indeed, self-important disputants may see themselves reflected in this mirror of reality.



Many thanks, Mr. Francis, for your excellent judgment in giving this worthy book to the readers of your unsurpassed paper at a price that brings it within reach of all. R. NEELY.

NEW BOOKS.

Whittier: Prophet, Seer and Man. With portrait. By B. O. Flower. The Arena Publishing Co., Boston, Mass. Cloth, $1.

In this fine volume Mr. B. O. Flower, the editor of that foremost and radical review, The Arena, treats with tender and appreciative effect the life, character and literary work of one of our greatest American poets. Whittier is brought before us as: A barefoot boy who was also a dreamer: a prophet of freedom: a modern apostle of lofty spirituality, and a man.

The pure, lofty, noble and spiritual traits of Whittier are set before us in a captivating literary style, that charms the reader and tends to the cultivation of the same excellences within the heart. The tone and tendency of the book is commendable in every way.

ANOTHER ROCKING CHAIR.

It Is Propelled by an Invisible Power.

To the Editor:—Some years ago my uncle, Major Hale, and myself, visited Burnace, Sullivan Co., Pa., for a little recreation, and while there renewed our acquaintance with an old friend we had not seen for many years. She was a most estimable lady of superior culture and refinement. Her husband had preceded her to the Summerland. He left on her hands a large and promising family, to be cared for and educated. She related to us some wonderful phenomena occurring in her own house; among other things she stated this fact:

"I was sitting in my parlor about 9 o'clock one bright summer morning, all alone, doing some sewing for the family, when a rocking-chair, about ten feet from me, and clear from the wall, commenced rocking. Having had considerable experience in spiritual matters, I could readily understand the cause. After gazing some time in wonder and admiration at this strange exhibition of spirit power, I ran to the stair door and called my daughter, who was upstairs making beds. She came down at a rapid rate, knowing her mother was greatly excited about something. My daughter, after gazing at the chair for a few minutes, and becoming almost paralyzed with fear, exclaimed, in a trembling voice: 'I will go to the store and call my husband.' In a few moments they were both intently watching the strange movements of the rocking-chair. Her husband thought to stop the movement of the chair by placing himself in it, but his weight had no perceptible effect upon its motion, and it continued to rock. He leaped from the rocker and exclaimed, in an excited manner: 'I will stop it!' and instantly grabbed the chair with all the power he possessed, but the rocker continued to oscillate with as much vigor as ever. It rocked for an hour with unceasing energy—to the great astonishment of the household, and many of the neighbors who were called in to witness this exhibition of spirit power."

Mrs. Post also informed us that whenever a picture frame fell from the wall of her house, which they often did, it was a sure indication of a death in the family, which never failed to occur within a year.

One of the great comforts of my life is my absolute knowledge of the life beyond this. I have been a firm believer in this beautiful spiritual philosophy of ours for twenty-five years, and I am now living for that new home over there—patiently waiting to be summoned to the higher life, where I have so many dear friends waiting my coming. AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BY JUDGE LOCK M'DANIELS, ON THE OCCASION OF THE BURIAL OF MRS. CHARLOTTE HOLTKAMP, IN HOUSTON, TEX.

If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come.—Job.

There are also celestial bodies and bodies terrestrial, but the glory of the celestial is one and the glory of the terrestrial is another. So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.

Now this I say, brethren, that if flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. For this corruption must put on incorruption, and the mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, there shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory: "Oh, Death, where is thy sting? Oh, Grave, where is thy victory?"—Saint Paul.

The all important question asked by Job in the first scripture read in your hearing was answered by the greatest of all the apostles in the language of the second, which forms the basis for the remarks which I shall make on this occasion. There have been, perhaps, as many interpretations of these words of St. Paul as there are schools of religious thought. It is not my purpose to treat this subject in a controversial spirit or manner, but will simply undertake as briefly as I can to give the Spiritualists' interpretation of it, as I have gathered it from such authorities as Davis, Buchanan, Forster, Edmonds, Hull and others.

The glorious system of philosophical truths which may be said to constitute the ethics of Spiritualism, and which is based upon the fundumental fact of a demonstrated immortality, through direct communion with the spirits of the departed children of time, is inculcating, I sincerely believe, higher conceptions as to the capability, duty and destiny of man than any other ever conceived in the entire range of human or angelic thought. It is inculcating also higher conceptions of the infinite purposes comprehended in the law of evolution as made manifest in this green-browed earth of ours, the "patient mother of the whirlwind and the storm;" higher conceptions as to an indefinable primal cause of all causes, forever working in the majestic realm of the universe, through infinite agencies toward infinite results; an all wise, incomprehensible Father of all. Who plants in the seasons and in the elements, and in all the revolutions of nature, unmistakable signs and symbols of beneficence and power, which are forever telling us that "All matter is God's tongue!

And from its motions God's thoughts are sung;
The realms of space are the octave bars,
And the music notes are the sun and stars."

The progress of Spiritualism in human appreciation has been continuous, beautiful and sure, notwithstanding the fact that the misinformed have periodically claimed for more than a quarter of a century that the whole matter is exploded and dead.

As autumn after autumn, and age after age, "the innocent night wears still the precious jewel of the harvest moon upon her brow, and its soft effulgence overflows the world, clothing it in heavenly splendor," whether mortals care to serve it or not, so the mental night of atheistical doubt and fanatical incredulity is being most surely illuminated by the brilliancy of spiritual truth, although the majority of mankind still close their eyes to the glorious light of all the centuries. The idea of a future resurrection in some form and in some manner connects itself more or less directly with the motives, feelings and the actions of mankind, of well nigh every shade of belief, and with a brilliant or somber hue to a very great extent colors all their lives. The nature of matter itself furnishes a forcible argument against the duration and immortality of the material body. Both science and observation tell us that no material form can retain its organization independent of some interior force. Matter has no form of its own, and is in itself comparatively dead. All material organizations in the plant, the animal and the human, science teaches, are formed and maintained through special forces, which serve to counteract the general laws to which matter is subject, and through which it is constantly tending toward elemental conditions. The substances which compose the human body, chemistry declares, are continually passing away and are being continually renewed. The physical form, however, Spiritualism teaches, is preserved for a series of years by the vital and attractive force within. The soul, or immortal principle, through law, seizes and appropriates the new material from the food and from the elements, thus supplying the vacant places of effete particles which are being constantly thrown off, and maintaining by its process its external image in this outer world. Through disease, and old age, as the counteracting laws which look to final dissolution because more and more operative, the soul becomes less and less able to preserve continuous vigor in the aggregated particles that make up its external covering, and eventually what is called death and decomposition occurs. During this entire process the experience of us all clearly illustrates the fact that the inner or spiritual man is constantly limited in his faculties and restrained in his manifestations by the physical body. From infancy to the departure of the spirit from its material encasement, the warfare continues between the mortal and the immortal. From the first childish effort at walking to the loftiest culmination of some thought that ever illuminated the globe the body still holds the spirit to earth, still dims the vision and checks aspiring hope. Sometimes the soul seems to have gained control over the body, but the limit of its capacities, or rather the limit of its outer capability of expression, is soon reached, and then its power to manifest the aspiring thought and deepening feeling continually diminishes. And how terrible, indeed, would be the condition of this intelligent source of vitality and thought—the inner or real man—if there was never to be a release from this environment of clay. This residence in an earthly body, however, as designed, stimulates and develops the spiritual faculties for the future activities of a higher life, and in manifold ways is useful for the time being. The bodily organs, in their healthy state, are said to act as checks or limitations upon the operations of the spirit somewhat as the balance wheel of a watch checks and regulates the uncoiling of the spring. The balance wheel causes the watch to move in time. The limitations of the bodily organs compel the soul, more or less, to act with reference to the conditions of time with reference to these experiences, which, however disagreeable they may be deemed, are the educational processes, which the benevolent and infinite schoolmaster has provided for the individualization and education of the children of the earth, and as preparatory for a practical appreciation of the higher duties that await them in the collegate department of the inner life, when the burden of clay has been thrown aside forever. Spiritualism regards the spirit as the man, having a material body, designed alone for the purposes of the earth life, and teaches that the resurrection consists in the withdrawal from the material body and introduction into the spiritual world of the man himself.

Spiritualism also teaches that the resurrection takes place immediately after death, or rather that the death of the physical body is caused by the resurrection of the man from it. The Spiritualist, confident of conditions adapted to his needs, and buoyed up by unmistakable facts, is cheerfully looking upward and outward, through the shining portals of organic law to an immediate reception by his beloved, when his own resurrection shall transplant him likewise upon the bright shores of another and happier sphere. As I have previously said, Spiritualism teaches that the spiritual man is the real man, and that he receives nothing of his absolute self from the material body, not even his form. The spiritual idea of an immediate resurrection which I have given is therefore a legitimate sequence of this fact. In addition to what is said in the Bible, if the mind unprejudicedly investigates this matter, it will be found that reason and angelic communications sustain the position assumed. So, likewise, do the analogies of nature, that great Bible written by God throughout all the departments of the universe, the revelations of which are indelibly indented in the rocks, thundered by the ocean in all its varied forms of sublimity and terror; exhaled by the flowers, whispered in the rippling streamlet and murmured in the impressive psalmody of the forest, that noblest of volumes, we can but admire even when we cannot understand, which needs not the sanction of councils or the approval of bishops to render it canonical. Indeed, nature is full of the most beautiful examples, analogous to man's true resurrection. The rough coarse calyx, to borrow a figure, is a body to the soul of the plant in the winter. The blossom is only the swaddling clothes of the real plant, the seed containing the life. And so man, in the earth life, is but the bud of what he will be. By and by, when through the process of death and decay, the external shell or covering shall have lost its usefulness, the immortal plant shall bloom and fructify in a more congenial realm. But the analogies are still more striking in the insect and the life. The beautiful butterfly, for instance, has found its resurrection through the natural law of change, incidental to the growth and progress of its undeveloped original, and can never again return to the chrysalis. The delicate humming-bird, with its exquisite plumage and wonderful rapidity of movement, once recognized the horizon and boundary of its universe in the tiniest of eggs. But the law of progress is inevitable and evolution the continuous pathway of the universe. The humming bird finds its resurrection in a world of adaptation, an atmosphere of perfume and of flowers, and never again inhabits the egg. Man, being essentially spiritual and immortal, finds his resurrection by passing out of the material body into a more congenial realm, his true and proper home, and can never again animate his worn out tenement of time.

He attains a resurrection of his material body when he is born into this world, and a resurrection for his spiritual body, his glorious resurrection, when he is born into the world of spirits, through the agency of what is called death, the misappreciated but universally benevolent accoucheur of all aspiring souls. Indeed, all nature bespeaks some such glorious consummation to these hopes and aspirations of the human soul. Under infinite power and infinite will, associated with infinite love and infinite wisdom, we find intelligent force and inert matter waltzing hand in hand, so to speak, throughout the vast halls of the universe, and to-day are as vigorous and active, seemingly, as they have been for millions of years. And can we believe that the Divine Author and ruler of all will thus keep the atom and neglect the soul? That divine intelligence will thus impeach and stultify itself in the future by ignoring the noble and aspiring hopes implanted in the intelligent spirit of the race? We cannot disregard the indelible premonitions so unmistakably apparent in the divine revelations of nature. Just as surely as the acorn foretells the unfolding of the future life and beauty of the oak, so likewise does the human soul in time, with all its wonderfully aspiring and expanding powers, foretell its own unending life, its own continued growth, its own increasing beauty and glory in the boundless domain of the hereafter, toward which human hopes unceasingly point, and of which human aspiration is the living prophecy. And, further, in this connection, the soul or spirit being an emanation from, and an individualized finite expression of the Great Father spirit as a necessary sequence, this individualized soul, prior to its resurrection, occupies in a finite sense, of course, the same relative position in the economy of the human body—(the epitome of creation)—that the infinite soul occupies in the grand economy of the entire body of the universe. The universe owes its continued existence in the realm of manifestations to an all pervading divine principle, distinct from matter as cause from the effects, which we call God. So the material human body without the soul, after the soul has found its resurrection, has no life in and of itself. "The active, plastic principle is the soul—the true man—of which the body is but the external expression and instrument;" and this soul, as the facts of Spiritualism prove, is an individualized entity. If, then, the spirit or soul is the man, as is demonstrated by the phenomena of Spiritualism, the analogies of nature further indicate the necessity for, and all the laws of nature imperatively demand, the death or dissolution of the physical body, and the resurrection of the man therefrom into another and more spiritual realm, when the resurrection is accomplished, our departed ones tell us, man finds himself first among those he has loved the best, and by whom he has been loved in time—the dear ones who may have preceded him in the lengthened pathway of the spheres. And, oh, what a consolatory and illuminating reflection is this, to feel, as the night time approaches, and we are about to launch our bark upon the silent river, that we shall not be alone, that the beloved of other years, our darlings gone before, are hovering near to welcome us, and that almost at the very moment we close our material eyes to the tears of earthly friendships our spirit vision will open to the welcoming smiles of those precious ones inhabiting the higher and brighter life. That our loved ones who have gone before are near us in the last trying moment of earthly existence has been beautifully exemplified in instances reported in the daily press; of celestial music; vocal and instrumental, being distinctly heard immediately above the couch of the dying. And what a sweet consolation indeed must such a fact be to those who are left behind. I cannot refrain from giving here the sweet and assuring testimony received in a communication a few days after her passing away of my wife's sister, who loved and was dearly loved by us, who at the time of her passing over knew nothing of the philosophy of Spiritualism:

"Dearest, I drew back for a time with fear and longed to stay with you, but joy of all joys. I have never left you. Your good bye kisses were yet warm on my mortal lips when I was enfolded in the loving embrace of papa's arms. Such a moment of supreme joy cannot be told in mortal language. Little sister, all the old pain was gone and the glory of heaven surrounded us. Up and on, at once we went and papa laid me down with tender touch in a beautiful arbor, flower bedecked and fragrant. Oh, little sister, how can I tell you how he brooded over and caressed me? I shall not attempt it. Little sister, I would die many times to attain love and welcome like this." After a kindly and satisfactory reception by friends, occurring as it does through the law of emotional attraction, has had its legitimate influences, the soul gradually gravitates to just such moral and intellectual associations as the experiences and activities of earthly life have fitted it for. Such have all the bodily organs that they had before their resurrection; they see and hear as in the earth life; have memory, love, hope, fear; they reason, desire, reflect, form opinions and express them; indeed, are the same beings they were before, except in that they have thrown aside the "muddy vesture of decay," and will, for a longer or shorter period, necessarily be subject to the relative and temporary effects of their earthly lives.

In fine, the spirit world being here, as Spiritualism teaches, and man an individualized spirit in the human form, when the resurrection takes place, when he rises from the body as described, into the next sphere of existence, stands forth there a complete human being, having left nothing behind him, as I have said, but his former material covering. Your affections, knowledge, experience and memory; your entire character, as intellectual, moral and emotional beings must be preserved, or your identity is lost. Spiritualism further teaches that infinite love through infinite law has provided for the improvement and ultimate happiness of all souls thus born through death into spirit life. It is estimated that thirty-six millions of the human family pass through the change called death annually. This is three millions per month and one hundred thousand per day. The greater number of these are or have been weak and ignorant, or as some soul critics would term them, wicked. None certainly have sufficient goodness to render them fit residents of the perfect Heaven of which we have heard, and just as surely all have too much goodness to warrant their consignment to the horrible hell of barbaric fabrication. They cannot be changed instantaneously into beings fitted for either place (supposing these places to have an existence) without destroying their identity, and contravening all known laws of mind. But in such a dilemma as the future of the race, even human benevolence can conceive of influences under which all mankind might be brought even in this life, by which they could be rendered better and happier, and gradually prepared for the highest and brightest conditions in the realms of archangel existence. And shall it be presumed for a moment that infinite love and wisdom have made no provision for the ultimate happiness of helpless humanity, after the unavoidable and torturing experiences of earth shall have ended? Can it be supposed that no means have been provided for the development of faculties in another life which have fallen short of a maturity in this; and which, from their nature, must have been bestowed by God for ulterior purposes of good? Brought into earth life without being consulted, forced by law through its changing experiences, the merest child of circumstances beyond human control (and taken from it at the last, independent of its own volition) surely the spirit of irony alone must have prevailed in the projection of man upon this planet, if there be no code of life in the hereafter, universally applicable, through which the inevitable errors of time may be corrected and the sorrows of earth find abundant compensation.

"What a joy it would be," said Theodore Parker upon one occasion. "What a joy it would be if there should come to pass a real revival of true religion, of piety and morality, throughout Christendom, a great growth of the soul, prophetic of whole Messianic harvests of truthfulness, of brotherly love and of true piety yet to come."

Only think of it. The revival of a true religion, its representatives teaching the glorious truths of nature and individual human consciousness, proclaiming the ever beneficent presence of the ever living God, who inspires man to-day as He has ever done through our time; who inspires the soul through intermediate and appropriate agencies, as through the sunshine and the shower He inspires the earth in her production of the sweet scented flower and the life sustaining grain. It is toward such a revival that Spiritualism is looking—the revival of the Christ principle practically in the every day of the soul. Spiritualism further teaches that spirit or soul being an emanation for Deity, goodness and truth are innate spiritual qualities, whilst evil and falsity are but defects of the external organization, and incidental to the law of progress, which is universally operative. The outward manifestations of these latter qualities, therefore, can have but a reflex action upon man's spiritual nature, and can only be temporary in duration. Besides, as I have shown, if men were instantaneously relieved of the relative effects of the organizational defects of time; if man were immediately and radically changed by the resurrection from the body, they would not even know themselves, and the purposes of both spheres of existence, of time and eternity, would thus be entirely ignored. Suppose, for instance, everything that is not perfectly beautiful, pure and true were to be instantaneously eliminated from the will and understanding, the thought and affection, of each of us here, I fear there would be not a very great deal left by which we could identify ourselves.

The inculcations of the spiritual school most emphatically urge the necessity and the wisdom of seeking to cherish whilst in the earth life the noblest and most enduring of man's emotions, the worship of the good, the true and the beautiful in the infinite unknown, by cultivating a higher and still higher appreciation of what may be known of these diviner attributes through the progressive tendencies of the infinite and the human, and that by this process of moral culture the individual soul is prepared for its resurrection, come when it may. Besides the facts of Spiritualism, those wonderful phenomena which have been so often grossly misunderstood and sadly misrepresented, satisfactorily demonstrate that the spirit world is not located at a distance outside of the realm of human appreciation, but that it is here, all around us, surrounding and interpenetrating the conditions among which we dwell, removed from our sight, and practically separated from us only by the thin veil of matter with which we are clothed as individualized spirits, and that when this veil of matter is removed by a resurrection of the man from the body, the spirit-world in which he has been all the time living is revealed to him more clearly, with no immediate change whatever in the man himself. As I have said he is the same being, and the creature of the same law, the law of individual progress included. And in his philosophic conception of individual growth beyond the grave proportioned as in this life to individual effort and desire, Spiritualism surpasses in beauty, comfort and consolation all the religious philosophies of the ages that have passed. Death through this law brings no terror to the Spiritualist. It is but the flower encircled door leading to the soul's immediate resurrection into a realm of diviner possibilities, a pathway of unending development, by and through which infinite justice and infinite mercy are beautifully reconciled; a career of progress in which the pangs of retribution are inevitably soothed by the inexpressible joys of legitimate compensation, as successive periods of thought and feeling shall continue to indicate the ascending scale of human happiness forever. Thus, my friends, the religion of Spiritualism is well suited for both time and eternity. The true Spiritualist should have confidence in God, and confidence in man, knowing that all are alike the children of one common Father. We should learn to pity the inharmonious idiosyncrasies of individual character, and to rise above the petty bickerings of social life as well as all the sterner experiences of the battle of existence, knowing so well what a beautiful sphere of compensation and of retribution we shall enter upon when the morning of an immediate resurrection shall dawn for each of us.

In the language of modern Spiritualism allow me to add:

Talk no more of death as fearful,
Call it not a chilling stream,
Thoughts of death should make us cheerful,
For it leads to joys supreme.
Call not death a monster cruel,
Whom no prayers or tears can move,
If it takes from us some jewel,
To the starry spheres above.
There they'll shine with growing luster,
Brighter for their second birth;
And we'll join that radiant cluster
When death takes us from the earth.
Fear not, then, 'tis but changing
From this world to brighter spheres,
Where our spirits ever ranging
Shall progress through countless years.

SONGS AND TUNES.

Let there Be a Marriage of Spiritual Words to Spiritual Music.

To the Editor:—I beg to state an opinion that President Barrett's statements about music are correct. He did not mean that we should have trained choirs, as Brother H. W. Boozer infers. He simply meant that if we can have inspirational speeches, poems, etc., why not inspirational songs with music that would be spirited, inspiring and melodious.

My experience is the same as that of the president of the N. S. A.

Having worn the old hymns and cards threadbare, the Liberal Spiritual Society of Oakland sent East and purchased new spiritual song-books, and we only found two songs in the collection that we "catching" and inspiring. The words of the remainder were passable but the music was seemingly machine-made and utterly lacking in spirit and harmony.

I would like to suggest that the N. S. A. appoint a committee to gather up a number of spiritual song-books, and with permission of the publishers, make up a collection of songs selected from all, and thus prepare a book which they could recommend to the public, and it would soon become popular, I am sure, for there is undoubtedly a crying need for such a song-book.

When one has successfully hatched out of the orthodox Christian chrysalis and become strong enough to attend a genuine spiritual seance he does not like to sing spiritual words attuned to the old "peeping-within-the-shell" melodies of "dying lambs," "dying thieves," fountains of blood, and "such a worm as I." He has ceased to be a worm, and feeling a new birth, an ecstasy of joy in the new-found wings of truth which carry him into the very presence of loving angel friends, he does not wish to ruin the joyful present with memories of the past by drawling out tunes which are steeped in thoughts of prostration before the mercy-seat, the gloom of sadness, the shroud of mystery which is wrapped so closely around the future state of existence, the terrible thoughts of sleeping in the grave until summoned to meet a jealous and angry God dealing out damnation to the many and reserving a few chosen ones to make a stingy little heaven surrounding his throne, who are to do nothing forever but sing his flattering praise—and I suppose think of their relatives roasting in eternal fire.

I wish I could forever forget the horrible thoughts this Christian religion used to bring to me when a child, when I would happen to wake up in the middle of a dark night. It was like a terrible nightmare! I would think what an awful thing it would be to hear Gabriel's trumpet blow, for the world to come to an end and myself and all my relatives who were not church members to be eternally damned! Then I'd cover my head with the bed quilts and try to shut out the awful thoughts, and long for the beautiful day to dawn, for then I would forget the impending danger which to me was as real as life.

Thank God for the beautiful light of Spiritualism! and that I have risen above the thought that I must become as a worm to gain the approbation of God; but know that I was designed for a sphere far in advance of the worm, and have work to accomplish that can only be done by rising to the utmost heights of spiritual unfoldment.

To attach the word Christian to Spiritualism would be like compelling a butterfly to carry his old chrysalis about with him; therefore when we rise to the plane of an exalted morality and spirituality we don't want to bring up painful memories by attaching the tunes of groaning human beings trying to humble themselves in the dust, to the beautiful words of inspiration, joy and gladness; but let our inspired musicians compose tunes to harmonize with the true spirit of the inspired words, and thus give us real spiritual songs, ringing out the glad tidings of the immortality of all souls created, in beautiful bursts of harmonious melody.

OUR TWO BODIES.

Materialization is becoming common nowadays, but among the miraculous wonders known to students of the occult, but not yet presented to the public, is the materializing of a medium's astral at a distant point. Now, as we have no record of this, I want to suggest that some medium who claims ability in this line have photographs of himself and astral taken simultaneously at different points, before competent witnesses, put upon record, that unbelievers and revilers may be able to substantiate such facts when brought to their notice, and not be left in doubt as to the reputation for credulity, veracity and sanity of their Spiritualist informer. Let some one file the proofs without farther delay.

EUTHANASIA.

A Study of Life and Death from the Spiritual Standpoint.

What Is Best for the Good of All?

To the Editor:—It happens, we will say, that neighbors are called in to watch all night with a sick girl, one of a large family. The invalid has always been of feeble intellect. This is the way the watchers talk about her:

"Nuthin' but a useless expense! Not wuth her keep! A wastin' good medicine ter pour it down her neck! Better pizen her! Sech folks hed ort ter be drowned er chloroformed ez babies, same's we git shet uv too many kittens!"

If the invalid overhears these comments on her unfortunate state and realizes their meaning, she is thrown into a condition of despondency. This does not help her to self-reliance or the development of a sturdy womanhood. What needs she?

First of all, the discipline of this life. Next, the loving care and instruction of friends, both in this sphere of life, at present occupied by her, and also in those spheres of life yet to come. This very girl may have, wrapped up in her organism, possibilities for good, of which the watcher does not even dream.

A baby is born to "Ole Mis' Murphy"—fourteenth child. Mrs. Murphy ought to have known better. "D——n the d——n brat!" mutters the unpaid doctor. The student at his elbow makes a suggestion: "Let the baby bleed to death!" Why should either of the parents care? What can such a child ever amount to? If it had the advantages of the surroundings of wealth and culture, it might turn out well. Such children always do, you know. The criminal ranks in our world are recruited only from the poorer classes!

The beings of the plane of life just superior to earth's school of instruction look upon the spectacle of the bleeding infant with feelings of the utmost consternation. They know that below our earth in the scale of being are countless stations of discomfort, or hells, to every one of which our earth appears a heaven by comparison. When those dwellers in these hells are fit to undergo their transition, they come to this world as weak and brainless as our newly-born infants seem to be. But it is a change for the better. It is a transfer from a world or plane where everything apparently stands still for countless ages, to a plane where progress is apparent and visible.

Students of medicine are as apt to justify murder, as they are to deliberately counsel unchastity. They advocate the slaughter of the newly-born from the standpoint of this world's observation only.

"One world at a time" is good doctrine. But we must become acquainted with our neighbor, or else live in solitude. The "angels" or superior beings know that Murphy's baby ought to stay in this world. To rescue the little victim from the devil-spheres toward which must be its passive, down-stream drift when chloroformed or drowned or bled to death, or otherwise conveniently "got rid of"—what a responsibility!

The howling demons of the lower spheres are described by those who have seen and heard them as being as much worse than the imaginary demons of our various beliefs as the real ones of the universe transcend in horror the fictitious ones of the theologian. There is always a faint chance that the birth-slaughtered may be rescued by "guardian angels"—fair and blest indeed. How little we can ever know from earth's standpoint, of the magnitude of their task—the tremendous sacrifice involved of all selfish "happiness!" We may not from any earthly tower of observation comprehend the readiness with which angelic beings renounce their own temporary welfare and comfort, even their most apparent means for their own progress, and go forth into the "dark places" of the universe to rescue and relieve.

The self-murderer, the most reasonable consequence of whose deplorable acts is an intensity of suffering not to be imagined here—misery that is but too terribly material in its nature—can often be assisted by these "angels," but how much easier for them to have aided him here, amid all his old surroundings—the discouragements which appeared so vast to him, seeming to their eyes so insignificant of moment and so simply and easily dealt with.

As a child mourns over the "ruin" of its block house, which the adult so easily rebuilds, so mortals murmur at their tangled threads of life, which hands angelic had very nearly disentangled, even unto the last perplexing snarl, when, presto! the fatal shot is fired—the fatal plunge into the dark water is taken—the convenient dose of poison swallowed—the murderous rope knotted, and the difficulties which met the gaze of a spiritual coward are doubled, are increased five-fold, ten-fold, an hundred-fold, multiplied by thousands!

What would a physician think of a man who should enter the hospital operating-room to say: "Sir, my parents had the meanness and the heartlessness and the impudence to bring me into the world with club feet. Now will I be revenged on them, and also on the whole world besides! Do you put out both my eyes! I'll fix 'em! Ha! ha!"

Such an utterance would be neither practical nor sane. The suicide, with all his physical courage, has a lack of moral stamina. His is not a healthy brain. No will made by him should be valid in any court.

Spiritualists should discuss suicide and other similar "merciful" murder, from the standpoint of other worlds than this of ours. There can be no unjust mercy, nor unmerciful justice. The suicide is quite apt to be "body-bound" for a time. Burying his remains with a stake driven through the heart is a good idea. In spirit-life he is therefore conscious of pain through the heart of his spiritual body, even as a man with an amputated limb can often tell by the strangest of all sympathy that the "dead" fingers or toes are cramped! Why? Because the severed limb was unusually vital and the "od"-currents and electro-magnetic relations with the remainder of the physical frame were not broken till the actual decaying of the buried member.

Many a spirit retains sufficient hold upon the body once so precious as to be most emphatically conscious of what is being done with it. It is not an idle superstition, it is wisdom to let the dead body lie ten hours without being moved or touched, if this is in anyway practicable. It is the instinctive caution of the true mystic that insists on the full three days' period of "lying above ground." The very earth of burial is charged for a space with the atmosphere peculiar to the living being! How instinctively the mourner throws herself upon the tomb, and feels minded to come often to the spot where the beloved one was laid away. There seems an actual sense of being called or drawn thither—a subtile attraction—for a certain time. People when blindfolded have been known to correctly locate the recent grave of a dear one, even in an unfamiliar spot, to which strange roads lead.

After a certain space of time, however, the "aura," or atmosphere peculiar to the departed individual and no one else, has left the grave and its immediate surroundings. No longer is the ground saturated, on the surface and below, all through and above, with the electricity and magnetism, and with the still more subtile and powerful essences.

No wonder we say: "The house is haunted! Set her dying-bed without the walls! Change the carpets, the furniture, the hangings, the pictures on the walls in the room where she lay ill, dying and dead! We cannot bear the sense that she is there!"

As terrible, to say the least, the feelings on the part of the spirit new to its surroundings: "Ah! touch me not! Oh! I hope I am not seen! Oh! let me haste away!" The agony of apprehension is tremendous—an awful dread that one will be seized and held by mortal hands! The new body of spiritual life feels strange. The spirit feels sure that she is just as materially clothed as ever. For a long, long time, obtains that awful dread of being seen by living eye, heard by mortal ear, touched by mortal fingers! As we enter a room, to us unoccupied, the "spirits" who are there flee in terror as great as that with which we would flee from them could we see and hear them as they see and hear us! The newly-arrived spirits! A long residence in the average conditions of spiritual life cures this instinctive flight at the approach of the mortal, just as effectually as maturer years do away with that instinctive "fear of the dark"—a good, wholesome fear—of our childhood!

SUFFERERS AND HELPERS.

A Humanitarian Proposition.

The air is filled with lamentation and weeping from many, many once quiet and peaceful homes in this fair land. Spirits are in captivity, sorrow and fearful anxiety, which erstwhile were full of cheerfulness, freedom and love. The anticipated delight of sweet communion with departed friends, is changed to gloom and dismay, in thousands of homes, by the discovery that darkened spirits are in possession and will not leave. I do not guess at this—the many letters on my table, from afflicted victims attest the truth of the statement, while the number is weekly increasing. Cohorts of unregenerated spirits are traversing the earth—blighting the happiness of thousands of families and of innocent and unoffending persons. I present this solemn fact to prominent teachers of the spiritual philosophy for earnest thought.

Another fact: The ignorant and vile, who are passing over every hour, are more numerous than the enlightened and good. This ratio may have always existed. The anxious inquiry is: What is to be the result?

In a little work entitled "Spirits' Homes," given through the mediumship of Dr. G. H. Miller, it is declared that spirits from the second zone, or sphere, will soon be prevented from visiting the earth and will be punished for wilfully annoying persons on the earth.

The increase of crime and the crowded condition of insane asylums, testify to the increase in numbers and power of wicked spirits, among the inhabitants of earth. Without law, without restraint, they crowd themselves into all circles of society, seeking out those whom they can annoy or control. There is scarcely a neighborhood in this western country in which you cannot find one or more cases of spirit possession. There are hundreds of cases that are never known except by the victims themselves as they seem always to have a dread of telling their friends—impressed upon them, no doubt, by their cruel tormentors.

I ask two favors of the readers of The Progressive Thinker, and of all who may read this article: That every person possessed of an evil spirit will write me, describing how he or she is afflicted; Second, that every one who has the Heaven-bestowed power of removing obsessing spirits and who, like Christ, is willing to aid any poor sufferer, freely, also to write me at Burr Oak, Mich. In this way we may establish an exchange and bring the healer and the sufferer together, and I will act as medium between the parties without any charge whatever.

Here is a great and pressing need—a great, humane work to be done. It should have the earnest aid and prayers of all true men and women. May Heaven and the good angels help us, is my heartfelt desire.

INTERNECINE FIGHT.

A Question for the Orthodox to Settle.

A Bishop Charged with Heterodox Views.

It appears that by reason of the proximity of orthodox Chautauqua to Spiritualistic Cassadaga the former is catching some of the inspiration of the latter. An X-ray of the thousands which radiate in all directions from the grand philosophy, religion and science of Spiritualism, as generated upon the Cassadaga rostrum, occasionally finds lodgment in the heart of Chautauqua a few miles distant.

According to a recent number of The Literary Digest, a painful controversy has been started in some of the religious papers concerning the orthodoxy of no less a personage than Bishop John H. Vincent of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In the first place, the general charge is made that the famous school at Chautauqua, of which Bishop Vincent is the leader and controlling spirit, has been "broadening in the wrong direction;" that among its popular lectures a "conspicuous place has been given to those who have no sympathy with the Evangelical churches."

A more specific charge is that, at a certain meeting at Chautauqua last August, Bishop Vincent said that "the divinity of Christ is not an essential article of the Christian faith." This particular statement first appeared in a letter written by a Southern Presbyterian clergyman to The Christian Observer of Louisville, Ky. Portions of this letter were copied in The Presbyterian Banner of Pittsburg, and The Presbyterian of Philadelphia, with editorial comment. At this point, Dr. Buckley, of the New York Christian Advocate, took up the matter and wrote to Bishop Vincent, asking if the utterances attributed to him had been correctly reported. In reply to this, the Bishop telegraphed as follows:

"The quotation sent is a gross misrepresentation. It could scarcely more perfectly misrepresent what I said." Upon this denial, the New York Advocate and the Pittsburg Christian Advocate joined in an indignant protest against the action of the Banner in giving editorial indorsement to the charge against the Bishop, saying that it (The Banner) should now either "substantiate its statements or retract them."

In its issue of November 4, The Presbyterian Banner returns to the subject in a two column editorial in which it refuses to retract anything, but proceeds, instead, in an attempt to substantiate the main charge against Bishop Vincent, namely, his saying that the divinity of Christ is not an essential article of the Christian faith. On this point The Banner sums up its evidence under the following heads:

"1. The author of the article in The Christian Observer, September 9, 1896.

"2. A correspondent of the Presbyterian writes: 'I conversed with a number of persons about what was said by Bishop Vincent upon that occasion, among them ten or more able ministers of the Presbyterian Church, and all of them were shocked and outraged by what was was said or implied by him.' Moreover he adds: 'I am able to prove the truth of what is stated anywhere and before any tribunal.'

"3. At least four Presbyterian ministers and a very intelligent lady from Pittsburg and its locality were present at the time, and declare that the Bishop said what the writer in The Christian Observer charged upon him. This utterance was too remarkable and so shocking to them that they made it a subject of prolonged conversation.

"4. But if possible still more decided testimony is found the next morning in The Assembly Herald, controlled by Bishop Vincent, which said editorially, that Bishop Vincent had said that it was not necessary to believe in the doctrine of the divinity of Christ in order to be saved.' Certainly that Journal would not misrepresent Bishop Vincent. That statement was published were it was made, was read by those who heard what the Bishop said, and was circulated while the Bishop himself was actually at Chautauqua. Yet no contradiction was given, no complaint was made.

"This cumulative testimony leaves Bishop Vincent and those who rushed so speedily and so confidently to his defense in a sorry plight, which gives us no pleasure, but which is necessary to our own protection."

The Northwestern Christian Advocate (Chicago), defends Bishop Vincent to the extent of a column under the heading "Orthodoxy, Heterodoxy and Doxy." It says:

"We have added reason to respect Bishop Vincent because he has not considered it vital to his reputation to rush into explanations every time some gossip tells a discounting story about him.

"The man who maintains a standing army to protect his good name simply volunteers the very conditions which make people think that he is consciously on the defensive. Russia's military peace-footing is immense and admirable, but it compels every other nation to ruin itself to be similarly ready for defense. The expansive territory of the United States is amply safe with its little brigade of volunteer soldiers, who serve principally to request Americans to 'Keep off the grass.'

"Nervous people betray conscious want of self-respect, or suggest to their enemies that just one more little push will surely topple their little cosmos into the dust.

"Habitual attitudes of defense pique the aggressive. Someone asserted recently that Bishop Vincent fairly abandoned the doctrine of the divinity of Christ in some somewhat private lecture at Chautauqua last summer. The matter trickled into the press, and we are sorry to recall the fact that the papers of a sister church were quite active in the arraignment of the 'heterodox Methodist bishop.' The substantial facts are:

"The heart of a lady whose training has been Unitarian was touched by the awakening ministry of the third person in the Godhead. She was tenderly willing to obey Christ, but was, of course, utterly unable to define the Trinity, or penetrate that mystery of 'Christ manifest in the flesh,' whose humanly intellectual explanation was beyond the ability of Paul, who frankly admitted the fact.

"Bishop Vincent told the sincere lady that spiritual things are spiritually discerned; that Jesus Christ reveals Himself to the humble, obedient soul; that the Triune Godhead is not amenable to the rationalizing mathematics whose jurisdiction is not conceded or contemplated; that there is a higher tribunal whose supreme presidency and sublime priesthood is Love; that the ineffable ministry of Christ and the holy Spirit condescends to men and women of spiritual low estate; that while logicians forever stumble among the intricacies of egotistic presumptions, the lowly Nazarene comes to those who seek Him, and that all genuine doubts shall be solved according to the inspired words. 'The work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever.'"

After some further observations to the effect that much ado has been made about nothing, The Northwestern Christian Advocate concludes as follows:

"We are not writing this to defend the bishop, since he needs no defense. For that very reason we have been silent, though others have sincerely thought it best to demur against the wrong done an innocent human helper. We have been in some conferences this autumn where Bishop Vincent presided, and where his spiritual ministry made deep and lasting impressions. He who may have read the extreme and more unjust statement of the Bishop's alleged doctrinal treason would have been deeply self-rebuked if he has given one instant of assent to the unjust imputations. Any man who can tenderly expound the minor significance of the divine message of the New Testament, as we heard it set forth, must be near to the heart of God, the divine Christ. We have no right to say this, but we say it."

In an editorial under the heading "Trying to Bolster up a misleading Accusation," The Christian Advocate (Methodist, N. Y.), declares that The Presbyterian Banner has failed to make good its charge that Bishop Vincent declared before a Chautauqua audience last summer that "the divinity of Christ was not an essential article of the Christian faith."

After referring to various points in the Banner's summary of its evidence, The Advocate says:

"There is but one point in The Banner's remarks that could raise a presumption that anything was said that should not have been said. It quotes The Assembly Herald as saying editorially, 'Bishop Vincent has said that it was not necessary to believe in the doctrine of the divinity of Christ in order to be saved.'

"We regret to state, however, that The Banner has not quoted the editorial note in the Chautauqua Assembly Herald correctly. This is the passage: Bishop Vincent then made a very strong address on the necessity of putting dogmatic theology in the background when the salvation of a soul is concerned. He dwelt especially on the doctrine of the divinity of Christ, and the fact that failure to believe in the divinity of Christ does not necessarily prevent a man from becoming a Christian.'

"Whether this is a correct version of the situation or not, we cannot say, but it is different indeed from the passage which The Banner professes to quote from the Chautauqua Assembly Herald. Bishop Vincent did not say that 'it is not necessary to believe in the doctrine of the divinity of Christ in order to be saved,' but that 'failure to believe in the divinity of Christ does not necessarily prevent a man from becoming a Christian.'

"The last proposition we believe. The Presbyterian Banner may make what it pleases of it, but we have no doubt that many a man who started to seek God did not at the time believe in the divinity of Christ, meaning by that the Deity of Christ, which is the orthodox doctrine, and which we profoundly believe.

"He did feel himself a sinner, prayed to God for mercy, trusted in the promises of Christ, and as such could become a Christian.

"However, we do not believe that a genuine believer, relying humbly upon the merits of Jesus Christ for salvation, would long remain in that state of mind without coming to the conclusion that, in a sense which could not be applied to any human being or angel, Christ is God."

I have thus given the readers of The Progressive Thinker both sides of this controversy between Presbyterian and Methodist editors over Bishop Vincent's utterance at Chautauqua, in order that they may decide intelligently upon its merits.

It occurs to me, however, that the position taken by The Presbyterian Banner is the correct one. The very essence of Christianity is a belief in the divinity of Christ; indeed, Christianity is founded entirely and unconditionally upon the belief in the divinity of Christ and the trinity of the Godhead.

The proposition seems plain enough to me, that failure to believe in the divinity of Christ does necessarily prevent a man from becoming a Christian—certainly so, as long as that failure to so believe continues, and that it does continue in the minds of many church members of all denominations throughout their entire lives, is a fact which cannot be successfully disputed. It was to such minds as these whose belief is not a matter of choice entirely, that Bishop Vincent addressed himself. What the Bishop desired to convey to his hearers no doubt, was that a man may become good, Christ-like, a Christian in this sense, without believing in the divinity of Christ, and this Spiritualism believes and teaches. This is the X-ray shot out from Cassadaga direct to Chautauqua and which penetrated Bishop Vincent's mind and heart, prompting his heretical utterance.

Spiritualism teaches that there is divinity in all humanity in various stages of development.

The evidence that there is a powerful leaven at work in old orthodox beliefs or "alleged" beliefs, is cropping out every day. Ministers are constantly stepping down and out of pulpits which they can no longer consistently occupy, and many prominent preachers like Bishop Vincent, instead of deserting their sinking ships are throwing out ballast which it is no longer able to carry.

A prominent Pesbyterian, an ex-moderator, is quoted by The Mid-Continent as saying to a caller the other day, in deep distress: "I do not know what has come over the Presbyterian Church. Look at my desk. It is literally covered with letters from churches seeking new pastors, and from pastors seeking new churches. There is a spirit of restlessness and dissatisfaction everywhere. I do not know what to make of it."

Our good brother will find out what to make of it sooner or later. He will discover that free thought is asserting itself and that the masses are thinking for themselves. H. V. SWERINGEN.

MARRIED.

Married, November 26, 1896, at the home of the bride's parents, Miss Grace L. Russell, of West Bay City, Mich., to Mr. Arthur Clare, of England. Mrs. M. E. Root, of Bay City, performed the services. The bride is a grand-daughter of Capt. R. Horsfield. May the young couple live a long and happy life together.

CONSUMPTION

TO THE EDITOR: I have an absolute Cure for CONSUMPTION and all Bronchial, Throat and Lung Troubles, and all conditions of Wasting Away. By its timely use thousands of apparently hopeless cases have been permanently cured. So proof-positive am I of its power to cure, I will send FREE to anyone afflicted, THREE BOTTLES of my Newly Discovered Remedies, upon receipt of Express and Postoffice address.

Always sincerely yours,

HUMANITARIAN WORK.

Social Settlements, Their Formation and Objects.

Not So Much an Institution as a Life.

A settlement consists of a group of men or women who have taken up residence in a poor district or in an industrial quarter of a city with the hope of bettering the lives they see about them and the conditions which have produced those lives. The basal idea of a settlement is a belief in the power of friendship to bless human life, says the Chicago Record.

In 1867 Edward Denison, an Oxford student, took residence in the east end of London, a district well known for its poverty and degradation, and began to labor for the inhabitants on their own ground. Mr. Denison's work was the same in essence as that of all future residents in such districts, and to him belongs the honor of initiative, as far as it can be traced to any one individual. In 1875 Arnold Toynbee, another Oxford man, spent his summer vacation in the east end. The enthusiasm of Toynbee and his labors, carried on in the face of increasing ill-health, so moved his friends that after his death Toynbee hall, the first social settlement, was established in 1885. Closely connected with Toynbee's name is that of the Rev. Samuel Barnett, a clergyman in the Whitechapel district, and founder of Toynbee hall. From the efforts and example of these three men, the number of settlements in London has rapidly increased, and there are also several in the large cities of Scotland.

The impulse in this country was not far behind that in England. Dr. Stanton Colt, a native of Ohio, spent enough time at Toynbee hall to be convinced of the worth of its principles, and in 1887 his "Neighborhood Guild" was opened in a crowded tenement region of New York city. The guild exists today under the name of the University Settlement society. In September, 1889, the first college settlement of women was opened in New York as a result of the efforts of four Smith graduates. In the same month Hull house was established in Chicago, with two residents, Miss Addams and Miss Starr. To Hull house was first applied the name social settlement, as distinctive from college university settlement. The later names are applied to those settlements having connection with a college or university, or drawing their support from the college settlements association. In its broader sense the term social settlement is applied to all. The number of settlements increased rapidly since the first ones were established, until they are now found in nearly every large city in the United States. There are nearly a dozen in Chicago.

A settlement is not an institution—at least it is not meant to be institutional. It is a life. It was because so many people had become distrustful of the machinery for doing good at long reach that the founders of settlements decided to live among the poor, study their needs and then give the help required as best they could. Therefore, to describe the activities of a settlement is to explain it only to the exent that such description suggests the life that inspires those activities. "Toynbee hall," says Mr. Barnett, its founder, "seems to visitors to be a center of education, a mission, a center of social effort. It may be so, but the visitors miss the truth that the place is a club house in Whitechapel, occupied by men who do citizens' duty in the neighborhood. The residents are not as a body concerned for education, tectotalism, poor relief, or any special or sectarian object." He continues:

"Each one leads his own life, earns his own living, and does his duty in his own way. Catholic, churchman, Jew, dissenter and agnostic live together and strengthen one another by what each contributes to the common opinion. There is no such thing as a Toynbee hall policy, and it is never true to say that Toynbee hall favored one candidate in an election, or that it stands for any special form of religion. A few men with their own bread to earn, with their own lives to enjoy, with their own sense of social debt, come to live together. No one surrenders what he has found to be good for his own growth; each man pursues his own vocation and keeps the environment of a cultured life. There is no affectation of equality with neighbors by the adoption of mean dirty habits. There is no appearance of sacrifice. The men live their own life in Whitechapel instead of West London, and do what is required of every citizen—a citizen's duties in their own neighborhood. Toynbee hall is not what it seems.

"Imitators who begin by building lecture-rooms and by starting schemes for education and relief, make the same mistake as those who followed our Lord because He made the sick man take up his bed, and not because He forgave sins. True imitation is when half a dozen men or women set on social service go and live among the poor. They may take a house or occupy a block in an artisan's dwelling, and they may begin without a subscription list or an advertisement. Out of their common life activities will develop, and the needs they discover will meet. Toynbee hall seems to be a center of education, a mission, a polytechnic, another example of philanthropic machinery; it is really a club, and the various activities have their root and their life in the individuality of its members."

The manin of developing those activities is well described by Mr. George Hodges, founder of Kinsley house, Pittsburg. After telling of the opening of the settlements in close proximity to several mills and factories of that city, the formation of acquaintanceships and the growth of friendship with the wage-earners who inhabited the district, he proceeds:

"The transition was easy from friendship to service. It was but natural that the new family, whose wonderful picture books were the delight of the children, should propose to the mothers to teach the little ones, kindergarten fashion. And what could be more simple than that the friends who came from other parts of town should do something for the pleasure and profit of the family's neighbors? Presently out of service would come leadership. This alert, aggressive new family would naturally suggest things. Are the streets in our neighborhood as clean as they ought to be? Are the tenement houses properly looked after? Are we getting the sanitary care which we deserve as citizens and payers of taxes."

"Gradually a neighborhood sentiment would arise. What can we do to make this a better place to live in? Then there would be social leadership, inspiring the meetings of the young people for pleasure, and presently finding and encouraging a demand for lectures and music. And then there might be political leadership, so that we may have a man who will really represent the progressive life of the ward and see that we have our rights."

Without necessarily starting any new thing the settlement strives to bring all the municipal and social machinery nearer to its ideal. By bringing into a neighborhood a people whose training makes them sensitive to abuses, and whose humanity makes them conscious of community needs, the settlement helps accomplish what machinery as such never could do. It furnishes leadership and helps to formulate the demands of the community in which it is located. The settlement is also a mighty factor in keeping the people of its neighborhood in touch with the higher life of the entire municipality. In turn the settlement itself is no small influence in stimulating and fostering that higher life.

When the Municipal Voters' league was formed and undertook the task of securing a better class of aldermen in Chicago, instinctively it turned to the settlements to furnish the leadership and center of activity for the wards in which they were located. Representation from the settlements is sought for nearly all reform and philanthropic movements of importance.

These places also serve as bureaus of information. They are means of communication between state, county and charitable institutions on one side and those for whose benefit they were intended, but who often are ignorant of the means of access to them. The activities of the settlement are as various as the needs of the community in which it is situated.

Settlements are not patronizing either in method or motive. They abhor the old-fashioned philanthropy, which would give of substance but not of self.

Their mission is not primarily to the dependent. In the neighborhoods in which they are located the majority are self-supporting and self-respecting folk, who would scorn charity or the offer of it, but who yet lack the social enjoyments and privileges which should be theirs. The worst defects of such a neighborhood are the lack of initiative and social intercourse among its people. These the settlement supplies so far as it can. It thus will be seen that the settlement is meant to be a natural center of healthy activity in a community.

One of the difficulties which the residents in such a place have to encounter is the apparent determination of gushing visitors and newspaper and magazine writers to refer to them as ministering angels to a criminal and pauperized people. Such extravagance and misstatement have a tendency to alienate from the residents the very persons among whom they live and with whom they are seeking to co-operate, and toward whom they assume no such air of patronizing superiority as is implied to them.

Miss Addams says the settlement is an effort to add the social function to democracy. "Hull house," she says, "endeavors to make social intercourse express the growing sense of the economic unity of society." She also thinks the settlement movement, from its nature, a provisional one. "I believe," she says, "that there will be no wretched quarters in our cities at all when the conscience of each man is so touched that he prefers to live with the poorest of his brethren, and not with the richest of them that his income will allow. It is to be hoped that this moving and living will at length be universal and need no name."

Thus will it be seen that the fundamental idea of the social settlement is broadly humanitarian and wisely designed to further the interests and welfare of individuals and society. In the truest sense its projectors aim to uplift and upbuild humanity in all things that combine to enlarge and ennoble men and women to the rounded fullness of moral, social and purely spiritual approximation to the perfection of highest human ideals.

While not technically spiritualistic, such work is truly spiritualizing; as is every work that tends to mental, social and moral unfoldment.

Miss Addams and her co-workers are doing a most noble and commendable work, and are entitled to the best wishes and help of all true lovers of humanity. J. C. UNDERHILL.

THE PALE BOATMAN.

The pale boatman's launched his silver boat
Out on the liquid sea:
It softly rocks at ease afloat,
In waiting, now, for me.
The low winds breathe their ceaseless, sighing song
To charm the sunset gleam,
The boatman's glance bespeaks "not long
You'll wait to cross the stream."
His thin, white hand slow dips the golden oar,
And dallies with the tide,
And turning oft from shore to shore
Makes ready for the glide.
The skies aglow with softest changeful hues,
Just o'er the dark'ning wave,
Seem opening endless, rapturous views,
To life beyond the grave.
The time-dull ears now listen for a voice
That vanished in life's morn:
The tender hand-clasp—none so choice—
That left me so forlorn;
No kindred mourner'll drop the fallen tear
Upon the death-sealed face,
While love-moist angel eyes appear
To melt with welcome gaze.
Beyond the misty cloud-veils, hanging low,
A dreamy light appears;
And draperies, white as driven snow,
Enwrap the fading years.
Anew the long lost, love-song echoes sweet
Upon the heaven-balmed air;
And green lawns wait my restless feet
To join my loved ones there.
I watch the tide-waves slowly come and go,
I feel the dew-damp's chill,
And hear the night-bird's tuneful flow,
Bespeaking "peace be still."
The solemn night, that only shows the stars,
Sheds tender moonlight down;
My trusted sailor fears no bars—
I'll soon wear life's bright crown.

EVOLUTION.

As It Was Before Darwin.

INTERESTING FACTS AND STATEMENTS IN REGARD TO THIS MOST IMPORTANT SUBJECT—B. F. UNDERWOOD, A MASTER MIND, GIVES HIS VIEWS.

Professor Huxley, in an essay published in the "Life and Letters of Charles Darwin," says: "Within the ranks of the biologists at that time [1851-8], I met nobody except Dr. Grant, of University College, who had a word to say for Evolution, and his advocacy was not calculated to advance the cause. Outside these ranks, the only person known to me whose knowledge and capacity compelled respect, and who was, at the same time a thorough-going evolutionist, was Mr. Herbert Spencer, whose acquaintance I made, I think, in 1852, and then entered into the bonds of a friendship which, I am happy to think, has known no interruption. Many and prolonged were the battles we fought on this topic. But even my friend's dialectic skill and copiousness of apt illustration could not drive me from my agnostic position. I took my stand upon two grounds: firstly, that up to that time, the evidence in favor of transmutation was wholly insufficient; and secondly, that no suggestion respecting the causes of the transmutation assumed, was in any way adequate to explain the phenomena. Looking back at the state of knowledge at that time, I really do not see that any other conclusion was justifiable."

ORIGIN OF SPECIES.

It was Darwin's "Origin of Species" which converted Professor Huxley to the doctrine of evolution. It was natural that he should think the evidence which had been adduced before he became acquainted with this work, "insufficient," and, of course, a man of his intellectual integrity could not give adhesion to any theory until he was satisfied of its truth. But while Professor Huxley's statement, considered as an explanation why he and other men of science did not accept evolution earlier is unobjectionable, it does scanty justice to those who were evolutionists before Darwin made his great contribution to the world's knowledge.

SCIENCE IN THE HIGHER SENSES.

A thinker who reaches correct conclusions in regard to complex problems, under the disadvantage of having a small amount of data upon which to base his inductions, may thereby show a knowledge of the relations of things, an appreciation of the evidential value of known facts, and a comprehensiveness of view, which denote a high order of intellect. In the higher sense, the man of science is he who has not only powers of observation, but ability to take the facts which are known, and to arrange them so as to explain their meaning, by discovering the principles which underlie them, as Newton explained the of the fall of the apple, when he conceived that the same force which brought the apple to the ground, also held the planets in their orbits. Mere observation and collection of facts would never lead to a great discovery; there must be reason, imagination, and insight, power to understand the significance of groups of phenomena, and to think beyond what is actually known, as well as care and caution in verifying what is conceived and held tentatively until it is fully established by larger knowledge. Imagination, as someone has said, is to the scientist, what the lamp is on the cap of the miner, and it enables him to see a little beyond the position occupied.

DRAWIN AND HIS PREDECESSORS

The work of Darwin in laboriously collecting evidence of organic evolution, and in showing that natural selection was an important factor in the transmutation of species, was a stupendous work which cannot be overestimated. The "Origin of Species" was an epoch-making book, which has revolutionized zoology, and led to radical and widespread modifications and reconstructions of thought in every department of research. And for the work he did, Darwin has received his full meed of praise; has been honored as no other man of science in his age has for the work which his genius and labor accomplished. But Darwin was not the originator of the theory of evolution, which itself has been evolved through many centuries. Facts which were a matter of knowledge long before the "Origin of Species" appeared, had led many acute thinkers to believe that species came, not by special creation, but by gradual transmutation through natural agencies. Goethe, St. Hilaire, Lamarck, Erasmus Darwin, Herbert Spencer, Ralph Waldo Emerson (who was acquainted with Lamarck's writings) Robert Chambers and many others, so believed, and their work and influence contributed to prepare the way for Darwin's success.

SPENCER'S CONTRIBUTION.

Years before the "Origin of Species" was published, Herbert Spencer brought forward some of the strongest evidences in support of evolution. His facts are incontestable, and his arguments are as valid to-day as they were then. The force of his reasoning, which failed at the time to convince men like Huxley, who required more evidence, is now acknowledged by them, showing that Spencer's earlier acceptance of evolution was owing to his true interpretation of natural phenomena and greater freedom from the influence of traditional beliefs and authorities, while their inability to accept the theory was due to their limitations, and not to their more correct judgment of what the evidence should be to render the theory probable.

Spencer conceived evolution, not merely as a transmutation of species, but as a universal process as presented in the system which he has since elaborately worked out in his voluminous works. In "Principles of Psychology," published before Darwin's "Origin of Species" appeared, Spencer assumes the truth of organic evolution, and applies himself to the task of showing how the mind has been developed from low and simple to high and complex conditions. Whether we accept all his views or not, as evolutionists, we must acknowledge the force of his arguments, based upon facts, for the doctrine of evolution, in distinction to the conception which prevailed when he began writing on this subject.

HUXLEY'S TARDY CONVERSION.

Professor Huxley, after his acceptance of evolution, repeated many of these facts and arguments which before, though they had convinced others, had failed to convince him. Had he possessed that larger range of vision, that philosophic grasp, that synthetic power and that wonderful faculty of dealing with problems in the algebra and geometry of thought which distinguished Herbert Spencer among thinkers of this country, Professor Huxley would probably have accepted evolution prior to 1858, upon such evidence as was then accessible. I do not underestimate Professor Huxley. He was a man of scientific attainments and literary accomplishments of a high order, a careful investigator in several departments of knowledge, a brilliant and fearless expounder of scientific truth, and an admirable character, but this fact, with his tardy conversion to evolution, should not be construed to the discredit of those who accepted the doctrine upon evidence which he regarded as "insufficient." The facts of embryology, of homology, of rudimentary parts, etc., known before the publication of the "Origin of Species," were to some minds as strong indications as they are now of the transmutation of species; but to them had to be added more facts, and some method suggested by which species could have been changed, before men like Huxley could declare in favor of evolution. This shows how important and necessary was Darwin's work to the wider acceptance and progress of evolutionary thought, but it does not in the least abate from the soundness of the general reasoning of those who, from the facts known arrived at the conclusion which Professor Huxley reached, at a later date.

ORTHODOX SCIENCE.

The "rigorous methods of science," which save us us from a prior speculation and many unwarranted inferences, may sometimes be applied in a way to delay the acceptance of a truth seen by a great thinker long before he can satisfy others that the objections are irrelevant or unsound, and that the evidence justifies his conclusions. Many scientific men, and teachers of science in the colleges were very confident that Darwin's conclusions were not "justifiable;" several years after Huxley accepted, and like a brave knight, defended them against scientific and theological assailants.

PIONEER THINKER.

Among observers and thinkers there are always some who are in advance of others in accepting or in anticipating newly announced truths. It is doubtless well that the majority, subject to the influence of custom, authority and associations, change slowly; for thereby is maintained that stability which is the safeguard of society and a condition of progress. But it is desirable that we recognize the merit and service of those who are the first to understand and assimilate a new idea or to adopt and work for a great principle, for they are the pioneers of these changes in thought and method, which are necessary to overcome the tendency to conformity, uniformity and conservation which steal like a mist over a nation, resulting in "intellectual peace at the price of intellectual death."

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

DEFENDS HIS PROFESSION.

To the Editor:—With all admiration for the beautiful teachings of Spiritualism (even aside from its phenomena) I am only dissatisfied with that phase which some seem bent on giving it, namely an attack on the skillful, benevolent and unoffending medical profession, whose well-known liberalism, as a class, on religious questions, is an established fact. Especially is this called to mind by an article of that nature in a late issue of The Progressive Thinker, otherwise an interesting contribution. Admitting that there is an occasional "doctor" that is not all he should be, particularly in the eyes of one who classes as a "Nazarene" with greatness only yet begun—are there not weak brothers or pretenders among all classes when "spirits, angels, gods are not infallible," but only "cultured reason" is? This latter should teach better than to score a doctor on information that is already second-hand, or to take credit for a case perhaps already convalescent, and worse than all to speak of "drops of codeine," which is a dry powder.

The appreciation everywhere bestowed on physicians, as well as surgeons, is sufficient answer to defamers.

None are more anxious than they to improve, cast off bigotry, and be reasonable; and they are improving, spurred on even by expectations of the impossible from anguished hearts.

True, the presence of a brave and sympathetic friend, a strong and kindly voice and countenance—yes, even a magnetic touch, may help to stem the tide of battle (or in chronic cases to eliminate or dispel all that is imaginary), but to drop all else when there still is work to do for physician, nurses or friends savors too much of that arch-egotist "Christian Science."

Even these clairvoyants need to be anatomists—yes, microscopists most thorough, to be able to name, discern, discriminate and describe the structures implicated, and to be versed thoroughly in all remedies to be applied and how, without the possibility of error. Special training for special lines; and this is not got by intuition or by sittings, unless accompanied by the usual honest work, ability and time and opportunity devoted. "A little learning is a dangerous thing. Taste not, or drink deeply the Pierian Spring;
For shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
While drinking deeply sobers it again."

T. F. CAMPBELL, M. D.

SOME RECENT HERESIES BY METHODIST BISHOPS.

Bishop Vincent: A disbelief in the divinity of Christ does not necessarily prevent a man from becoming a Christian.

Bishop Foster: We think sin caused death, and we are accustomed to say so. It is not true. Death is God's normal method of the universe! God made the universe for death!

Bishop Foster: Why did not Christ come immediately after the fall of man? Why was not Revelation made at once? Simply because it could not be. * * * In Eden language took form, but it was not sufficient for Revelation. Adam probably knew very little, and God treated him accordingly. He did not give him such a law as he gave to Israel at Sinai, but he treated him as you would an infant.

Bishop Foster: If I could concede for a moment that the world as I know it, and I know it from rim to rim, having traveled in all its lands, having seen its dissolute, despicable millions, having seen it in shame and filth, and if I were compelled to think that my God, whom I worship, would by any possible method of condemnation send down to hell 1,200,000,000 of my brothers, that know not their right hand from their left, and save a few of us who are a little better perhaps in our morals, I would not go into heaven if I could. I could not worship such a God as that. I would join the hosts of hell in rebelling against such a God. Our God is not a God of that kind. God is love and is trying to save men.

It is the opinion of the undersigned, that if God is trying to save men, He will succeed in spite of all kinds of Hell. Whatever God undertakes to do He accomplishes. H. V. S.

We can not too often think there is a never-sleeping eye, which reads the heart, and registers our thoughts.—Bacon.

The Other World and This.

A Compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature.

BY AUGUSTA W. FLETCHER, M. D.

In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well-handled with consciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

Post 8vo., 339 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton.

"THE DREAM CHILD,"

A FASCINATING ROMANCE OF two worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price: paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Serapitta" of Balzac.—"Daily Capital," Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis "Sunday Times."

THE QUAIL STORY.

A Reply to a Recognized Bible Champion.

Real Refutations are Very Rare.

T. D. Allen, in "The World's Crisis" (a Second Adventist paper), says "H. L. Hastings is not only a very forcible writer but has the ability to interest his readers, and the following able and interesting refutation of the argument of infidels from the account of the quails, which he gives in his pamphlet on 'The Inspiration of the Bible,' well shows that infidelity is not so strong a foe as many Christians have imagined." Mr. Hastings says:

"Men love objections: and so they say there are difficulties, and absurdities, and errors, and contradictions in the Bible. You have all heard such assertions. After speaking once in the city of Boston, an ex-minister came to me and told me that the Bible was not true, for there was that story which Moses told about the quails. Israel lusted after flesh, and the Lord sent them quails to eat, and they fell by the camp a day's journey on each side, or over a territory forty miles across, and they were two cubits deep on the ground, and the Israelites ate them for a full month. I have in my possession an infidel paper which was published in Boston, in which there is about a column of arguments and figures on this 'quail story,' giving an estimate of the number of bushels of quails that were piled up over the country, and showing that when they were divided among the people, each one would have 2,888,043 bushels of quails, which they were to eat during the month; giving each poor Israelite 69,620 bushels of quails to eat at each meal for thirty days, and therefore the Bible was not true! That is the meat on which these sceptical Cæsars grow so wondrous great.

"I said to this gentleman: 'The Bible does not say any such thing.' He replied that it certainly did; but I answered that it did not say any such thing. He insisted that it did. 'Well,' said I, 'find it.' And when you ask an infidel to find anything in the Bible, you generally have him.

"He could not find the place; so I turned over to the eleventh chapter of Numbers, and there read that instead of the birds being packed like cordwood on the ground, three feet deep, the account says that the Lord brought the quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, as it were 'two cubits high,' or about three feet high upon, or above the face of the earth. That is, instead of flying overhead and out of reach, they were brought in about three feet nigh, where anyone could take as many as he chose. And this sceptical friend had got the birds packed solid, three feet deep, over a territory forty miles across. As if I should say that a flock of wild geese flew as high as a church spire, and someone should insist that they were packed solid from the ground up, a hundred feet high! This is a sample of the kind of arguments infidels bring to prove that the Bible is not true."

CRITICISM.

Now let us see whether this is a real refutation or not of the skeptic's interpretation. Quoting from the Bible—as Hastings does—"two cubits high," he does not include the word "upon," so that the quotation would read "two cubits high upon," but leaves it out of the quotation and puts it in as if it were his own, a little further on.

Why did Mr. Hastings leave the word "upon" out of the quotation and make it less conspicuous by representing it to be his own? It was nothing less than a dishonest trick. He could not have done as he did without intent to deceive. It was a premeditated scheme to hide the force and purport of the word "upon" in connection with the word high, as it is written in the Bible. Webster's unabridged dictionary defines the word "upon" as follows:

"1. Resting, or being on the top or surface. Upon has the same sense as on, and might perhaps be wholly dispensed with.

"2. In the state of resting or dependence.

"3. Denoting resting, as a burden."

Therefore, in no other way can the actual Bible statement—"as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth," be rightly interpreted than that the quails extended two cubits, or about three feet, perpendicularly from the place of rest upon the surface of the earth.

Mr. Hastings then goes on to illustrate the absurdity of this interpretation, not the story, thus:

"As if I should say that a flock of wild geese flew as high as a church-spire and someone should insist that they were packed solid, from the ground up, a hundred feet high."

Compare the two expressions.

"Flew as high as a church-spire."—Hastings.

"Let them fall by the camp * * * as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth."—Bible.

In the first the birds are represented as flying, in the second as falling; in the first as acting, in the second as being acted upon. The first reach "as high as," the other, "two cubits high upon;" the first, "a church-spire;" the second, "the face of the earth."

There is not a particle of similarity between the two. And yet Mr. Hastings declares that the skeptic's interpretation of this Bible assertion is as absurd as would be the one hundred feet depth of his flock of geese, and presents the latter as "a sample of the kind of arguments infidels bring to prove that the Bible is not true." Thus we have two exhibitions of dishonesty in this "able and interesting refutation of the arguments of infidels." First, his effort to distract and hide the very word which necessitates the skeptic's interpretation: and, second, his presentation of that most inconsistent and inappropriate illustration as a sample of infidel arguments.

Mr. F. D. Allen also says: "Most Christians seem to think that an infidel is a very unsafe person to argue with, and believe it is better to ignore him than it is to attempt to reply to his objections," and that "the truth is, however, that infidel arguments have been met, and a person has but to study the writings of Paley, Watson and H. L. Hastings, to prepare himself to defend his faith whenever assaulted by unbelievers."

If the above is a sample of the writings for Christians to read in order to be able to defend the Bible, we skeptics would suggest that the Christians better continue to think and believe in this respect as Mr. Allen says; it seems that most of them do. E. A. TYLER.

THEY ARE TERRIFIED.

Strange Nocturnal Sounds Cause a Sensation in a French Regiment.

THE CORPORAL'S SUICIDE—HIS COMRADES THINK THAT HIS GHOST HAS COME BACK TO EARTH—TRULY A MYSTICAL NUMBER.

To the Editor:—The New York Herald has an excellent ghost story, illustrating the fact that spirits the world over are at work. It appears that the French Corporal Orleac killed himself, and why, no one knows. True, he was always a little odd, but then, if all odd men were to commit suicide the statistics of self-slain would contain a much longer array of figures than they do at present. Anyhow, one fine morning about three weeks ago Orleac came to the conclusion that life was no longer worth living, and straightway he shot himself to death.

This happened in the barracks at Toulon, in France, Orleac being a corporal of the Fourth regiment of infantry which was then stationed there. Naturally, this sudden and inexplicable taking-off of their old comrade caused a good deal of talk among the soldiers. But the dead are soon forgotten, and Orleac's name would ere now have passed into oblivion if it were not for the fact that, though dead and buried, he still seems to play a pretty riotous part in the land of the living.

And yet he was given a decent burial and, death having come to him of his own volition, it is strange that he should not be content to remain in the land of shades. Once in the grave, his comrades surely thought that they had seen the last of him; and, as they lay down to rest that evening the pious among them did not fail to say a last prayer for the repose of the soul of the misguided Orleac. The bed on which he used to sleep was near them, and more than one remembered how well the stalwart corporal used to enjoy his repose in that hard but grateful couch. But soldiers are not much given to sentiment, and soon they all fell fast asleep.

A MIDNIGHT AWAKENING.

Then about midnight a strange thing happened—a thing so strange that the men who heard it were paralyzed with fear. From the little room lately occupied by the defunct Corporal came a bloodcurdling sound, which was enough to strike terror into the heart of the bravest man. It was the sound of persistent, impatient rapping, now heavy and loud and a moment later timid and gentle. It was at one moment the sound of a warrior striking with a mailed hand on the door of a castle, and at another it was the plea of a prisoner in a loathsome dungeon begging for release and for even one breath of fresh air and one glimpse of sunlight.

From their beds sprang the awed soldiers, and the boldest among them began to investigate. They went into Orleac's room and searched it thoroughly, but nothing did they find. There before them was the plain iron bed, looking rather ghostlike in the white moonlight. The strange sounds continued, but whence they came none could discover. They did, however, discover one thing—that the sounds came in a series of fifteen. There would be silence for a few minutes, and then would come fifteen distinct raps, after which again would come silence, which would again be followed by the fifteen mysterious raps.

What could be the meaning of this? In the early dawn the baffled soldiers formed themselves into council and discussed the matter from every point of view. What could the corporal mean by scaring them in this fashion? That it was the corporal, or rather his ghost, that was rapping, was the general opinion, though a few skeptics seemed inclined to think that the lugubrious sounds were the work of a practical joker. Yet even they were nonplused at the continual recurrence of the number fifteen. Finally a taciturn soldier, who had been thinking deeply for some time, pointed out that Orleac's name begins with the fifteenth letter of the alphabet (O), and he maintained that their old comrade was in some trouble and desired to send them a message. This view of the case seemed very probable. Two or three of the soldiers had a vague idea of cartomancy, or fortune-telling by cards, and they insisted that fifteen was a most mysterious number and that some wonderful significance attached to the mysterious raps.

THE COLONEL IS BAFFLED.

At sunrise Orleac's ghost went back to the realm of the shades, and a report of the matter was at once made to Colonel de Beauquesne, the commander of the regiment. Now, he is a very practical man, and he at once gave notice that if the person who was playing this practical joke did not stop he would punish him with sixty days' imprisonment. The soldiers were glad when they heard this news, for they hoped their next night's sleep would be undisturbed. But they were disappointed. All night long the awful sounds were heard, fifteen at a time—all night long from sunset to sunrise. Night after night came the same weird, unearthly messages, until finally the entire regiment was half distracted. The Colonel searched and swore vengeance, but Orleac's ghost paid not the slightest heed to him. Only once did it refrain from its nightly visit to Orleac's chamber. The Colonel persuaded a dauntless soldier to occupy the corporal's bed for one night, and during that one night no sounds were heard. But the ghost came back on the following night, and ever since then, we are told, it has come regularly at sunset and knocked steadily until sunrise.

This weird story has caused much astonishment and no one seems able to give a satisfactory explanation of the mysterious rapping. That there is great potency in the number 15 has long been maintained by Kabalists, and, according to them, there is little doubt that the ghost, or astral body, of the dead corporal is speaking in this uncanny fashion. According to the Kabala, the number 15 signifies in the divine world predestination, in the intellectual world mystery, and in the physical world the unexpected, fatality. The Kabala further teaches that when this mystical number is linked to the life of a person it means that fatality will mar his plans, if he restrain not his passions, and that, no matter how strong he may believe himself to be, he must at all times be prepared to withstand the shock of unexpected catastrophes.

The body of Corporal Orleac is fast turning into dust, but his old comrades can hardly be persuaded that his ghost, or spirit, is not still among them. Their only wonder now is how long will these strange sounds from the unknown world continue to be heard.

This story from the French is highly suggestive. ALBRO.

A CLAIRVOYANT.

Something of Interest to Trance Mediums.

A Difference Between Genuines and Fakirs.

We have much pleasure in printing the following notice of that well-known missionary, Geo. W. Walrond, in the Denver Sunday Mercury, Nov. 22, 1896.

Of the so-called spiritualistic mediums now in Denver we have found only half a dozen who really are worthy of being called such.

We had an interview with one of them this week and found him to be an educated gentleman who had traveled in every quarter of the globe, principally, however, as a British officer, he having served something like twenty-two years and had seen much service in the battle fields of South Africa, Zululand, Egypt and elsewhere. He is George W. Walrond. During these wanderings in the East and in India he made occultism and the mystic sciences a profound study, so much so that he now claims to have mastered many of the secrets relating to adeptship, a term somewhat synonymous to mediumship as known in this country, and judging from the many testimonials in his possession he has certainly earned at least a right to such a claim. During the past fifteen years Mr. Walrond says he has devoted his attention chiefly to the development and practice of the gift of clairvoyance and trance speaking and astrological readings and has a most distinguished reputation in the ranks of Spiritualism, not only in Great Britain, but throughout the Canadian provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and in the principal cities of the States. We found also that Professor Walrond is a most efficient commercial gentleman, having filled many very responsible positions of trust with several wholesale and manufacturing firms. He says he found his occult gifts very often of great service, particularly when on the road as a commercial traveler.

Asked to define what the word "occultism" meant he said it was a word not commonly or generally understood. Even many Spiritualists looked upon the word with a tinge of disdain, and upon an occultist as a pretender to something beneath spiritualistic notice. Probably this was due, he said, to the vague dictionary definitions of the word.

Occult science lifts the veil of secrecy from nature's laws and enables the occultist to penetrate into the very hidden mysteries of life and into the very soul of things. It unfolds the latent powers and possibilities of the human mind, initiating students into the occult principles of nature, principles hitherto kept from the gaze of humanity by the rulers of dogmatic men. These principles govern man's physical being, and until man has acquired a knowledge of these occult principles he is unable to investigate the manifold phenomena surrounding him. Occultism, the professor continued, has a very wide range of penetration and research. It embraces every conceivable subject relating to matter and spirit. It deals with mystical and psychical research in a most exclusive manner, of which spiritism, Spiritualism, theosophy, white and black magic, astrology, esoteric Buddhism, and the many varied phases of spirit and mental phenomena, etc., are but parts. Spiritual truths have been the ne plus ultra of all religious and mystical seekers, but the occultist in all ages, from Abraham the patriarch to Joseph the diviner of dreams, from Moses and Aaron and the Egyptian magicians with their enchantments to Daniel, one of the astrological soothsayers of Beshazzar's time, from Jesus and the Apostles with their varied spiritual gifts to the occultist (including the medium, astrologer and healer) of the present generation, has found himself in touch with the so-called masters of wisdom. That there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in our philosophy we fully believe, and if there is a teacher of the occult or mystical sciences capable of convincing those in search of the truth of that Shakspearean aphorism we think Mr. Walrond is able to do so. There is no doubt that Spiritualism (that is the pure unadulterated article) is gradually permeating society, literature, religion, and the churches. Even Dr. Talmage in his last Decoration Day sermon in Washington, D. C., on the 31st of May said:

"Who says that the dead do not know of the flowers. I think they do. The dead are not dead. The body sleeps, but the soul is awake and unhindered. No two cities on earth are in such rapid and constant communication as earth and heaven, and the two great Decoration Days of North and South are better known in realms celestial than terrestrial."

Mr. Walrond says he has had numberless evidences of spirit return, while his experiences, grave and gay, of matters relating to the occult and ghostly side of life cover a very wide area. Some of these he very kindly promised to write up after a time for the benefit and amusement of our readers. We understand he has already a large clientele in Denver which no doubt will be enlarged as his gifts and teachings become better known.

WHAT IS DEATH?

What is death? With its icy hand—
How few there are who understand
The laws of Nature, in its might—
It is only a passing from darkness to light.

A parting from earth and this body of clay,
To a beautiful land where all is day.
We are gradually climbing, one by one,
Onward through life till our work is done.

Ah! yes: Mother Nature must have her way—
We are progressing onward day by day—
Born by a law that compels us to be;
Born to conditions we could not see.

And as we go onward each day of life,
At times there is peace, at times there is strife;
At times we feel so very glad,
At times our heart is heavy and sad.

Life is a mystery we do not understand;
In the working of Nature we see God's own hand;
A lesson of harmony, truth and love
We learn from the little stars above.

We learn from the stars that shine at night
There must be darkness, there must be light;
There are conditions to understand;
Mother Nature and God work hand in hand. JENNIE PETERS.

SPIRITUAL INSTRUCTION

Body and Spirit and Their Relations to Each Other.

The Philosophy and Benefits of Prayer.

On the morning of November 25, 1896, I was up early to discharge certain duties. After they had been completed, it being yet too early for breakfast, I picked up my writing tablet and seated myself, as I felt the presence of angels, and the following was written:

"The infinite possibilities of the soul are gradually unfolded and extended. Their uses depend upon opportunity afforded, their calling out upon desires—individual desires. Thirst for knowledge awakens and starts them on the quest of this, and in this sense desire is father to thought. Look upon the ego—it is soul and spirit substance, compounded from Nature in her laboratories and has the seal and sanction of the Infinite Good, the All-Power."

At this point a tiny bowl was placed before my vision by a real angelic presence, who said:

"This is the 'golden bowl' to which the 'silver cord' is attached; or, in other words, it is the individual ego, or the chemical essence in compound for the unfoldment, growth and completion of an individual entity of its kind. The silver cord represents the seal of the infinite, in ethereal, electric and magnetic substances. Through these three lines attached to each individual ego, the quickening and supporting, proper, is effected, and is the life. The representation of these force-streams, in common phrase, is called the umbilical cord, and when it is severed life has fled from the body: but it is always most deftly severed and instantaneously attached to the risen spirit. By reason of this seal man and all things beneath him in degree are entitled to the defence of immutable law, and have a right to a maintenance in any world or sphere where their service is needed in the divine economy of creating worlds, their outfit and people, and to improve them. That is, all things beneath man serve him, and he in turn must do service to aid in general and specific ways, for his own as well as the general improvement of all."

Just here the query flashed through my mind: Why this intelligence had spoken of the "Infinite Good" instead of saying God, when this was written:

"You ask why we call the All-Power the Infinite Good. We answer, for the reason that the purified essence stored at the apex of the universe, which we call the Central Luminary, or Fountain of Light, represents all that is, in substance, in the universe, and is its power for evolving and casting into forms for beginnings and the gradual working order for refinement. The bringing up of man to the required fitness called for by the qualities of substance and force contained in the ego, has its guarantee from and in that source which sends the triune life-substance through the silver cord, and which is, therefore, called the Infinite Good, or God—if that term be more pleasing."

Here, again, another thought flashed through my mind in regard to prayer, when the following was rapidly written:

"You ask how prayers directed to God, or this All-Good, are received and answered. It is like this: The shades of this All-Power represent love, wisdom, truth, justice, mercy and such like qualities. Prayer, be it in thought or spoken word, rises in shades; there are record-keepers all the way from Earth to Heaven, who understand the vibratory tick as well as the language of the shades in all its meaning, and prayers offered are answered in accordance with law and all-wise provisions in connection with man's right to protection and support, as before stated; but be it remembered that they are considered and answered in the degree of the petition. They may be directed to God, but be so full of selfishness and arrogance that they cannot rise, but instead go to their own level of quality.

"Learned or so-called stereotyped prayers, nicely worded for show, count against him who offers them, doing no good in any sense; while prayers offered from the heart, in sincerity, do bring blessings which are as the breath of Deity, as the whisperings of angels—as a holy benediction and a sure relief in times of distress, as well as a more bountiful measure of joy in peace and prosperity: and quite in place is prayer at the beginning and ending of serious things. To ask for light, for truth and for aid is well, and to return thanks for the same proper, but words should be few and from the heart always."

Other duties now called me, and the presence which had come as a flood of light, the living presence of an angel, receded. I read over what had been given me, and, thinking it might be of benefit to your many readers, I send it to you. MRS. M. KLEIN.

Van Wert, O.

EFFORT, NOT EASE.

This world hath need of workers—
Of workers strong and true;
There is no place for shirkers,
But work from all is due.
There are evils to be righted
And wrongs to be requited;
Something for all to do.

Make effort, not relying
Upon your neighbor's toil,
For what you seek, denying
Your need to till the soil,
When from the harvest plenteous
You claim a share most bounteous!
Go! with the workers toil.

Exertion, effort, labor—
Not weakly passing on
Our duties to our neighbor
(Judgment to pass upon);
Not sluggishly ease-taking,
But every power waking—
For this we're called upon.

The best from each is needed
In this great world of woe;
The voice of duty heeded
By all who duty know,
Would lighten loads of sorrow,
And hope's bright visions borrow,
To banish gloom and woe.

While wickedness and evil
Around us flourish most,
Why take our ease—then cavil
At workers at their post?
Ne'er making slightest effort
To lend our aid, or comfort
Those who do labor most!

The world is full of croakers
Who "better far could do,"
Than e'en the hardest workers
With highest aims in view.
Such fret, but ne'er endeavor
The bonds of men to sever;
Content to croak, not do.

Then if we be not ready
To lend a hand, in need,
A brother's steps to steady,
Or help the workers speed—
Let's try, at least, to conquer
Our hostile spite and rancor,
And grant them their just meed.

A PROPHECY CONCERNING ROME.

To the Editor:—Through the mediumship of Dr. G. H. Miller, of Mammouth, Arkansas, the following important prophecy has been given, a copy of which has been sent to me, and I would be pleased to have it published in your valued paper. I have made the Church of Rome a study for many years, and know that all that is alleged against her is true; and if the balance of the prophecy comes true, as I fully believe it will, the world will be rid of the greatest octopus for the mental degradation of human kind that ever existed. As error is the prolific cause of all the evil in the world, the Church of Rome has held the world in darkness, doubt and fear for many centuries, and evil has increased.

SPECIAL PROPHECY.

"Unholy, unrighteous Rome, city of wickedness, cesspool of infamy. Your garments are scarlet, made so by the blood of the righteous that you have slain. Thy days are numbered, for the time draws nigh when the hand of Justice will be laid upon thee, and the places that once dreaded thee will fear thee no more. Born in falsehood and iniquity, you have been the enemy of justice and liberty. You have upheld and nurtured ignorance and superstition. In your dungeons you have imprisoned the apostles of peace, and in your courts you slew the lovers of truth. Your abominations are as the sands of the sea shore; your deeds of cruelty as the leaves of the forest; your depravity is only equaled by your avarice, and your licentiousness is measured by the desire of your lust. The evil that you have dealt to others shall be meted back to you tenfold, and your pomp and vanity shall be brought low. No longer shall you despoil the nations nor lead the people into gloom and ignorance. Your tyranny and power goeth out with century, and in the dying hours of the closing years thereof thy children shall mourn for thee."

GENERAL PROPHECY.

"Cyntheena, the Celestial Messenger (an ancient Egyptian who lived in prehistoric times), to the people of Earth:

"As ye sow, so shall ye reap. The measure of your conduct has been taken. Greed, avarice and vanity sit in high places. Wickedness dominates the earth. Love, mercy and righteousness have been banished, while liberty and justice are trampled in the dust. The mother and her child cry for bread. The many are ruled by the few. Through ignorance and superstition have the masses been held in slavery. Your creeds and religions are false. Your bibles are the works of men. You have insulted the spirit of divinity and put to death the lovers of truth.

"Socrates was sent unto you but your priests and men in power slew him. Jesus (the Syric), a righteous man, came to give you the truth, liberty and the brotherhood of humanity, but ye murdered him and over the sepulcher built a church given to power, licentiousness, greed, jealousy and wickedness. You have belied the teachings of the man of Nazareth. You have made of him a god, and a virgin a mother of god, doubly blaspheming Divinity, and holding your sister woman in ignorance and bondage. Your priests and clergy, rulers, politicians and men of wealth are evil in the sight of Divinity. Your bibles, gods and Satan are but the creations of men.

"Hypatia of Alexandria was inspired to lead you from evil delusions; but your priests murdered her and scraped the flesh from her bones. Bruno was inspired to propound the truth; but your popes imprisoned and cursed him and then burned his body to ashes. Michael Servetus was sent, like Bruno, to dispel the gloom of ignorance and give truth; but John Calvin, the founder of Presbyterianism, burned his body at the stake.

"Spiritualism has been presented to you by the Messenger in charge of your planet. You have blasphemed and ridiculed its science and its philosophy. You have upheld evil and cursed the good. You have permitted Pharisees and hypocrites to degrade and debauch the gift of a loving mother. False media and prophets revel in the garb of Spiritualism and thereby degrade its holy mission.

"There is no angel Michael, no Gabriel, no Jewish Jehovah, no Catholic or Protestant God, no Devil or Satan. The only Satan or devils that exist are those in human forms. Your atmosphere is filled with those, because your thought and deeds are evil. You know not your Mother, the Great Spirit Divinity, is feminine and hence the Great Spirit is your loving and eternal Mother. From her all have come, therefore are you all children of one loving and everliving Mother. You know not; neither your brethren. Ye are worshipers of false gods and followers of mammon.

"As ye have sown, so shall ye reap. In the year 1896, in the twelfth month, from the fifth to the twelfth thereof, the Messenger shall impign the ether currents upon those places where the evils were first propagated, and your earth will be shaken as a tent is shaken by the wind. Parts of Asia and Europe will first receive the outpouring of Justice, and great will be the earthquake in those parts.

"Woe unto the people of earth if they will not turn from evil and seek for truth. Natural law is the law of Divinity. Knock at the door of the library of Nature and it shall be opened unto you. Banish evil and enthrone righteousness, or this shall be but the beginning of the end. 'Whosoever is my disciple shall do the things that I do, and even greater things shall he do.'" "Jesus Malathel."

I give the above as it was given to me by the good Doctor Miller. Yours for truth, CHARLES HOWELL.

THE SPEAKERS' ASSOCIATION.

Many favorable replies from platform workers are coming to me. There seems to exist quite a general desire for the association. The important thing to consider, is the personal expense. I am firmly convinced that several central cities (or camps next summer) would offer inducements to meet these and give all proceeds from pay meetings which would be sufficient for a liberal per capita to help expenses incurred by the members. Such a meeting once a year would be able to attract thousands of people to attend the public exercises which could be arranged for at least two or three evenings. I trust all of the speakers will write to me or to the papers. My address for December is 283 Seventh street, Buffalo, N. Y.

GRAND TEMPLE, ORDER OF THE MAGI, CHICAGO.

Since our last report, the Temple in Chicago has been running at 421 West Monroe street, and has worked degrees in regular order from 1st to 7th inclusive. At the last meeting, Brother Bernard C. Peterson was duly ordained as Grand Magea of the jurisdiction of Chicago, with authority to confer degrees and hold regular convocations of the order during the absence of the Chief of the jurisdiction of the United States. Regular meetings will be held each Sunday at 3 p. m., as usual, at the above number. Nearly all the Grand Temple Charts are to be left in the temple to aid in the instruction of classes. The Grand Temple of the United States will be opened in Cleveland, Ohio, at 1273 Euclid avenue, next Sunday at 3 p. m., and degrees conferred in both the outer and inner temples during several weeks. The address of Mrs. Richmond, G. S., and myself, will be at the same number, where seekers after light will find us during the term. But I desire particularly to say to members and friends everywhere, that any address ever given by me will reach me. Plain "Chicago, Ill.," even, is good. I am receiving letters asking me about the new book of lectures, "Evolutionism," and when it will be out, and in reply thereto will say that it will be ready to mail about December 24th. Circulars will be mailed to any address. It is uniform in style and price, with the "Religion of the Stars," but on much finer quality of paper.

Report of the work will appear in The Progressive Thinker from time to time and I advise members everywhere to subscribe for this paper. The lecture, which appeared a few days since in this paper, on "Evolution," is the opening lecture in the new book. Others may appear later.

W. H. BACH AND HIS WORK.

To the Editor:—I was called here on a season's engagement the last Sunday in October and if the past experience is a criterion of the future, it will be a season of continual revival. We hold meetings Sunday and Thursday of each week. Sunday at 3 p. m. is our Childrens' Lyceum, while at 7 p. m. is our regular service. Although the lyceum was organized since my arrival, it has progressed so that we have an attendance of about fifty at each of its sessions while the past two Sundays have reached sixty and over. In the evening our hall is well filled, nearly every seat being taken. What phenomena are presented are given on week evenings, but our Sunday platform is devoted to the philosophy. The results prove that it is the best way to proceed.

Thursday afternoon a meeting is held at which plans for the work are discussed, and between 6 and 7 supper is served in the hall. Between 7 and 8 social conversation is indulged in, and between 8 and 9 we present a literary and musical entertainment. Every fourth week we have an issue of a newspaper called the "Sunflower," which is composed of clippings and many original articles. It is very interesting. Following the literary part of our programme comes a social dance. For this we have our own music; with one exception the musicians are members of our society, and include the preacher.

We charge for the supper and ancing, and the entertainment is free as are our Sunday meetings.

Within the past month we have secured a bookcase and a library of nearly two-hundred volumes. About fifty copies were secured last week. This was done at the suggestion of Mr. James Lewis, one of our members who donated one-hundred dollars worth of books as a "starter," and his worthy example was followed by other members until this result has been attained.

We have a fair this week Thursday at which the ladies expect to add considerable cash to their treasury. A novel feature is: Cards were printed asking individuals to attend our fair as a birthday party. Attached to these cards were small sacks and the recipient was invited to place within one cent for each year of his or her age and return same. Returns already in, show the success of this novelty.

We are preparing a pleasant Christmas entertainment for the children of the Lyceum which will include a play and the necessary Christmas tree.

Perhaps you think Spiritualism is dead in this neck of the woods, if you do, ponder over this report.

E. V. WILSON'S WORK.

To the readers of The Progressive Thinker: Mrs. Sprague and myself have been trying for years to make conditions to visit our dear friends Mrs. E. V. Wilson, and her daughter Lois, and at last we are here in their home.

We find Mrs. Wilson in very poor health, being scarcely able to do for herself.

Last winter she passed through a long, severe sickness. She was taken suddenly ill with pneumonia, about the middle of December, and did not leave her bed for four long months. For six weeks she was not expected to live from day to day. On one occasion the doctor told the daughter that her mother could not possibly live until morning; but the spirit friends declared that she would live, that she would get up again. A circle was formed around the bed, and the spirit friends were present with great power. After a time the sitters were delighted to see the patient open her eyes, and hear her say: "I feel better now, much better." From that time she improved, though slowly.

E. V. Wilson did a glorious work for our cause, as all Spiritualists well know, and this good sister, his widow, is now in need of assistance—(not charity). She has, with the assistance of friends, been enabled to get out a new edition of her husband's book, "The Truths of Spiritualism." It is a book of 400 pages, in good cloth binding. It contains a splendid portrait of the author, and also a record of many remarkable tests given through him, in different parts of the United States; also experiences that were his—some of which were ludicrous, some pathetic, and many startling. One chapter is devoted to an explanation of the laws governing mediumship. It is a remarkable book and is worth double its cost.

Friends, send in your orders at once; that Mrs. Wilson may receive them before Christmas. The price of the book is $1.00. Address her at 91 South Locust street, Valparaiso, Ind.

The book will make a splendid Christmas present to a friend.

WISDOM FROM THE PULPIT.

Good sense in the orthodox pulpit is not so frequently exhibited as to make it monotonous. When a good thing is said it is the policy of the church press to stifle it, while years may pass before it reaches the populace. The late Wm. Connor Magee, Archbishop of York, England, let fall a sentiment in a sermon delivered in St. James' Chapel, London, in March, 1889, which appears in his "Life and Correspondence," by J. C. Macdonnell, D.D., which American churchmen could profit by with advantage, particularly in their zeal to convert the republic into a hierarchy. At the time of the address Dr. Magee was Bishop of Petersborough, and his eloquence and logic was directed against Christian Socialism. He embodied the same idea in a letter which appears in the volumes mentioned, from which we quote:

"Christ's kingdom, as he himself told us, 'is not of this world;' his laws are laws, not for the world, but for the Church; and the attempt to turn them into laws for the State, enforced by civil penalties, would be, as regards those on whom they were to be enforced, an intolerable tyranny; and as regards the State an impracticable absurdity. No State which adopted them as its laws could survive for a week. How could a State exist which forgave all its offenders—that is, all the criminal classes—until seventy times seven? Or which never resisted evil, but turned always its right cheek to the smiter; or which gave to every one that asked, and never turned away from any that borrowed? These are all of them counsels of perfection given to spiritual men, and only endurable or possible so far as men are filled with the spirit of self-sacrificing love. For the State, which is a kingdom of this world, to impose these as laws upon all men would be, as regards citizens, as I have said, tyranny; as regards itself, as suicide. Christian Socialism, so-called, is, therefore, a thing intolerable, if enforced; and only tolerable and possible when voluntarily adopted. It is, as I said, only one of many attempts to make the laws of the State and the laws of the Church one and the same; and, as such, is foredoomed, like all its predecessors—the Papacy, and the Fifth Monarchy men, and the Puritan laws of New England—to certain and speedy failure."

If the orthodox pulpit of America would rise to the same high plane as did this English divine, they would cease their silly strife to get God, Jesus Christ and the Bible into the Constitution, and try to get genuine grace in their own hearts.

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS.

The Chicago Woman's Educational Union is still intent on getting the Bible into our public schools again. On the 3d inst. Elizabeth B. Cook read a paper before the society, in which she claimed Archbishop Ireland, Bishop Spalding, Cardinal Gibbons, Right Rev. John J. Keane, Cardinal Satolli, W. J. Onahan and many other Catholics are in favor of the measure.

It matters not how many cardinals, archbishops, bishops and priests favor intruding sectarianism into the public schools. The Bible is a discordant element there, and so long as there is a single tax-payer opposed to its use as a school-book it should be excluded from the school-room. The age is too far advanced to allow any species of sectarianism to be forced on children at public expense. The minority have rights and these rights must be respected. It is not quite certain churchmen will always be in the ascendant. Should they chance to lose their present prestige we hope Spiritualists, Agnostics and the so-called heretical sects will not attempt to tyrannize over them.

DID FRANKLIN LIE?

It was current in the papers a while ago that when the convention to frame the Constitution of the United States was in session, that body made no progress with its work; that Benjamin Franklin, who was a member, became alarmed at the discord, and moved the opening of each morning session by prayer; that he sustained that motion by a powerful speech; that the resolution was adopted, prayers followed, and the work of the convention then went on in harmony.

It is too bad to spoil such an excellent story, but he who turns to page 460 of Benson J. Lossing's "Seventeen Hundred and Seventy-Six, or The War of Independence," will find that very short speech fully reported, and at its close the following in italics, which we quote verbatim:

"[Note by Mr. Franklin.] 'The Convention, except three or four persons, thought prayers unnecessary.'"

In making the note did Franklin lie? or was the fellow who credited such wonderful efficacy to prayer mistaken?

NOT OF GOD BUT OF THE PEOPLE.

Dr. Timothy Dwight, for many years president of Yale College, in the course of his valedictory address, September, 1775, made the following utterances:

"This empire is commencing at a period when every species of knowledge, natural and moral, is arrived to a state of perfection, which the world never saw before. Other kingdoms have had their foundations laid in ignorance, superstition and barbarity. Their constitutions were the offspring of necessity, prejudice, and folly. Even the boasted British constitution is but an uncouth Gothic pile, covered and adorned by the elegance of modern architecture. The entailments of estates, the multitude of their sanguinary laws, the inequality of their elections, with many other articles, are gross traces of ancient folly and savageness. American empire is designed for more illustrious scenes, and its birth is attended with more favorable circumstances. Mankind have, in a great degree, learned to despise the shackles of custom and the chains of authority, and claim the privilege of thinking for themselves. Every science is handled with candor, fairness and manliness of reasoning, of which no other age could ever boast. At this period our existence begins; and from these advantages, what improvements may not be expected!"

Such was the spirit of the fathers of the American Republic. At the very inception of the Revolution they laid a broad and liberal foundation. They had seen the evils of governments built on a religious base, and they resolved to shun the dangers which such a system entailed. Read the Declaration of Independence:

"By the authority of the good PEOPLE of these Colonies, [we do] solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be free and independent states."

The authority invested in the signers of that Declaration did not come from God, or the church, but from a people who deserved freedom The war closed. On September 17, 1787, the Constitution of the United States was completed and signed with "G. Washington, President of the Convention." In the Preamble, at the very beginning of that Constitution, it was declared:

"We, the PEOPLE of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

For one hundred and nine years this government of the people under that Constitution, has been the grandest success of any other of any age or clime. It owes its greatness, its glory, and its unparalleled prosperity to the fact, it is a government of the people, and not of God.

But churchmen are not content. They want to turn the calendar of time backward a thousand years. We do not suppose they desire to re-enact the scenes of violence and blood which paved the way to that blissful period President Dwight described at the ushering in of the new era; and yet the placing of God, Jesus Christ and the Bible in that Constitution, contemplates the establishment of a hierocracy, a government by ecclesiastics. God the fountain, and the Bible, with priestly interpretation, the supreme law of the land, we are back again to inquisitorial tyranny. We pray the people to stand in their might and resist such aggressions!

As a democratic government is one administered by the people, so an idiocratic government will be one administered by idiots. Is not that the kind we shall have if the Christian Alliance shall succeed in getting God—in truth the priest—into the Constitution, and at the head of affairs?

WHAT CAUSES THIS GREAT COMMOTION?

So early as 1620 a Dutch ship brought a cargo of negroes to Virginia and sold them as slaves. Almost simultaneously with this event the Church of England was established in that colony by law. The two institutions, one to enslave the body, the other the mind, ran along together in harmony. The Church of England in America, was converted into the Protestant Episcopal Church of America at the close of the Revolution, by which name it is still known. Like its maternal ancestor it was supposed to be very conservative. Many liberals who wished to whitewash their reputations, or gain political position, have joined them and urged other liberals to do so. The New York Herald shows these people are being confronted with a new grievance, which may jar their sensibilities. We copy:

"The most conservative of the religious organizations, the Protestant Episcopal Church, has razed its barriers and come out as an enthusiastic imitator of that most radical of religious organizations, the Salvation Army. This latest order of nineteenth century crusaders is to be called the United States Church Army, and it will operate in the same aggressive manner as does the Salvation Army. Instead of waiting for the outcast and the drunkard to come to its elegant edifices, perhaps to be scared away on the threshold by the sight of the well-dressed worshipers and the sound of the solemn service, the Episcopal Church has decided to march into the slums to the music of trumpet and drum and the accompaniment of waving banners and the shout of war and warning."

Comment is unnecessary. The parent church in England has established the confessional, or, at least, it is practiced by some of the clergy. It has aped its mother church, the Catholic, so far as to establish convents. And now it is organizing in America on a military base, stepping to the music of the fife and drum, officered by chieftains with military titles, a Salvation Army.

Verily, something must disquiet the humble worshipers of the peaceful Lamb! Can it be that the little stone, cut out of the mountain without hands, in the form of trivial raps, has perturbed their equanimity?

THE LORD A SHIP CARPENTER.

Some fellow, with a superabundance of genius, has made the astonishing discovery that Noah's ark was the model subsequent ship-builders have employed in the construction of their craft. He shows that it was six times as long as wide, with a depth one-tenth its length. And the Lord furnished the original specifications! Ha, ha, ha!

The pleasure for which we dare not thank God cannot be innocent.—Anon.

AGITATE AND EDUCATE.

The Christian Register, referring to the recent annual meeting of the Liberal Religious Congress, which was organized two years ago, says:

"If the Congress depended upon those who are outside of existing organizations for its support, it would be feeble indeed. Nearly all its prominent speakers were representative men of different denominations. It is thus on a limited scale a small parliament of religions. It has not yet solved the problems which face it when it undertakes to become a missionary body."

The Congress seems to have relaxed all efforts to increase its membership from outside of existing organizations. And as for missionary work in favor of liberal thought, that does not now seem to be the purpose of the Congress. Its leaders seem to be satisfied to come together and praise unity of spirit with diversity of thought, but when the diversity of thought serves to paralyze all effort to diffuse liberal views such as brought the Congress into existence, what is there especially to recommend it to those who are outside of the churches because of their creeds? Of course, an association represented in part by orthodox ministers, cannot undertake any work which is opposed to the orthodox theology. The unity of spirit seems to be conditioned by a "masterly inactivity" on the part of its members. But the mass of liberal people, including Spiritualists, believe that there should be unremitting war waged against irrational religious dogmas, that encroachments upon civil government and personal liberty by ecclesiasticism should be opposed, that the new science and the best thought of these modern times should be diffused among the people to supply them with the mental nutriment which the dry husks of theology fail to supply. What made the Parliament of Religions possible? The agitation of thought through centuries, the iconoclastic work of critics outside and inside of the churches, constant protests against the Christians' exclusive claim of goodness for their religion and badness for all others, the spirit of charity and tolerance resulting from discussion, travel, the triumphs of science, commercial intercourse, international relations, etc., etc. Let the work of agitation and education go on, with or without the aid of the Congress.

TO BE CANONIZED.

Late advices from Rome show that the name of Joan of Arc, the heroine of France, whom the English prelates burnt at the stake in 1431 for witchcraft, her offense in fact, she led the forces of her country to victory, has been placed on the list of saints for beatification and canonization. If reliance can be placed in history Joan was inspired of heaven—if such honors are ever bestowed on mortals. It was only 465 years ago this humble maiden was charged by Catholic priests and bishops with being in league with the Devil, and gaining victories over the enemies of France which the ablest of its military chieftains were unable to accomplish. Now that same church which took her life proposes to place Saint before her name, with the probability that thousands of children yet unborn will be named after St. Joan. Chas. Mackey puts it this way:

"To-day abhorred, to-morrow adored,
So round and round we run,
And ever the truth comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

DISCOURAGING TO MISSIONS.

The late annual report of the American Board of Foreign Missions complains of the withholding of donations by the American churches to the Turkish missions. Possibly the members of those churches do not favor an attempted revolution to destroy a peaceful government in the interest of religion. Deny it as much as the missionaries may, the Christians of Armenia attempted to crush out Mohammedism by armed force. They got more than they bargained for. Both parties employed the methods of barbarians to crush their enemies, and an indiscriminate slaughter followed which when practiced by Kurds or Turks were "massacres of Christians;" when perpetrated by the latter it was "Christian victories." The most effectual way to put down the insurrection is to tell the world the truth, and even Christians will not contribute the means for protracting such cruel warfare.

A NEW ORGANIZATION.

The Colorado State Association Organized at Denver, Colorado.

To the Editor:—When last I addressed you I mentioned the fact of a convention to convene in Denver under the auspices of the First Spiritual Church of Denver. The same did convene on November 10, 11 and 12, with eight harmonious mediums in attendance, with good results spiritually and financially, and with final result in the organizing of a State association to be chartered as "The Colorado State Association of Occult Scientists," with the following officers duly elected: Dr. G. C. B. Ewell, president, Denver; Mrs. M. A. Gridley, first vice-president, Denver; Mrs. L. Agnes Moulton, second vice-president, Leadville; Mrs. E. Louise Teed, secretary, Denver; Mr. A. W. board, W. B. Rockwell, J. B. Gleason, Dr. S. Hard.

The association feels encouraged that much good work will be accomplished the coming year, as it is the intention to hold meetings in the adjacent cities and towns, to awaken an interest in the higher spiritual philosophy and to assist in establishing subordinate societies, chartering them under State law, thereby to defend and protect our mediums and make it a benefit to all who love the truth.

While in session we learned of the State Association of Massachusetts in session. We at once wired a message of good wishes for their success, which was responded to by J. B. Hatch, secretary, and received by us just at the hour of our organizing.

This flash from across the continent came to us like the glimmer from the Star of the East, their wishes for our success, for which we feel thankful. As the city of mountain and plain can boast of good granite and fine timber to establish the foundation on which a structure shall be builded, we trust that our light may be seen afar across the plain and the vibration of our love and harmony may do much to spread the truth of Spiritualism.

We are thankful to the several mediums that rendered such valuable service to the cause—Dr. G. C. B. Ewell, Mrs. M. A. Gridley, Mrs. Dr. Hard, Prof. Walrond, Mrs. Annie Wagner, Mrs. Galbrath, Mrs. E. L. Teed and Mrs. J. Darrel.

MRS. E. LOUISE TEED.

SAD NEWS.

Two Noted Free-Thinkers Found Dead Together.

The Chicago Evening Journal of Saturday, December 12, contains the following startling news:

Samuel P. Putnam, President of the Free Thought Federation of America, widely known as a lecturer and writer, and Miss Clara L. Collins, the twenty year-old Kentucky girl, who has been receiving considerable attention as a lecturer and literary critic, were found dead in a Boston hotel this morning, both having died from asphyxiation.

The jets had evidently been turned on with suicidal intent.

Messages in regard to their death caused a profound sensation among Chicago freethinkers when they were received to-day, and efforts were at once made to secure more details. According to telegraphic reports the man had accompanied Miss Collins to her hotel last night after the two had filled a lecture engagement in a Boston hall, and had opened a gas jet soon after reaching the room, as their appearance indicated that they had been dead for several hours at least.

At 141 South Water street, which is the headquarters of the Free-Thought Federation, and where Mr. Putnam had his office, the decedent's friends could not believe that the reports were true. Samuel P. Putnam started on a lecturing tour soon after the recent free-thought convention held in this city, of which he was the presiding officer.

During the convention he met Miss Collins, who had come from her home in Midway, Ky., to attend the meeting. The girl made a favorable impression on those who heard her original poem, read before the delegates, and after introduction to Mr. Putnam the two became intimately acquainted and decided to conduct a lecturing tour together. After filling engagements in the intermediate States they finally reached Boston, and on December 7 Mr. Putnam wrote Secretary Reichwald of the Federation that he intended to go to New York to-day, leaving Miss Collins in Boston. Nothing more was heard from either Mr. Putnam or Miss Collins until the sensational announcement of their death to-day.

In the letter to Secretary E. C. Reichwald the writer gave no hint of any intention to take his own life, but, on the contrary, seemed in excellent spirits. After some allusions to society matters he continued:

"We are doing well as could be expected. Miss Collins is well but seems to be a little 'homesick.' Give my respects to Will and tell him I will eat that dinner at the Sherman House when the winds of March are humming. Remember me to your wife. Yours respectfully, S. P. PUTNAM."

Miss Collins was a schoolgirl in Midway, Ky., until her talent as a writer and public speaker induced her to discontinue school work and enter a public career.

Soon after she affiliated with the freethinkers, and in spite of her youth, soon became a leader in that vicinity. She was received into the ranks of that society more cordially because of her enviable reputation as a speaker, which had made her well known in her own and neighboring States.

In the Chicago convention she received flattering attention, and it was her ability which led to the acquaintance with Mr. Putnam.

Mr. Putnam is well known in all parts of America, as well as in England and France. He was born in Chichester, N. H., and received a good education. After the civil war, in which he was a volunteer with the rank of captain, he entered the theological seminary of Chicago, and was graduated from that institution a few years later. He then entered the orthodox ministry and occupied pulpits at Malta and De Kalb, Ill. In 1871 he severed his connection with the orthodox church and joined the Unitarian denomination, filling pulpits in Toledo, O.; Omaha, Neb.; North Platte, Neb.; Evansville, Ind.; Northfield, Mass., and Vincennes, Ind. In 1887 he became interested in freethought work, and in that year was made president of the American Secular Union.

In 1892 he followed Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, who was his personal and intimate friend, as President of the Free-Thought Federation of America, which position he occupied up to the present time. Last year he made an extended tour of England and France, where he attracted much attention to his views on Christianity. Among the books which have entitled him to consideration as an author are "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," "Two Hundred Years of Free-Thought," and "Ingersoll and Jesus." Both Mr. Putnam and Miss Collins had engagements at New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Brooklyn and other cities.

Mr. Putnam was single and 56 years of age.

Spiritualists and Freethinkers generally will be loth to believe that Miss Collins and Mr. Putnam deliberately committed suicide. There are many excellent reasons, in fact, why they should not do so rash an act. Miss Collins was young, with a future before her full of promise and with well-settled ambitions which she was in a fair way of realizing. There had not, so far as we have been enabled to learn, anything occurred in her fair, young life to darken it in any way. She was a noble, pure soul, whose integrity of character and well-known abilities put her in the front rank of those who are facing superstition and inhumanity alike. It would be preposterous to suppose for an instant that she wilfully departed this life, knowing so well the work the world has for all true reformers to do.

That a man also of the mental make-up such as Mr. Putnam possessed, and whose heart was in the work of true reform and the cause of personal liberty, such as his was, should lay down the work he has so nobly and effectively carried is alike beyond credence. The Progressive Thinker will not admit for consideration the theory of suicide also for the reason that it cannot accept as a fact that two such noble souls should together bring a shadow upon those other noble souls, who are battling for the light and for liberty, or that they should deliberately deliver a blow at the cause they both loved so well. Of course the orthodox people who are interested in placing their religion in the Constitution of the United States will exult over this sad and mysterious event. While this will only show the depraved status of their spiritual being it will also spur our liberal friends to a full investigation of the real facts in the matter. The burden these brave warriors bore for freedom's cause must not be allowed to lie—if they are to be honored as we are sure they should be, let the cause of liberty and light be carried on with renewed courage and determination.

MONTHLY STATEMENT.

Work Accomplished by the N. S. A.

To the Editor:—The Board of Trustees of this institution, knowing of the worn out physical condition of President Barrett, on account of his efforts especially during the past year to advance the work of the N. S. A., voted him immediately after the convention in October, one month's vacation. Nevertheless he has accomplished during this month much good work at the convention of the Massachusetts State Association at Springfield, Mass., and in, Boston, Salem, and Greenwich, Mass.; Toronto, Canada, and elsewhere.

We have secured thirty contributing members during the month and three applications for charters.

November 18, a meeting was held in the Spiritual Church, Indianapolis, Ind., and though the weather was very inclement a large audience was present; addresses were delivered by Mrs. C. L. V. Richmond, F. B. Woodbury and F. A. Wiggin. Since securing their present commodious and pleasant meeting house their audiences have increased, and this association is to be congratulated on its successful and progressive work. While in Indianapolis I was convinced more than ever of the importance of our societies securing, as soon as possible, meeting places owned or controlled entirely by said societies. Our work in many places is retarded by being obliged to meet in halls, the surroundings of which are not spiritual, and sometimes not clean or attractive—places where the representative people of the community will not go.

November 20th a meeting was held in the neat and cosy hall of the Spiritualists at Muncie, Ind. A large audience attended, many of the most prominent people of the town manifesting their interest by their presence. Addresses were delivered here by Mrs. C. L. V. Richmond and F. B. Woodbury.

The little society at Lexington, Ky., having experienced some serious troubles, the N. S. A. officials have endeavored to encourage the loyal friends there in every way possible. F. B. Woodbury visited the place Sunday, November 22nd, and addressed the members of the society at the residence of S. Gray, Esq., in the afternoon of that day. The society engaged the court house for the evening, and Mr. Woodbury addressed an audience limited only in numbers by the capacity of the room. In this town there is a splendid chance to build up a large society. There was not the opposition there found to Spiritualism and Spiritualists that has been reported to exist in time past; especially cordial was the greeting tendered the recent visitor to that town, who now returns sincere thanks for the same.

The Annual Convention of the Secular Union and Freethought Federation at Chicago, Ill., November 13th, 14th, and 15th, and the Congress of Liberal Religions at Indianapolis, Ind., November 17th, 18th, and 19th, were represented by delegates from the National Spiritualists' Association. Mrs. C. L. V. Richmond and F. B. Woodbury were invited to address both conventions. The gatherings certainly developed the fact that Spiritualists ought always to be ready to fraternize with those who are ready to extend the hand of good fellowship and fraternal love; professing to be liberal we ought to guard against becoming illiberal liberals, for such are usually the most inconsistent people in the world. Dr. Thomas of Chicago, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Reed Stuart of Michigan, Rabbi Hirsh, E. P. Powell of Clinton, New York, E. L. Rexford of Ohio, Minot Savage of New York, J. H. Crooker of Montana, and others of the Free Religious School of Thought are men to whom all truly liberal people ought to at least extend the hand of good fraternal fellowship. Much good work was accomplished at these two conventions, not only by interchange of fraternal courtesies but an active campaign was started (not a minute too soon) to unite all liberals in defense of the constitutional rights of American citizens. Why? The National Reform Association has once more started a vigorous and determined effort to make the Constitution of the United States an Evangelical Creed. The following appeared in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, November 8th, and was republished in the wide-awake Progressive Thinker:

INVEST. $1,200 IN STAMPS—REFORMERS SEND OUT 200 MAIL SACKS FULL OF LETTERS.

Beaver Falls, Pa., Nov. 8—Special Telegram.—One of the largest petitions ever seen in this or any other country will result from an appeal that will go out through the mails to-morrow from the National Reform Association of the Covenant Church. Last evening 60,000 memorials and blank petitions were placed in the Beaver Falls Postoffice with special instructions to the postmaster that they must not be mailed on Sunday. They were addressed to people all over the country, who were requested to secure signatures to the petitions. The latter were addressed to Congress and urged that the joint resolution asking for the recognition of God in the Constitution be adopted. It required 200 mail sacks to hold the 60,000 large envelopes, and the mail bill was $1,200. The petition will be sent to congress, and is expected to attract much attention.—Inter-Ocean."

Every American citizen must rally to support and defend our secular form of government. Those of us who have watched the arrangements being made for a year for this determined effort of the evangelical people, know whereof we speak when we have made announcements in regard to this campaign, and we repeat again "Eternal Vigilance is the price of Liberty."

The government has recently erected in Washington, D. C., a magnificent Congressional Library Building. Upon the shelves in this building will be placed thousands of interesting and instructive books. Our association must cooperate with other progressive associations and insist that this beautiful temple of education must be opened on the first day of every week, Sunday, this being the only day when hundreds of people employed by the government, who toil for their daily bread, can visit this library. The man of Nazareth said it was lawful always to do good on the Sabbath; as educating people is doing good, and as hundreds of people prefer to read productions of the eminent authors of these and other days, rather than hear the superstitions of the past expounded, we must unite with all such to insist that the New Congressional Library must be open on the first day of the week.

Let us at this Christmas season not forget all those who need our sympathy and love; we take a more broad view of Christmas than church people, let us show it in our acts.

One of the modern saviors, Mrs. Colby Luther, is suffering still from a serious and prolonged illness. May we unite and send our sympathies out to her so strongly that she shall be aided thereby to regain her health and strength.

Because you do not believe in Christmas in the orthodox sense, that is not any reason why you should forget the children, especially those who have been faithful attendants at our Lyceum sessions. Remember there are homes where Santa Claus may forget to go if you do not invite him to go.

And finally let us all in these, the last days of this year, be willing to forgive and forget any unkindness of or from those of our common brotherhood of humanity and make this one resolution to do all we can to usher in the glad day When peace shall cover all the earth,
Its ancient splendors fling,
And the whole world send back the song
Which now the angels sing.

Wishing everybody a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, I am Fraternally yours for the Truth.

P. S. A letter arived at this office just as this communication goes to press, from which I learn that President Barrett has delivered twenty addresses during his thirty days "Vacation." Nearly "forty" addresses, missionary addresses, have been delivered the past month by representatives of the N. S. A. Has the N. S. A. not accomplished something in November, 1896?

A PECULIAR CASE.

An Explanation Is Earnestly Desired.

A Matter of Occult, Psychological Import.

I have a perplexing case that I want to put before the thinkers and teachers in our Progressive Thinker.

I do this out of no sense of curiosity, but because I want the opinion of those who are old in the science of spirit communications, and hope that someone will be able to make me a satisfactory explanation.

I will explain briefly: I went to a medium for a sitting, one to whom I was unknown, but who was well known to him thoroughly, and had perfect confidence in him. His control first took up a matter that was on my mind at the time and considered it as intelligently as I who knew all the circumstances could have done. This part of the sitting was satisfactory, and all that the control told me looked reasonable. I have not yet had time to verify it, however.

Then the control told me that she must go, as messages would be given me through the trumpet. The trumpet then arose in the air, circled about my head, and messages were given me, in tones as plainly audible as though the persons were living and speaking to me. Among others was the voice of a lady, highly cultured, and highly trained for elocution or the stage. She told me that she was one of my guides, that she wished me to finish the work that she had left undone when she passed beyond. That she was a lady of refinement, education and rare culture, her words and tones were proof. She gave me her name as Mrs. Scott-Siddons.

Now the strange part, to me, of this was, that I, who am mediumistic, had been for about six months determined to write plays. I prepared to write melo-drama, and was "preparing the ground," as it were, to go to work. A few days later a writer wrote me asking me to write plays with him.

These little things entirely separate from each other struck me as leadings.

I attended several circles after that, held by the same medium, and at each, I received messages written and signed "Mrs. S. Siddons." About this time a friend told me that Mrs. Scott-Siddons was living. That he was acquainted with the lady, and knew where she lived. That my spirit visitor must be Mrs. Sarah Siddons. I spoke of this at the next circle and, later, when my written message was thrown out of the cabinet, it was plainly signed "Mrs. Siddons."

At the materializing circles I had seen and talked with and touched this spirit, and I can assure you she was a materialized spirit, and the most beautiful and graceful, and what we call dramatic, materialization that I ever saw. But I had complained that I never saw her face quite plainly. In the circle that followed, the sheet of paper that contained my written message, contained also a pencil drawing of a lady's face.

In one written message she said: "Oh how gloriously our work is going on in the future through you."

About this time the plot of my play wove itself through my mind, and is declared by good judges to be faultless. I wrote the first three scenes, all of act first, but have not yet had time to finish the rest. This plot might have come to me without any inspirational help—how that is I do not know. I have written many novels.

But now comes the part that I do not understand: I learn by the papers that now, six months or more later, Mrs. Scott- Siddons has just died.

Scott-Siddons has just died.

Remember, in considering this, that I know, absolutely, that there was no "fraud" on the medium's part. The materializations were genuine, everything is entirely satisfactorily except the name. How do we account for this? Will our friends help me with an explanation.

PEARL EVANGELINE ANGEL.

SPIRIT BRIGHTNESS.

Rationale of Its Cause and Its Exwression.

We hear, we read, we see—those of us who are clairvoyant—that spirit forms grow brighter as they progress in spirit life; and the why of it is often asked. It seems to be on this wise, and there is a law which governs it. The essence of life, or spirit, is the very interior of activity. This is in all human beings. The outward or expressed life either does or does not correspond in its activities with the interior life, which is good or God, as you may choose to call it, and only as it corresponds with good can good make itself manifest.

This manifestation, by the law, produces light, or radiates the light from within outward. To decarnate beings this light is apparent, also to the mortal in the clairvoyant state.

Spirit sight gives sight of spirit and spiritual qualifications. This light is not recognized by physical sense, and yet the illumination of the spirit is manifest through the mortal, in a way. The eye is the story-teller of the light within, and a certain almost indefinable something about the individual indicates the power of expression attained by the interior life. In people who are largely spiritual here, there is a repose, a purity of thought and word, a serenity that is not indifference but loftiness; a charity in judgment, a clearness of perception, a decision without ostensible positively; all of which indicate the subjection of the carnalities of the ego to the dominion of spirit, or God power, or good power—the interior life. This is being in the kingdom of God, and whoso dwelleth in God dwelleth in light.

The light permeates and illumines the spirit body, which is apparent to those who have passed over the divide, hence we are to them either dark or bright as we are living in unrighteousness or in harmony with Good, as the case may be. We can deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive those who dwell in spirit life. We can deceive those with whom we mingle day by day, but we cannot mislead our spirit friends. Dark or bright we are to them and they can at once measure our daily methods of thought and work by the light which radiates through the mechanism of the spirit body. This is the all-seeing eye of spirit in our most loving ones in spirit life. They know, they can determine, truthfully to themselves and to us, for the law is immutable. Love cannot change it, but it can help to change the individual wanting such light. And to this end are the efforts of kind spirit friends directed, first to bring us within the pale of knowledge of spiritual conditions, and then to enable us to give expression ourselves, to that knowledge, thus lifting the veil of darkness and letting the light shine through, illuminating all the immortal part of ourselves, which illumination determines our condition, our sphere, whether in or out of the body. And the question lies with us, personally to decide, shall it be light or dark?

FRUITLESS QUEST.

Earnestly Seeking, Yet Sadly Disappointed.

To the Editor:—I am rather pleased with Dr. Sweringen's answer to my strictures on one clause in his controversy with Dr. Mahin, especially so because of the friendly nature of his reply. Permit me to make a few comments in the same spirit.

Following the Doctor's lead, I readily admit that much of the world's truth is now and always has been rejected by vast numbers of intelligent people, but largely so, I think, because of real or fancied self interest; or at least lack of manifest advantage in accepting it. Touching the question of a future existence, the case is quite different. It is a popular belief, and is taught by all the churches. Most people believe it in a half-hearted sort of a way, and I still think the great majority of intelligent people would be supremely glad to gain absolute knowledge of a future life in exchange for the faith that often wavers, if the demonstration of the fact was as readily attainable as the worthy Doctor suggests. That it is not so, thousands of earnest seekers like myself will mournfully attest.

I do not question the veracity of the numerous witnesses, who, like Brother Sweringen, claim to have passed beyond the region of hope and faith to that of absolute knowledge, but to me it must be personal, the evidence must come to me individually before the mists of doubt are dissipated. This is asking no more than the Doctor admits investigators have a right to expect.

I long ago discarded the creed of my childhood, because expected to accept on faith, to take on trust, without evidence. How can I now feel at ease in a new belief, that only, for me, at least, shifts the ground a few centuries in time. Brother Sweringen seems to have traveled about the same road I have from Methodism to Agnosticism and Materialism, till we reached the domain of Spiritualism, which to him has become a land of repose, while to me only a beautiful philosophy lacking as yet material evidence of reality—an ignis fatuus receding as I advance.

Unlike most investigators, my interest in the subject of Spiritualism was first aroused through reading rather than phenomena. So interested did I become, that I sought for and obtained much of the best literature bearing on the question, which led me to virtually accept the philosophy, not only because of its inherent beauty, but also on the strength of abundant corroborative phenomena, fully attested by deponents whose reliability I could hardly question, never doubting that this same phenomenal evidence would be accorded me when opportunity offered to seek it. Not till this search actually commenced did the real difficulties pertaining to my new-born hopes become apparent, till sad and discouraged with the fruitless quest, my cherished philosophy has become little more than the recollection of a beautiful dream.

It is only fair to say that of the eight or ten years during which I have been interested in this subject, all but one has been spent in Canada, where opportunities for investigation are practically non-existent. Canada is probably the most conservative civilized country on earth. Quite abreast of the age in material progress, but scarcely interested or concerned in the great social, economic and philosophical questions so profoundly agitating the civilized world, especially the United States, at the present time. The exceptional year above mentioned was passed in Southern New England, chiefly Providence, R. I. While in that locality, I never missed an opportunity for investigation, as far as my limited means would permit. The result was always the same—disappointment. It cannot be said that my investigations were conducted in an unduly skeptical or super-critical spirit. I sought the corroborative testimony of phenomena with my mind already saturated with the philosophy, wishing for and expecting the demonstration that would confirm my hopes, but at the same time not disposed to allow my desires to run away with my reason and lead me to accept any so-called phenomena as of spiritual origin, that was lacking in all elements of truth or probability. Perhaps the time may yet come when the light will shine for me, but at present I hold only a fascinating theory of life, death and futurity. It is not a living faith or force within me. To orthodoxy I can never return. I can conceive of no resting place between Spiritualism and Materialism.

A NARRATIVE FULL OF INTEREST.

THE SAGACITY

Of a Certain Inexplicable Force.

It Involves the Great Problem of the Ages.

CRIME DISCOVERED — SPIRIT PLAYMATES—SUICIDE PREVENTED—SPIRIT SERENADE, ETC.

Incidents in the experience of responsible investigators into things occult are in unusual demand, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. Their relation is, therefore, continued from the developments at a conference meeting which was partially reported in the Enquirer of last Saturday.

Mr. Ellisman said: "As some of you know, I am a Canadian. When I was living at Richmond, Quebec, an Irish family arrived there and found quarters at a second-rate hotel. Soon it was learned that the wife was a spirit medium with remarkable powers, and many demands were made upon her time by investigators. At length the landlord became sufficiently interested to indulge in a sitting, but its developments were of a character which he could not have apprehended. The spirit of his first wife—she had been many years deceased—brought an astounding message. She detailed the means he employed to murder her, and how he had cut her body in pieces to hide the crime, followed by his cowardly flight from Ireland to America She referred to his second marriage after a short residence in Canada, and described several burglaries and highway robberies of which he had been the leader in that part of the Dominion.

"With great solemnity she warned him to eschew his evil practices and lead a better life. The man was darkly moody for a few days and then became violently insane, necessitating his close confinement. In his ravings he repeated a long and most abhorrent record of crime and implored vengeance upon his betrayer. In a month the foul fiend had exhausted the victim and he died a horrible death. The wife murder and many other crimes were subsequently verified, but it was given out that the poor wretch became insane through Spiritualism."

SPIRIT PLAYMATES.

A lady gave some interesting incidents. "I saw spirits when yet a child and had them for playmates," said she. "Their words were just as natural as those of mortal children. For a long I could not distinguish them from my mortal playmates, except by their loving words and affectionate demeanor.

"They were with me every day; that is, some of them were, and as many as fifty I knew by name. A few were spirit children of near neighbors, and sometimes I was entrusted with messages to their parents which created intense feeling, for it was said these communications contained information it was so impossible for me to know anything about.

"One little girl insisted upon sending her 'best and dearest love to mamma' every time I saw her, and this was said to have been the form of her affectionate expression in earth life. A tiny boy spirit frequently requested me to tell his father that the whipping he received did not make him sick, that he would not have cried but for scarlet fever. I never delivered this message, but once, for then it pained the poor father almost to distraction. He cried bitterly. Neither did I tell the dear little spirit of the sorrowful effect of his message, and he seemed to think that I delivered it as often as he requested.

"One day a great number of my spirit friends joined me in a flower party. We had roses, daises, lilacs and pansies in abundance and were exchanging them with each other and admiring the various combinations in which they could be grouped, when we were interrupted by three rude boys who snatched my flowers and trampled them in the dust, at the same time calling me 'Crazy Kate.' Their triumph was short. A great swarm of hornets came down upon them and they were stung on the face, neck and hands till they screamed with pain. The little spirits brought a hornets' nest and broke it among them to inflict immediate punishment for their cruelty to a helpless child. This I know, for with my own eyes I saw it done, which the boys could not see.

"When on another occasion we were assembled for friendly converse a huge animal of the boyine species came raging in our direction. The spirit of a little girl said she could turn his course, and she did so with the celerity of thought by placing a bunch of nettles in his nostrils. With a roar of pain he made all possible haste to get away from our vicinity, and I never saw him more.

"There was a day when I sorely needed company, but no spirits came till quite late in the afternoon, and then there were but two. Answering my request for an explanation, they said it was an occasion when many spirits were advanced to a higher sphere of labor, and, as these could not return to the earth plane, their companions had remained to witness their exaltation. Some of my accustomed playmates were among those advanced, and it made me very sad, but I was promised frequent messages from them, and

THE COMPACT HAS BEEN KEPT.

"Other spirit friends soon took their places in our little circle, and hand in hand we have gone forward, with love ever increasing. It is a condition full of happiness and that peace which passeth mortal understanding."

A gentleman named Gilman said: "I have an acquaintance who is a bank teller. He has held his situation more than 20 years, is very conservative, and no one would suspect him of Spiritualism. He is a Spiritualist almost without his own knowledge. The position he prides himself upon is that of an investigator. One evening, at the residence of a medium, he was informed by a spirit that he had left his safe unlocked. 'That is impossible,' said he, but thereupon he left the house to reassure himself. The night watchman admitted him to the bank, where he found the spirit's message verified. The safe door was closed, but not locked.

At another time, at the home of the same medium he was told that next day he would find his cash $100 short, and that in a few days it would be returned to him from a distant city. The message proved true in all particulars. He was informed through a slate-writing medium that the indorsement upon a certain note was forged. Next day he sent for the maker of the document and told him it must be immediately taken up, and so it was, without question, although it had more than two months to run before maturity. To his sight counterfeit bank notes are always overspread with a crimson tint not apparent to others, and hence his judgment of paper money is regarded as miraculous.

SPIRIT SERENADE.

A newspaper man gave this item: "My father was a musician—master of several instruments. He performed well upon the piano, harp, violin and guitar, and at various periods of his life he gave instruction upon all these instruments. One night, in the spring of 1889, I was awakened by a serenade upon the instruments I have mentioned and immediately I recognized the peculiar touch of my father upon each; yet they were played in concert! The sounds came from the yard in front of my residence, but I could see no one there, and a moment's reflection indicated how absurd it was to suppose that anyone was there with a piano. On four successive nights this remarkable serenade was repeated in jubilant measures, without a trace of sadness. On the morning of the fifth day intelligence reached me that at about the hour corresponding with the first musical manifestation the dear father was drowned in Lake St. Louis, Ontario. The same manifestations have since been repeated scores of times, and they are certainly the work of spirits. How else are they to be accounted for?"

BETTER THAN SUICIDE.

A Covingtonian related interesting details to this effect: "Several years ago a man named Clark, at that time in my service, came to me and announced that he had a confession to make. He felt it to be a duty, the performance of which might result in the forfeiture of my respect. A few days previous to this conversation he had experienced an extremely bitter and almost unbearable disappointment, and, being of an impulsive nature, had resolved on suicide. Retiring to a secluded spot with the design of carrying out this purpose, just as he raised his pistol to his head a hand was placed upon his hand and the word 'stop' pronounced in an authoritative tone!

"No one was in sight, but he felt that an invisible presence had interfered in his behalf. Greatly frightened, he returned to his work. Next day the idea entered his mind that the hand and voice were creatures of a sensitive imagination, and the trouble being still upon him, he resolved upon a second attempt at self-destruction. Repairing to a place still more secluded than that chosen on the day before, he sat down to change the cartridges in his revolver. Having removed those it contained, and just as he was about to insert the first fresh cartridge, the weapon was wrenched from his hand and thrown 40 feet away. Looking for the cause of this rude interference he saw a form of great beauty, with clear complexion, large, lustrous eyes, full lips, pearly teeth, and countenance bright as the morning. 'Rash man!' exclaimed this apparition; 'you cannot tamper with mortal life without imminent peril to your immortal condition. Besides, mark me, you were born for a more exalted purpose than you have comprehended. Your career will yet prove noble and successful. Become acquainted with your powers and use them to the best advantage, and then you will wonder how this little disappointment could unman you for a moment. No more repining, no more depression, but courage and manliness instead, and you will win fame and fortune.'

"This was all. You will agree that it was enough. It was fully sufficient to banish all idea of suicide from the man's mind, and animate him by a worthy ambition. He deprecated my anger, but I assured him of sympathy and congratulated him on the advantage of a lesson and a prognostication of so much apparent significance. He asked for advice. I counseled him in a general way, but quite unsatisfactorily to him and myself. Affairs moved forward in the old style, for several months, except having found Clark more attentive to his duties than before, his salary had been advanced accordingly.

"But there was an abrupt turning point. He came to my house one Sunday evening, and it was immediately evident to me before he spoke that something had happened. It was a vision. More than this—the vision had come to him three nights in succession, in identically the same features and a triplication of every detail. The radiant form that snatched away the revolver and prevented his destruction came on each of the three occasions and addressed him, advising him to go to Chicago, where, he was assured, great good fortune awaited his acceptance. The business in which he was to engage was plainly indicated, and he was told how to proceed to secure a position immediately.

"The vision had impressed Clark so emphatically that he had already determined to go to Chicago, and nothing was left for me but acquiescence. He had saved a little money; I added a little; and in a week he removed to the great city he had never before seen. The man was successful from the beginning. Everything prospered with him, and now he is rich in material wealth and good deeds. I know that his charities exceed my entire income, and that he is a blessing to himself and humanity. The result is nothing but good. Whence came the influence which saved this man from self-murder and made of him a most estimable citizen?"

A SPIRIT GUARDIAN.

Said Colonel Charles Stratton: "I am often asked to explain what it was that made me a Spiritualist, and I experienced no difficulty in finding an answer satisfactory to myself. I do not know just when it first dawned upon my mind that spirit return was an assured fact. The conviction came gradually, not in a spasm, and knowledge followed fast upon belief. If I understood what is meant by 'conversion,' in a religious sense, it was not that through which the light reached me, but rather it came as to a child in a kindergarten—objectively.

"For years before I saw that which finally brought knowledge, I felt its presence and heard its movement. Influenced, often against my convictions; followed, and plans upon which my heart was set ruthlessly frustrated by an invisible, but irresistible force, I felt as if tethered in act and limited in range like one circumscribed by arbitrary metes and bounds. Resistance was futile. That which held me captive was gentle but inexorable. Its fiat of 'thus far and no farther' had not a hair's breadth of elasticity, and, without the cognizance of my nearest friends, I was helpless a prisoner. I shrank from describing this state and suffered its annoyances in silence.

"Twenty years ago I had audible evidence that I was followed almost constantly. The sound of footsteps came to my ears as if produced by one in close pursuit, but when I turned no one was there. No matter how suddenly I whirled about, the step was still behind me; no matter how high the fence or broad the ditch I vaulted over, the patter of pursuing feet kept time with those in advance. How my daily associates failed to observe this phenomenon was almost as much of a mystery as the thing itself. At the same time it was a relief to me.

"One night I was awakened by a loud and unusual noise in my room. This occurred some three years subsequent to my first consciousness of the audible footsteps. Seated near the bed was a middle-aged gentleman of benign aspect. A strange, mellow, rosy light illuminated his face and made him grandly apparent from the waist upward. He brought his own light, and it was above criticism. I gained a sitting posture and tried to speak, but at first my throat was too dry. My visitor smiled as he noticed the futility of the effort and bowed courteously as if to afford encouragement for an additional trial. Finally, in a hoarse whisper, I managed to articulate 'good evening.' The salutation was returned, and the gentleman said:

"'You and I have long been friends without your knowledge. You knew that you had an invisible mentor, who sought your good, but of his identity you were in darkness. I am he who has persistently sought to bless and many times was only able to annoy you. Now I feel that we should have a better understanding of our relations to the end that any service I may be able to render will be direct and immediate. I am your grandfather; father of your mother.'

"'Name?' I queried.

"'Abner Jencks Billings, for my father and uncle.'

"Knowing this to be correct, I felt reassured and in the mood to talk. 'What is your business with me?' I asked.

"'To bring you good. Like myself at your age you are peculiarly susceptible to temptations of a certain kind, and, while these were calamitous to me, I wish to impress upon you their vanity and worthlessness. On the other hand, there is not a purer or more exalted mortal condition than that to be cultivated,

IN THE MARRIAGE STATE,

which you have avoided too long. Marriage is the truest safeguard, not only for a Stratton or Billings, but for the entire body of humanity, with just enough exceptions to prove the rule. This you believe, but do not practice, indicating that you are hypocritical?

"'Sir!'

"'Oh, among post mortem gentlemen there is no nicety of phrase. We speak out the truth, without beating around the bush for highly polished words, and ordinary sense informs you that I mean no offence by coming direct to the point. In an advisory way I tell you to get married; get a good wife; take time to make a proper selection, but do not delay. You understand me and the real object of my advice. Act!'

"He dissolved out of sight and left the room in darkness, but in his words I felt the force of a peculiar enlightenment Mentally I was too much elated to sleep. The admonition of my visitor was so fully in accord with my inclinations that I wondered at the long neglect with which I had treated the subject, and arising from bed, I managed to write an awkward letter to a young lady friend, requesting permission to call upon her at a time specified. Her cordial reply fixed the date for the beginning of my brief courtship, and in five months I was a benedict, blissful and contented—a condition which constantly amplifies its enjoyments with the passing years and day by day confirms my admiration of Spiritualism. My benign guardian comes to us frequently, sometimes with wholesome advice, always with a cheery benediction."

TWO VAGRANT APPARITIONS.

An aged debater related this anecdote: "It was near 40 years ago when I saw as strange a thing as ever came to me at a seance. A gentleman who had been my neighbor for a long period called upon me in a social way and engaged in a lengthy talk about his own affairs. This was surprising for the reason that he was an exceedingly modest man, decidedly reserved and never inclined to talk about himself of his family. But on this occasion he was wearisomely egotistical, dwelling long upon his pedigree, experience, the achievements of his ancestors and his own phenomenal success as a business man. He had become very rich, principally through his own unaided efforts. Finally, as he arose to leave, he said:

"'I want you to see that justice is done Mrs. L.—his elder daughter—in the settlement of my estate. There may be a disposition on the part of some of the heirs to take advantage of her, if possible, and this must be prevented. I have made you one of the executors of my will, for I know you to be a just man. Do not forget my injunctions as you would escape the wrath of God! Good by.'

"When I turned to reply he was nowhere in sight, and, astonished beyond expression, I rushed out to intercept him, but he was not in my yard, neither had my family seen or heard anyone pass out. As I was making ready to return my neighbor's call for the purpose of asking him some questions regarding the business with which he had intrusted me, a gentleman came to my house with information that the good man had just expired at home in his bed, to which he had been confined for more than a week, unknown to me. As this death notice came some 30 minutes after my talk with the man, and more than an hour after his entrance to my house, it became evident that I had held converse with his spirit while he was yet alive!"

Another gentleman related an incident with some features similar to the foregoing. "A trance medium well-known in Cincinnati," said he, "had described several spirits for my benefit, when he suddenly exclaimed: 'Here is the spirit of Colonel Henry!'

"'Impossible,' I replied, 'for he is not dead.'

"'That's so. He says he isn't dead, but he's anxious to see you.'

"'What does he want?'

"'He'll tell you when you meet.'

"I cut my sitting short and called upon Colonel Henry. He had been looking for me since morning, and was at the moment of my call, writing me a letter on a matter of prime importance in a business way. When I told him of the incident with the medium he was much agitated, saying that his anxiety had been very great to see me at about the time of sitting, for our business was of such a character that he hesitated about committing it to writing. He took a great deal of stock in Spiritualism from that day onward, but before it had been the subject of his merciless ridicule."

THE FOX HOME.

Has Notions and a Plan of His Own.

To the Editor:—I notice in your paper of November 21, an article by Mr. S. B. York, wherein he entreats all Spiritualists to consider the question of purchasing the Fox home in Hydesville, N. Y. He says "the plan cannot fail to meet the approval of every consistent Spiritualist."

I ask in the name of Spiritualism, pure and true, if that is the most spiritual way in which to keep green the memory of those gifted women who drew aside the black veil of crude superstition and presented to the world an old yet new teaching, pure and bright? Would it not be more in harmony with the purpose of those noble minds, to lift higher and to enhance the work which they have begun?

Spiritualism teaches us that it is the spiritual and not the physical body that should be remembered after the latter is cast aside? Then why should the physical portion of the birthplace of modern thought be rebuilt and maintained, at no little expense, when hundreds of good and worthy mediums, who constitute a great part of the foundation of modern Spiritualism, are actually suffering for the want of the necessities of life. If the "spirit" was in comfortable circumstances all Spiritualists should gladly give their mite, that the "physical" might be retained.

I would suggest that a committee of men and women be appointed by the Spiritualists of this country to receive donations, not for the benefit of the physical, but for the benefit of the spiritual, and thus strengthen the cause which the Fox Sisters have given to the earth.

Every creed, every religion has its Mecca or its Jerusalem. It has some place which is sacred to its followers. Shall broad, noble Spiritualism belittle itself with a "holy land?" Shall it bow down before a tall marble monument, and say, with the dust of Christianity in its teeth: We worship thee, O, Monument! because thou standest where a trinity of noble women stood. Or shall it with the light of Independence like a halo round its head, proclaim to the world: We shall not close our hearts to the suffering humanity around us, but we will strive with might and main to benefit our fellowmen, that the memory of the Fox Sisters "shall not perish forever from the earth."

TOM. P. HUGHES.

AN IDEA TO THINK ON.

To the Editor:—I take up my pencil with the impression that it is my duty to come to the front with an idea which to me is becoming more and more interesting every day.

After reading the sketch of the "U. S. Church Army" and then taking up "The Progressive Thinker" and reading the speech made by S. P. Putnam at the opening of the Freethought Federation, I am anxious to present my idea of what would be the best plan to present this idea of liberty to the general public.

We want to reach the masses and thereby create sentiment. Let us begin by preparing a constitution and by-laws for a "Liberty Club," and organize the liberty people in a voting precinct, that will organize, if there are not more than three men and women together, and let the first object of this organization be to secure the time and place for public meetings, which shall be known as Liberty Meetings, and shall be held at least once each month, and as often as once a week or more if the club thinks best.

And let us organize as many precincts as we can, and if we can organize the whole county, why not have a delegate county club which could give annual semi-annual, or quarterly sessions to review the work of the county. If we had counties organized in this way, there would be no trouble in circulating petitions for any reform measure. I have been gathering my best ideas together for the purpose of arranging a constitution and by-laws for just such an organization. If the lecturers and mediums all over the country would take hold of the work, and secure the necessary papers for a thorough organization, we could soon have Liberty talks, Liberty papers read, or articles from Freethought papers read, in every precinct in the United States every month. And many of the features of liberty would be brought out at these meetings. There are many men and women living in every county who would answer calls to speak or read papers on the subject of freethought, the meaning of which is comprehended in the word liberty; in fact, if we have full liberty we will fully investigate every question which is brought before us.

This Liberty Club can be brought into use in the furtherance of every needed reform in this great country.

There is much more that I would like to say on this subject, but I will wait and see what others have to say about it.

THAT SYMPOSIUM.

To the Editor:—Your Symposium in No. 355, "Christian or Not Christian," is fine, is true, is timely and good. Let us all take heed and govern ourselves accordingly. Now can't you give us another from some of the level-headed men and women in the ranks of your readers, on the topic: Church or No Church?

Why should Spiritualism, which at the present rate of increase will soon capture the earth, cling to and ape the follies and foibles of a dead creed—a dead churchianity? Dead and damned, I felt like saying, after reading this extract from a sermon by Rev. Spurgeon, on the resurrection:

"When thou diest, thy soul will be tormented alone; that will be a hell for it; but at the day of judgment thy body will join thy soul, and then thou wilt have two hells, thy soul sweating drops of blood, and thy body suffused with agony. In fire exactly like that which we have on earth thy body will lie asbestos-like, forever unconsumed, all thy veins roads for the feet of pain to travel on, every nerve a string on which the Devil shall forever play his diabolical tune of Hell's Unutterable Lament."

Why should an association of Spiritualists call themselves a church? And why "Pastor?" and why "Ordination," and why "Reverend? As the old Roman said: "Are we men and suffer such dishonor?"

Yes, give us another symposium and ask Hudson Tuttle, "the bravest Roman of them all," to furnish the leading article.

T. W. MERRITT.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds.' By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical bodies and their psychical bodies with universal nature, and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the Spirit-world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains the lecture by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago pulpit. It scintillates throughout,

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages. In order that all whom this notice may reach, can secure this address, as well as the other lectures and articles, we have made arrangements to have 10,000 copies printed to be sent out free to every new trial or yearly subscriber. This paper is well worth 25 cents. Every Spiritualist who wishes to know what has been going on should carefully read it. Our regular subscribers have, of course, had the contents thereof.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Oulja. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. They will be sent to anyone for five cents per copy, or ten cents for the two papers. Stamps received. Remember, please, that these two papers are sent out FREE to all NEW trial or yearly subscribers.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia.....$	.45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia.....	.45
The Next World Interviewed.....	.35
Total .....$	1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia.....	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia.....	400
The Next World Interviewed.....	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

"Principles of Light and Color." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL.D. A truly great work of a master mind, and one whom Spiritualists should delight to honor. The result of years of deep thought and patient research into Nature's finer forces are here garnered and made amenable to the well-being of humanity. Medical men especially and scientists, general readers and students of occult forces will find instruction of great value and interest. A large, four-pound book, strongly bound, and containing beautiful illustrative plates. For sale at this office. Price, postpaid, $5. It is a wonderful work and you will be delighted with it.

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. W. M. Lockwood. Prof. Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents an succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. For sale at this office. Price 25 cents

IMMORTALITY,

...OR...

FUTURE HOMES AND DWELLING PLACES.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Give us details—details and accurate delineations of life in the Spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. Many other matters are treated, too numerous to mention. Price $1.50; postage, 12 cents. For sale at this office.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

JESUS AND THE MEDIUMS,

—OR—

CHRIST AND MEDIUMSHIP.

Careful comparison of some of the Spiritualism and Mediumship of the Bible with that of to-day. By Moses Hull. An invincible argument proving that Jesus was only a medium, subject to all the conditions of modern mediumship. It also shows that all the manifestations throughout the Old and New Testament were under the same conditions that mediums require to-day; and that the coming of Christ is the return of mediumship to the world. 48 pages. Price, 10 cents. For sale at this office.

CRIME DISCOVERED — SPIRIT PLAYMATES—SUICIDE PREVENTED—SPIRIT SERENADE, ETC.

Incidents in the experience of responsible investigators into things occult are in unusual demand, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. Their relation is, therefore, continued from the developments at a conference meeting which was partially reported in the Enquirer of last Saturday.

Mr. Ellisman said: "As some of you know, I am a Canadian. When I was living at Richmond, Quebec, an Irish family arrived there and found quarters at a second-rate hotel. Soon it was learned that the wife was a spirit medium with remarkable powers, and many demands were made upon her time by investigators. At length the landlord became sufficiently interested to indulge in a sitting, but its developments were of a character which he could not have apprehended. The spirit of his first wife—she had been many years deceased—brought an astounding message. She detailed the means he employed to murder her, and how he had cut her body in pieces to hide the crime, followed by his cowardly flight from Ireland to America She referred to his second marriage after a short residence in Canada, and described several burglaries and highway robberies of which he had been the leader in that part of the Dominion.

"With great solemnity she warned him to eschew his evil practices and lead a better life. The man was darkly moody for a few days and then became violently insane, necessitating his close confinement. In his ravings he repeated a long and most abhorrent record of crime and implored vengeance upon his betrayer. In a month the foul fiend had exhausted the victim and he died a horrible death. The wife murder and many other crimes were subsequently verified, but it was given out that the poor wretch became insane through Spiritualism."

SPIRIT PLAYMATES.

A lady gave some interesting incidents. "I saw spirits when yet a child and had them for playmates," said she. "Their words were just as natural as those of mortal children. For a long I could not distinguish them from my mortal playmates, except by their loving words and affectionate demeanor.

"They were with me every day; that is, some of them were, and as many as fifty I knew by name. A few were spirit children of near neighbors, and sometimes I was entrusted with messages to their parents which created intense feeling, for it was said these communications contained information it was so impossible for me to know anything about.

"One little girl insisted upon sending her 'best and dearest love to mamma' every time I saw her, and this was said to have been the form of her affectionate expression in earth life. A tiny boy spirit frequently requested me to tell his father that the whipping he received did not make him sick, that he would not have cried but for scarlet fever. I never delivered this message, but once, for then it pained the poor father almost to distraction. He cried bitterly. Neither did I tell the dear little spirit of the sorrowful effect of his message, and he seemed to think that I delivered it as often as he requested.

"One day a great number of my spirit friends joined me in a flower party. We had roses, daises, lilacs and pansies in abundance and were exchanging them with each other and admiring the various combinations in which they could be grouped, when we were interrupted by three rude boys who snatched my flowers and trampled them in the dust, at the same time calling me 'Crazy Kate.' Their triumph was short. A great swarm of hornets came down upon them and they were stung on the face, neck and hands till they screamed with pain. The little spirits brought a hornets' nest and broke it among them to inflict immediate punishment for their cruelty to a helpless child. This I know, for with my own eyes I saw it done, which the boys could not see.

"When on another occasion we were assembled for friendly converse a huge animal of the boyine species came raging in our direction. The spirit of a little girl said she could turn his course, and she did so with the celerity of thought by placing a bunch of nettles in his nostrils. With a roar of pain he made all possible haste to get away from our vicinity, and I never saw him more.

"There was a day when I sorely needed company, but no spirits came till quite late in the afternoon, and then there were but two. Answering my request for an explanation, they said it was an occasion when many spirits were advanced to a higher sphere of labor, and, as these could not return to the earth plane, their companions had remained to witness their exaltation. Some of my accustomed playmates were among those advanced, and it made me very sad, but I was promised frequent messages from them, and

THE COMPACT HAS BEEN KEPT.

"Other spirit friends soon took their places in our little circle, and hand in hand we have gone forward, with love ever increasing. It is a condition full of happiness and that peace which passeth mortal understanding."

A gentleman named Gilman said: "I have an acquaintance who is a bank teller. He has held his situation more than 20 years, is very conservative, and no one would suspect him of Spiritualism. He is a Spiritualist almost without his own knowledge. The position he prides himself upon is that of an investigator. One evening, at the residence of a medium, he was informed by a spirit that he had left his safe unlocked. 'That is impossible,' said he, but thereupon he left the house to reassure himself. The night watchman admitted him to the bank, where he found the spirit's message verified. The safe door was closed, but not locked.

At another time, at the home of the same medium he was told that next day he would find his cash $100 short, and that in a few days it would be returned to him from a distant city. The message proved true in all particulars. He was informed through a slate-writing medium that the indorsement upon a certain note was forged. Next day he sent for the maker of the document and told him it must be immediately taken up, and so it was, without question, although it had more than two months to run before maturity. To his sight counterfeit bank notes are always overspread with a crimson tint not apparent to others, and hence his judgment of paper money is regarded as miraculous.

SPIRIT SERENADE.

A newspaper man gave this item: "My father was a musician—master of several instruments. He performed well upon the piano, harp, violin and guitar, and at various periods of his life he gave instruction upon all these instruments. One night, in the spring of 1889, I was awakened by a serenade upon the instruments I have mentioned and immediately I recognized the peculiar touch of my father upon each; yet they were played in concert! The sounds came from the yard in front of my residence, but I could see no one there, and a moment's reflection indicated how absurd it was to suppose that anyone was there with a piano. On four successive nights this remarkable serenade was repeated in jubilant measures, without a trace of sadness. On the morning of the fifth day intelligence reached me that at about the hour corresponding with the first musical manifestation the dear father was drowned in Lake St. Louis, Ontario. The same manifestations have since been repeated scores of times, and they are certainly the work of spirits. How else are they to be accounted for?"

BETTER THAN SUICIDE.

A Covingtonian related interesting details to this effect: "Several years ago a man named Clark, at that time in my service, came to me and announced that he had a confession to make. He felt it to be a duty, the performance of which might result in the forfeiture of my respect. A few days previous to this conversation he had experienced an extremely bitter and almost unbearable disappointment, and, being of an impulsive nature, had resolved on suicide. Retiring to a secluded spot with the design of carrying out this purpose, just as he raised his pistol to his head a hand was placed upon his hand and the word 'stop' pronounced in an authoritative tone!

"No one was in sight, but he felt that an invisible presence had interfered in his behalf. Greatly frightened, he returned to his work. Next day the idea entered his mind that the hand and voice were creatures of a sensitive imagination, and the trouble being still upon him, he resolved upon a second attempt at self-destruction. Repairing to a place still more secluded than that chosen on the day before, he sat down to change the cartridges in his revolver. Having removed those it contained, and just as he was about to insert the first fresh cartridge, the weapon was wrenched from his hand and thrown 40 feet away. Looking for the cause of this rude interference he saw a form of great beauty, with clear complexion, large, lustrous eyes, full lips, pearly teeth, and countenance bright as the morning. 'Rash man!' exclaimed this apparition; 'you cannot tamper with mortal life without imminent peril to your immortal condition. Besides, mark me, you were born for a more exalted purpose than you have comprehended. Your career will yet prove noble and successful. Become acquainted with your powers and use them to the best advantage, and then you will wonder how this little disappointment could unman you for a moment. No more repining, no more depression, but courage and manliness instead, and you will win fame and fortune.'

"This was all. You will agree that it was enough. It was fully sufficient to banish all idea of suicide from the man's mind, and animate him by a worthy ambition. He deprecated my anger, but I assured him of sympathy and congratulated him on the advantage of a lesson and a prognostication of so much apparent significance. He asked for advice. I counseled him in a general way, but quite unsatisfactorily to him and myself. Affairs moved forward in the old style, for several months, except having found Clark more attentive to his duties than before, his salary had been advanced accordingly.

"But there was an abrupt turning point. He came to my house one Sunday evening, and it was immediately evident to me before he spoke that something had happened. It was a vision. More than this—the vision had come to him three nights in succession, in identically the same features and a triplication of every detail. The radiant form that snatched away the revolver and prevented his destruction came on each of the three occasions and addressed him, advising him to go to Chicago, where, he was assured, great good fortune awaited his acceptance. The business in which he was to engage was plainly indicated, and he was told how to proceed to secure a position immediately.

"The vision had impressed Clark so emphatically that he had already determined to go to Chicago, and nothing was left for me but acquiescence. He had saved a little money; I added a little; and in a week he removed to the great city he had never before seen. The man was successful from the beginning. Everything prospered with him, and now he is rich in material wealth and good deeds. I know that his charities exceed my entire income, and that he is a blessing to himself and humanity. The result is nothing but good. Whence came the influence which saved this man from self-murder and made of him a most estimable citizen?"

A SPIRIT GUARDIAN.

Said Colonel Charles Stratton: "I am often asked to explain what it was that made me a Spiritualist, and I experienced no difficulty in finding an answer satisfactory to myself. I do not know just when it first dawned upon my mind that spirit return was an assured fact. The conviction came gradually, not in a spasm, and knowledge followed fast upon belief. If I understood what is meant by 'conversion,' in a religious sense, it was not that through which the light reached me, but rather it came as to a child in a kindergarten—objectively.

"For years before I saw that which finally brought knowledge, I felt its presence and heard its movement. Influenced, often against my convictions; followed, and plans upon which my heart was set ruthlessly frustrated by an invisible, but irresistible force, I felt as if tethered in act and limited in range like one circumscribed by arbitrary metes and bounds. Resistance was futile. That which held me captive was gentle but inexorable. Its fiat of 'thus far and no farther' had not a hair's breadth of elasticity, and, without the cognizance of my nearest friends, I was helpless a prisoner. I shrank from describing this state and suffered its annoyances in silence.

"Twenty years ago I had audible evidence that I was followed almost constantly. The sound of footsteps came to my ears as if produced by one in close pursuit, but when I turned no one was there. No matter how suddenly I whirled about, the step was still behind me; no matter how high the fence or broad the ditch I vaulted over, the patter of pursuing feet kept time with those in advance. How my daily associates failed to observe this phenomenon was almost as much of a mystery as the thing itself. At the same time it was a relief to me.

"One night I was awakened by a loud and unusual noise in my room. This occurred some three years subsequent to my first consciousness of the audible footsteps. Seated near the bed was a middle-aged gentleman of benign aspect. A strange, mellow, rosy light illuminated his face and made him grandly apparent from the waist upward. He brought his own light, and it was above criticism. I gained a sitting posture and tried to speak, but at first my throat was too dry. My visitor smiled as he noticed the futility of the effort and bowed courteously as if to afford encouragement for an additional trial. Finally, in a hoarse whisper, I managed to articulate 'good evening.' The salutation was returned, and the gentleman said:

"'You and I have long been friends without your knowledge. You knew that you had an invisible mentor, who sought your good, but of his identity you were in darkness. I am he who has persistently sought to bless and many times was only able to annoy you. Now I feel that we should have a better understanding of our relations to the end that any service I may be able to render will be direct and immediate. I am your grandfather; father of your mother.'

"'Name?' I queried.

"'Abner Jencks Billings, for my father and uncle.'

"Knowing this to be correct, I felt reassured and in the mood to talk. 'What is your business with me?' I asked.

"'To bring you good. Like myself at your age you are peculiarly susceptible to temptations of a certain kind, and, while these were calamitous to me, I wish to impress upon you their vanity and worthlessness. On the other hand, there is not a purer or more exalted mortal condition than that to be cultivated,

IN THE MARRIAGE STATE,

which you have avoided too long. Marriage is the truest safeguard, not only for a Stratton or Billings, but for the entire body of humanity, with just enough exceptions to prove the rule. This you believe, but do not practice, indicating that you are hypocritical?

"'Sir!'

"'Oh, among post mortem gentlemen there is no nicety of phrase. We speak out the truth, without beating around the bush for highly polished words, and ordinary sense informs you that I mean no offence by coming direct to the point. In an advisory way I tell you to get married; get a good wife; take time to make a proper selection, but do not delay. You understand me and the real object of my advice. Act!'

"He dissolved out of sight and left the room in darkness, but in his words I felt the force of a peculiar enlightenment Mentally I was too much elated to sleep. The admonition of my visitor was so fully in accord with my inclinations that I wondered at the long neglect with which I had treated the subject, and arising from bed, I managed to write an awkward letter to a young lady friend, requesting permission to call upon her at a time specified. Her cordial reply fixed the date for the beginning of my brief courtship, and in five months I was a benedict, blissful and contented—a condition which constantly amplifies its enjoyments with the passing years and day by day confirms my admiration of Spiritualism. My benign guardian comes to us frequently, sometimes with wholesome advice, always with a cheery benediction."

TWO VAGRANT APPARITIONS.

An aged debater related this anecdote: "It was near 40 years ago when I saw as strange a thing as ever came to me at a seance. A gentleman who had been my neighbor for a long period called upon me in a social way and engaged in a lengthy talk about his own affairs. This was surprising for the reason that he was an exceedingly modest man, decidedly reserved and never inclined to talk about himself of his family. But on this occasion he was wearisomely egotistical, dwelling long upon his pedigree, experience, the achievements of his ancestors and his own phenomenal success as a business man. He had become very rich, principally through his own unaided efforts. Finally, as he arose to leave, he said:

"'I want you to see that justice is done Mrs. L.—his elder daughter—in the settlement of my estate. There may be a disposition on the part of some of the heirs to take advantage of her, if possible, and this must be prevented. I have made you one of the executors of my will, for I know you to be a just man. Do not forget my injunctions as you would escape the wrath of God! Good by.'

"When I turned to reply he was nowhere in sight, and, astonished beyond expression, I rushed out to intercept him, but he was not in my yard, neither had my family seen or heard anyone pass out. As I was making ready to return my neighbor's call for the purpose of asking him some questions regarding the business with which he had intrusted me, a gentleman came to my house with information that the good man had just expired at home in his bed, to which he had been confined for more than a week, unknown to me. As this death notice came some 30 minutes after my talk with the man, and more than an hour after his entrance to my house, it became evident that I had held converse with his spirit while he was yet alive!"

Another gentleman related an incident with some features similar to the foregoing. "A trance medium well-known in Cincinnati," said he, "had described several spirits for my benefit, when he suddenly exclaimed: 'Here is the spirit of Colonel Henry!'

"'Impossible,' I replied, 'for he is not dead.'

"'That's so. He says he isn't dead, but he's anxious to see you.'

"'What does he want?'

"'He'll tell you when you meet.'

"I cut my sitting short and called upon Colonel Henry. He had been looking for me since morning, and was at the moment of my call, writing me a letter on a matter of prime importance in a business way. When I told him of the incident with the medium he was much agitated, saying that his anxiety had been very great to see me at about the time of sitting, for our business was of such a character that he hesitated about committing it to writing. He took a great deal of stock in Spiritualism from that day onward, but before it had been the subject of his merciless ridicule." T. P.

THE FOX HOME.

Has Notions and a Plan of His Own.

To the Editor:—I notice in your paper of November 21, an article by Mr. S. B. York, wherein he entreats all Spiritualists to consider the question of purchasing the Fox home in Hydesville, N. Y. He says "the plan cannot fail to meet the approval of every consistent Spiritualist."

I ask in the name of Spiritualism, pure and true, if that is the most spiritual way in which to keep green the memory of those gifted women who drew aside the black veil of crude superstition and presented to the world an old yet new teaching, pure and bright? Would it not be more in harmony with the purpose of those noble minds, to lift higher and to enhance the work which they have begun?

Spiritualism teaches us that it is the spiritual and not the physical body that should be remembered after the latter is cast aside. Then why should the physical portion of the birthplace of modern thought be rebuilt and maintained, at no little expense, when hundreds of good and worthy mediums, who constitute a great part of the foundation of modern Spiritualism, are actually suffering for the want of the necessities of life. If the "spirit" was in comfortable circumstances all Spiritualists should gladly give their mite, that the "physical" might be retained.

I would suggest that a committee of men and women be appointed by the Spiritualists of this country to receive donations, not for the benefit of the physical, but for the benefit of the spiritual, and thus strengthen the cause which the Fox Sisters have given to the earth.

Every creed, every religion has its Mecca or its Jerusalem. It has some place which is sacred to its followers. Shall broad, noble Spiritualism belittle itself with a "holy land?" Shall it bow down before a tall marble monument, and say, with the dust of Christianity in its teeth: We worship thee, O, Monument! because thou standest where a trinity of noble women stood. Or shall it with the light of Independence like a halo round its head, proclaim to the world: We shall not close our hearts to the suffering humanity around us, but we will strive with might and main to benefit our fellowmen, that the memory of the Fox Sisters "shall not perish forever from the earth." TOM. P. HUGHES.

AN IDEA TO THINK ON.

To the Editor:—I take up my pencil with the impression that it is my duty to come to the front with an idea which to me is becoming more and more interesting every day.

After reading the sketch of the "U. S. Church Army" and then taking up "The Progressive Thinker" and reading the speech made by S. P. Putnam at the opening of the Freethought Federation, I am anxious to present my idea of what would be the best plan to present this idea of liberty to the general public.

We want to reach the masses and thereby create sentiment. Let us begin by preparing a constitution and by-laws for a "Liberty Club," and organize the liberty people in a voting precinct, that will organize, if there are not more than three men and women together, and let the first object of this organization be to secure the time and place for public meetings, which shall be known as Liberty Meetings, and shall be held at least once each month, and as often as once a week or more if the club thinks best.

And let us organize as many precincts as we can, and if we can organize the whole county, why not have a delegate county club which could give annual semi-annual, or quarterly sessions to review the work of the county. If we had counties organized in this way, there would be no trouble in circulating petitions for any reform measure. I have been gathering my best ideas together for the purpose of arranging a constitution and by-laws for just such an organization. If the lecturers and mediums all over the country would take hold of the work, and secure the necessary papers for a thorough organization, we could soon have Liberty talks, Liberty papers read, or articles from Freethought papers read, in every precinct in the United States every month. And many of the features of liberty would be brought out at these meetings. There are many men and women living in every county who would answer calls to speak or read papers on the subject of freethought, the meaning of which is comprehended in the word liberty; in fact, if we have full liberty we will fully investigate every question which is brought before us.

This Liberty Club can be brought into use in the furtherance of every needed reform in this great country.

There is much more that I would like to say on this subject, but I will wait and see what others have to say about it. W. T. GREENE.

THAT SYMPOSIUM.

To the Editor:—Your Symposium in No. 355, "Christian or Not Christian," is fine, is true, is timely and good. Let us all take heed and govern ourselves accordingly. Now can't you give us another from some of the level-headed men and women in the ranks of your readers, on the topic: Church or No Church?

Why should Spiritualism, which at the present rate of increase will soon capture the earth, cling to and ape the follies and foibles of a dead creed—a dead churchianity? Dead and damned, I felt like saying, after reading this extract from a sermon by Rev. Spurgeon, on the resurrection:

"When thou diest, thy soul will be tormented alone; that will be a hell for it; but at the day of judgment thy body will join thy soul, and then thou wilt have two hells, thy soul sweating drops of blood, and thy body suffused with agony. In fire exactly like that which we have on earth thy body will lie asbestos-like, forever unconsumed, all thy veins roads for the feet of pain to travel on, every nerve a string on which the Devil shall forever play his diabolical tune of Hell's Unutterable Lament."

Why should an association of Spiritualists call themselves a church? And why "Pastor?" and why "Ordination," and why "Reverend? As the old Roman said: "Are we men and suffer such dishonor?"

Yes, give us another symposium and ask Hudson Tuttle, "the bravest Roman of them all," to furnish the leading article. T. W. MERRITT.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds.' By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical bodies and their psychical bodies with universal nature, and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the Spirit-world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

PROF. BARRETT'S ADDRESS.

Other Subjects Treated of Especial Interest.

Why remain in ignorance? Why don't you keep posted in regard to the great Spiritualistic movement? Prof. Barrett delivered an address before the National Association of Spiritualists. It was an important one, and should be read by every Spiritualist in this broad land. We have had his address (which covers three pages of The Progressive Thinker) and five other important lectures and articles embodied in one paper, which we propose to send forth to illuminate the minds of those who have not had an opportunity to read them.

The first page of this paper contains the lecture by Col. Ingersoll, given in a Chicago pulpit. It scintillates throughout.

The second page contains a highly interesting lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on the "Dwellings of the Dead."

The third page has a splendid article on "Science versus Theology," in review of Andrew D. White's two superb volumes.

The fourth page has another excellent lecture by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, on "Spiritual Unfoldment."

The fifth page is very suggestive throughout, and is devoted to the "Hindoo Teachers—They Will Try to Capture the United States."

On the sixth page commences Prof. Barrett's admirable address, occupying three pages. In order that all whom this notice may reach, can secure this address, as well as the other lectures and articles, we have made arrangements to have 10,000 copies printed to be sent out free to every new trial or yearly subscriber. This paper is well worth 25 cents. Every Spiritualist who wishes to know what has been going on should carefully read it. Our regular subscribers have, of course, had the contents thereof.

We will also, in connection with this paper, send out another equally as valuable. The first page contains an excellent lecture by Virchand R. Gandhi, a learned Hindoo. The remaining seven pages contain the wonderfully thrilling narrative (founded on facts) entitled, "The Night the Light Went Out," exhibiting many of the inside workings of the Catholic Church. Besides the address by Mr. Ghandi and the remarkable narrative, "The Night the Light Went Out," the first page has an excellent communication obtained through Ouija. The second page has a startling statement in reference to the "Romish Octopus—It Is Winding Its Poisonous Coils Around Washington." The poem on the same page, "The Sad Picture of a Wrecked Human Life," is wonderfully suggestive. The third page has a striking illustration showing how the Romish Church treats heretics. This page and the fourth also have a continuation of the "Romish Octopus." The fifth page has that remarkable poem, "St. Peter At the Gate." Every freethinker should read it. It is full of excellent "points." It also contains interesting facts in reference to the Romish Church and offices. The sixth, seventh and eighth pages have the following: "Monasteries and Convents—Where Those Alive Are Entombed." "Rider Haggard and the Immuring of Nuns." This paper alone is well worth the price of a year's subscription.

Every Spiritualist in this broad land should have these two papers. They will be sent to anyone for five cents per copy, or ten cents for the two papers. Stamps received. Remember, please, that these two papers are sent out FREE to all NEW trial or yearly subscribers.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia.....	$ .45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia.....	.45
The Next World Interviewed.....	.35
Total	$1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia.....	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia.....	400
The Next World Interviewed.....	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

"Principles of Light and Color." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL.D. A truly great work of a master mind, and one whom Spiritualists should delight to honor. The result of years of deep thought and patient research into Nature's finer forces are here garnered and made amenable to the well-being of humanity. Medical men especially and scientists, general readers and students of occult forces will find instruction of great value and interest. A large, four-pound book, strongly bound, and containing beautiful illustrative plates. For sale at this office. Price, postpaid, $5. It is a wonderful work and you will be delighted with it.

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. W. M. Lockwood. Prof. Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents an succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. For sale at this office. Price 25 cents

IMMORTALITY,

...OR...

FUTURE HOMES AND DWELLING PLACES.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Give us details—details and accurate delineations of life in the Spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. Many other matters are treated, too numerous to mention. Price $1.50; postage, 12 cents. For sale at this office.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

JESUS AND THE MEDIUMS,

—OR—

CHRIST AND MEDIUMSHIP.

Careful comparison of some of the Spiritualism and Mediumship of the Bible with that of to-day. By Moses Hull. An invincible argument proving that Jesus was only a medium, subject to all the conditions of modern mediumship. It also shows that all the manifestations throughout the Old and New Testament were under the same conditions that mediums require to-day; and that the coming of Christ is the return of mediumship to the world. 48 pages. Price, 10 cents. For sale at this office.

AN EXCELLENT WORK.

GENERAL SURVEY

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Doings, Etc.

Bear in mind, please, that we cannot publish weekly reports of meetings. Whenever a change is made in speakers, or anything of special interest, send us a brief item, please. A great deal can be expressed in a dozen lines; but long reports will not be used. Meetings are of local interest only. We extend a cordial invitation to all speakers to send in their appointments to lecture, and general movements, which will be read by at least 40,000. We go to press early Monday morning, and items must reach us as early as Friday or Saturday in order to have immediate insertion.

Communications must always be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer, or no attention will be paid to them.

The Banner of Light says: "During the Sundays of December, 1896, Prof. W. M. Lockwood, the widely-known and eminent spiritual physicist, of Chicago, Ill., will deliver the following course of educative and interesting lectures, under the auspices of the Boston Spiritual Temple, Berkeley Hall, Boston: 1—The Spirituality of Nature's Elements and Forces; 2—Spiritualism the Basis of Evolution; and Its Philosophy the Only Foundation of Moral Ethics; 3—The Five Senses of Man; or the Relation of Molecular Modes of Motion to Consciousness; 4—The Spiritual (Molecular) Hypothesis of Nature, or the Philosophy of Co-relations; 5—How Do We Improve Each Other, and How Does the Spirit-World Impress Us?; 6—Nature and Its Data the Thesis of all True Philosophy; 7—What Is Intemperance? Do You Know?; 8—The Human Soul a Progressive, Conscious Entity."

Will C. Hodge is serving the First Spiritualist Church of Rochester, Ind., for the month of December. Is open for engagements on liberal terms for the season of 1897. Address Rochester, Ind., care Major Bitters.

Mrs. Julia M. Walton will answer calls to lecture. Address her at No. 603 South Mechanic street, Jackson, Mich.

Mrs. Jane W. Bruner is in the city, and is open for engagements in the lecture field on her special subjects: "Nunneries Are Pagan Institutions; Why Roman Catholic Italy, Mexico and Guatemala Have Abolished Nunneries and Convents, etc." Mrs. Bruner has traveled extensively and made the monastic system a complete study, and is the best informed woman in the United States on the so-called religious orders of the Roman Catholic church. Address 6142 Ingleside avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. S. A. Durkee writes from Independence, Iowa: "The Spiritualists of this place have had a treat through the ministrations of that grand instrument for the spirit-world, Isa Wilson Kayner. She and her genial husband have been with us three weeks; they gave lectures on Sundays at G. A. R. hall, followed by test psychometric readings that pleased the Spiritualists, gave the skeptic food for thought, and caused the tears to start to the eyes of the materialist, as the names of dear departed ones were given full and clear. The fire tests and treatments were wonderful. An encouraging feature of Mrs. Kayner's meetings was the increase in numbers of listeners each succeeding Sunday, so that the third or last meeting numbered three or four times as many persons as the first, with seats all taken and some standing. They left here for St. Joseph, Mo., Wednesday evening, taking with them the good wishes and Godspeed of their newly-made and other friends."

Carl A. Wickland writes: "Myself and wife called at your office a few days ago, having just arrived from Eau Claire, Wis., where we stayed ten weeks, conducting private and public test circles, and succeeded in convincing a good many of the truth of spirit return, and especially were we successful among Catholics, whom we find the easiest to convert to our philosophy. We find that we are the most successful when we leave their creeds alone, and simply present our philosophy, and leave the deciding as to which is the best doctrine—ours or theirs—to themselves. It seems that when one begins, or attempts to convert anyone by first abusing their old creed, it often has a tendency to make them angry or disgusted, and they will, perchance, never want to listen to Spiritualism any more—and what have we gained? But who would attempt or expect to convert a criminal by means of first throwing stones at him, or abusing him for the wrong he has done, expecting thereby to win his love and respect? No! All we need do is to show them a better way, if we have it, and they will not be slow in choosing the best one. We are now located at 206 Oak street, on the North Side, Chicago, where we may remain for the winter, with the intention of organizing a society here if it be possible, missionary work being our special duty. My wife is a trance medium, and I do what talking I can and also give testimony of the fact of the power of the planets in largely influencing in our character building. We shall give public test circles at our rooms, Tuesday evenings."

Societies or camp-meetings desiring to make engagements for lectures for 1897, can address Dr. J. H. Randall, People's Institute, Chicago, Ill., until February next.

In a lecture entitled "Foregleams," B. F. Underwood proves conclusively that prevision or foresight beyond the mind's normal powers of forecasting the future, is a fact, and he presents some profoundly interesting reflections upon the subject—interesting especially to Spiritualists and to all "psychical researchers." Societies wishing to hear Mr. Underwood's lecture upon this and kindred subjects which he has made a special study, should address him at 353 Evanston avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Eva Payne Hopkins writes from Owasso, Mich.: "For several weeks we have had no regular meetings, but have held conferences each Sunday morning. Until two weeks ago Mrs. Julia M. Walton, of Jackson, Mich., came to us and gave two lectures, the morning subject being 'Re-embodiment,' upon which subject many good points were made. The evening subject was 'Can We by Searching Find Out God?' Mrs. Walton talked to a large and appreciative audience and closed her remarks with an improvised poem. One week ago, November 22, Mrs. Bussell, of Chicago, was with us. A conference meeting was held in the morning which was largely attended. In the evening Mrs. Bussell, assisted by the writer, held a meeting which seemed to be appreciated by all. The Wednesday evening meeting was well attended. Next month we are to have Mrs. Walton with us during the entire month. She is an old and tried worker and we expect good results from her stay among Prof. J. Madison Allen spoke in Springfield, Mo., South Side Society, the last six Sundays preceding December, and will visit various points in Missouri as State missionary and organizer during the month of December unless prevented by the too long continuance of his wrestle with la grippe. As secretary of the Missouri State Association, he invites correspondence from each and every city, village and rural settlement throughout the State; so that the spiritual forces of the entire field may be brought into sympathetic touch and active unity. By means of a system of general distribution and co-operation, all may be made acquainted; the most remote corner or quiet nook can be reached and perhaps visited personally, and incalculable good accomplished. A complete census is needed. Write at once. Address at 233 Commercial street, Springfield, Mo."

Mrs. A. A. Averill writes from Lynn, Mass.: "The Lynn Spiritualists' Association is having very successful and interesting meetings this season; the attendance so far has exceeded our expectations, the receipts at the door more than paying expenses. We have the present month the ever popular trance speaker, Oscar A. Edgerly, who is giving a course of most eloquent and scientific lectures, and attracting a large number of thinking people who do not usually attend spiritual meetings. We have most excellent talent engaged for the future: Moses Hull, Tillie N. Reynolds, Joseph D. Stiles and others. The Social Union connected with the society is doing a good work, and is of great help to us—meeting every Monday evening at 15 City Hall Square. Many of our speakers remain with us to assist in the exercises of that evening. Mr. Edgerly is open for engagements during March."

Dr. C. B. Decota writes as follows from St. Louis, Mo.: "I take pleasure in stating that I have been to one of Prof. Raphiel's psychical circles and for the first time in my life have received a communication from my dear father whom I have for many years thought dead and gone forever. I had my own slate; held it in my hands and the writing came on it like by magic, which I recognized as my father's, and his name signed. That certainly convinced me of the truth of spirit return, as I have been a skeptic all my life. This wonderful medium does more for Spiritualism than any medium I ever saw in this city."

Mrs. Sarah Varble writes: "I consider The Progressive Thinker the best spiritual paper printed, and can most truly say that the reading of it every week is a comfort to me."

Frank T. Ripley has just closed a successful engagement with the First Society of Detroit, Mich. He is now at Toledo, Ohio, and can be engaged for January, February and March. Address all letters during December to 328 Erie street, Toledo, Ohio; during January to 242 Thirty-first street, Chicago, Ill.

At Topeka, Kas., December 7, Dr. and Mrs. Noyes lectured and gave tests for the First Spiritual Society, to a full house—not a chair being empty in the large G. A. R. hall, although there was two other spiritual meetings in the city. After the meeting the society engaged Dr. and Mrs. Noyes for the month of December.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates were the speakers for the Rochester Spiritualists during the month of November. At a meeting held December 2, H. W. Annis presiding, A. S. Clackner presented the following, which was unanimously adopted by a rising vote: "As the labors of Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates are closed for the present in this city, we wish to express our appreciation of the work they have accomplished in our midst in their efforts for the upbuilding of humanity, and their teachings of the nearness or blending of the two worlds. We find them lecturers of rare merit, combined with a charming personality which wins all hearts, and consider them grand exponents of our sublime and beautiful philosophy; and, wherever they may go, we commend them to the warm hearts of all lovers of 'the good, the beautiful and the true.'"

W. Reanlen writes: "Enclosed please find draft for $1.50, for which continue my subscription for The Progressive Thinker also Vol. II of Encyclopaedia of Death. I want to strengthen you in your humanitarian efforts to elevate the world to that higher plane."

George S. Stephens writes from Wigton, Pa.: "I may give you a few notes of our progress these last two years. About that time a Mr. John Smith was introduced to me at my house, he being one of Ingersoll's strong men, and had been a materialist for forty years. Some friends of mine brought him for a test of spirit manifestations. With him were his two sons and son-in-law—all of the same faith as the old gentleman. I gave them a kind greeting, discussing the question of spirit manifestations for a while; then I described their spirit friends to them. This set the whole of this family thinking in another line of thought, and to-day they are all with me, and two of them are going to be good workers in our cause. The son speaks under a good influence and the son-in-law, Mr. Wm. Walton, in whose house we hold our regular Sunday night meetings with house full of thinking men and women. On Sundays at 7 o'clock we have speaking. Tuesday night, at 7:30, a circle at Mr. Dane's; Wednesday night, 7:30, private circle at Mr. Walton's for materialization—medium, Mrs. Walton, Mr. Smith's daughter, and we get lights, knocks and many other physical manifestations."

"Aunt Lucy" finds much to please and instruct in J. M. Peebles' articles, but is led to fear that he is lacking in the great gift, charity. She asks: "Why should he begin his pen flashes with a slur on preachers who are, to the best of their ability, teaching what they feel to be right? We do not all see alike; all need a light adapted to their sense of good—or God. Now, what possible harm is there in singing to the praise of God? What harm to extol the great power that rules all. What can we do but adore the power so infinite, so boundless, that we cannot express in words our feelings for this Supreme Being? I say, let them pray, sing or express a high and divine feeling for the Most High."

Dr. C. F. Ray writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "The Unity Spiritual Society opened its third season October 1. Mr. G. H. Brooks served until December 1, when he departed to fill engagements in Ottawa, Ill., and La Crosse, Wis., for the present month, after which he will return to remain as pastor of our society until March, 1897. Mr. Brook's spiritual and instructive lectures, and his earnest work for the cause is highly appreciated by all. Mr. F. Corden White, the noted test medium of Chicago, will be with us during December, and his indisputable tests are setting the investigators to thinking. All the meetings have been well attended and we rejoice over the remarkable progress our cause is making in the Cream City. The Unity Society desires to send holiday greetings to all its friends."

Mrs. E. Nugent writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "The First Society meets here in the Spiritual Temple, corner New Jersey and Prospect streets. The meetings have been fairly prosperous—but the interest seems to be on the increase. For the month of December we have the well known and able workers, G. W. Kates and wife. Their service Sunday night, December 6, filled the church until every corner was occupied. The audience was seemingly very much interested. The tests by Mrs. Kates were quite numerous and received general recognition and applause. She is one of the many test mediums who hold the audience entirely interested and carries conviction with every word. She gives the society a night each week for tests only and then reaches forty to fifty persons. Her fortitude is marvelous, and the inexhaustible spiritual fountain is ever flowing for her in copious drafts. We expect the whole month to be replete with great interest."

Mrs. Mattie G. Ward writes from South Barre, Vt.: "The members of the First Progressive Spiritualist Association of Barre met at Unity Temple, December 5, 1896, to elect officers. Officers were elected as follows: President, B. P. Willey; vice-president, A. B. Hutchins; secretary, Miss Mattie G. Ward; assistant secretary, Ed Ward; treasurer, Mrs. Rosina Claflin. Board of managers: Johnson Estabrooks, J. M. Ward, and Clement Little. Auditors: Ed. Ward, S. S. Smith and Mrs. Johnson Estabrooks. The society is in a prosperous condition and took in twelve new members at their last business meeting. We have for our speaker Mr. Lucius Colburn."

Dr. Magoon, lecturer and test medium, is now stopping at No. 140 E. New York street, Indianapolis, Ind.

Mrs. J. Lindsey, 26 Turner street, Grand Rapids, Mich., will answer calls to lecture. Terms reasonable.

Geo. F. Perkins, of the Beacon Light Spiritual Church, Chicago, will accept engagements of one or two nights to speak and give tests, and to organize societies under charter of the Illinois State Association. Reasonable terms. Direct to G. F. Perkins, 587 N. Clark street, Chicago.

The active worker, Mrs. L. C. Scovell, writes from No. 163 Du Page street, Elgin, Ill.: "I have been at Freeport for the past week. I find this place wide awake to the truth and, by urgent request, I return Monday, the 14th, to give public meetings and instruct a class. There has been a great desire on the part of Elgin friends for me to resume my work here, but there are others who can minister in this field while I am called abroad. Living, as we do, at the gates of the great City of Chicago, there are many located there who can spare a night for Elgin, and be well repaid in thanks, if not in money, for their coming, and eventually build up, as I have done, until the people will be ready to receive them when they are ready to come. January 1, I fill an engagement in Kansas City, and one where there are many old friends anxious to welcome us back to a well-loved field of the past. Here I would say if any friends outside the city desire my services they can address me here at Elgin in reference to terms and time."

The society at Geneva, Ohio, having been favored with the ministrations of Mrs. Kate R. Stiles, passed resolutions most cordially recommending her to other societies.

W. W. Hawkins, of Lima, Ohio, a prominent Spiritualist, writes as follows of the labors of Prof. Lockwood there: "We are doing our best to keep pace with the rapid strides, which your full columns of weekly correspondence indicate, that the cause we are working for is taking. Desiring to answer the demands of scientific inquiry, which is daily becoming more frequent, we secured the services of Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood, of Chicago, to lead us along those lines of molecular reciprocity by which it is becoming daily more evident that nature has always made her expressions in matter, to that conscious ego called human, whose previous habitation was, hitherto confined to that inscrutable place where nought but fiat could enter. So many there are heard to say, 'Well, if I could only find out how it was done, then wouldn't I believe, though!' Let me again assure you that this class of mental caliber was so firmly placed upon the 'path,' that nothing short of its destruction would now dislodge them. How eagerly they desire his return is plainly evidenced by their eulogisms of his method, and we hope to meet him again with us next year."

John S. Phillips writes: "I would like to say through your paper for the enlightenment of persons interested, that at the annual meeting and election of the Island Lake Camp Association, the following board of directors was elected: Samuel H. Ewell, Romeo; O. E. Spaulding, Lansing; A. G. Brown, Detroit; A. Anscomb, Detroit; Frank Gates, Detroit: Asa B. Smith, Northville, and E. F. Josselyn, Brighton. S. H. Ewell was made president; O. E. Spaulding, treasurer. There was no choice for secretary; that matter will be settled at the first meeting of the board, and programme arranged for the coming camp, commencing in July."

This number of The Progressive Thinker, as usual is most excellent.

Dr. Peebles is now on his third trip around the world. He will visit Honolulu, the Fijis, New Zealand, Australia, the East Indies, Siam, Malacca, Johore, Ceylon, India, Persia, Egypt, Palestine, Southern Europe, Rome, Paris and London, and will be absent one year or more. Although advanced in years, the Doctor is young in spirit."

Dr. F. L. H. Willis speaks in New York, February, 1897.

Dr. Willis Edwards writes; "A holiday entertainment will be given at Arlington Hall, 551 N. Clark street, Friday evening, December 18th, under the auspices of the Church of the Spirit. Dr. Willis Edwards will be assisted by many prominent mediums who will give different phases of spirit phenomena. There will be a Christmas tree and raffle of many useful and ornamental articles, kindly donated by the ladies of the congregation. Dancing from 10 to 12. Refreshments served. As these entertainments are always highly enjoyable all are promised a good time. Tickets, 25 cents."

F. J. Smith, of Milwaukee, Wis., writes as follows of Mrs. Carrie Fuller Weatherford: "She is at present in our city doing the work which a few have the courage of carrying forward so fearlessly. She always convinces that she is not only honest but earnest. She has succeeded in giving not only wonderful tests but spiritual knowledge to many hundreds in Milwaukee. Her guides gave a lecture Sunday evening, the 6th inst., at Fraternity Hall, 216 Grand avenue, replete with science, philosophy and history. After the lecture E. M. Gilman, a young gentleman who has remarkable mediumistic gifts gave some unusually good tests. Mr. Gilman is not only very popular but an excellent medium. While he was giving tests in the hall, Mrs. Weatherford diagnosed disease for those who wished it in an adjoining room. Next Sunday Mrs. Weatherford also will give tests. All felt that they were glad to be there. The energetic workers of our society hope with the aid which we shall receive from our mediums to be able to organize a lyceum. Our meetings have no ten-cent show business attached to them. All seats are free and we are not ashamed to invite our friends. All mediums with good records will receive a hearty welcome from us."

The Progressive Thinker contains by far a greater amount of general information on liberal subjects, than any other paper on this green earth.

Wm. M. Salter has been engaged to serve the Chicago Society for Ethical Culture, again.

The Church of the Soul, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, pastor, will hold its Christmas service Sunday morning, December 20, at 10:30. The musical programme will be under the direction of Madame Bourgeois, organist. She will be assisted by Miss Olive Whiting, Prof. J. Singer, violinist; Walfried Singer, harpist and a chorus of twelve voices.

The Sunday evening services of the Spiritual Independent Church, Louisville, Ky., were of more than ordinary interest, the occasion being seized upon to give a complimentary farewell benefit to R. H. Kneeshaw, of Montreal, Canada, who has served the cause in this city for the past six months. He goes hence to Houston, Tex., where he can be addressed through the general delivery. Miss Louise Monohan, of the Spirit Guide Society, kindly aided in the conduct of the meeting, and by her presence and sweet inspiration, gave a loving tone to this, our farewell to our brother, whom we all respect and reverence. We cannot speak too highly of the good work that Bro. Kneeshaw has done in this city. His lectures are models of eloquent reasoning, whilst as an improviser of poetry and song, we have never heard his equal; added to this, he posesses clairvoyance and clairaudience, and is indeed a whole battery of demonstrative mediumship. In the name of our society, and in justice alike to the cause and Mr. Kneeshaw, we, the undersigned, officers of the Spiritual Independent Church, do hereby tender our sincere thanks and best wishes to him, and hope that Spiritualists everywhere will keep him busy, and thus aid to spread the truths of Spiritualism. A. O. Revenaugh, president; John Hoskins, secretary; Edward Dohnborsh, treasurer.

Grand prize and surprise party and ball, including Spirit Art Gallery, donated by noted mediums of this city, the occasion being for a well-known medium as testimonial benefit. First part, entertainment by eminent volunteer talent, Held at Washington Hall, 490 Washington boulevard, corner Ogden avenue, Wednesday evening, December 23, 8 p. m. Christmas tree, etc. See programmes: Admission tickets, 50 cents: admits holder to all. G. G. W. Van Horn, advance agent.

M. F. Hammond has been engaged to lecture two Sundays for the Spiritualist society at Findlay, O. Address him for engagements at 106½ N. Main street.

Peter Larson has been lying in jail in New Jersey for shooting a thief on Sunday—a hawk.

The first page of The Progressive Thinker is chockful of spiritual thought.

Dr. C. W. Hidden, of Newburyport, Mass., lectured in Fitchburg, Mass., Sunday afternoon and evening, being greeted by the largest audiences of the season.

ITEMS FROM THE TWO WORLDS, LONDON, ENG.

Jesus had appeared, but the Jews recognized him not: He did not come in the power and glory of the earth earthy. His was a spiritual power, as his was also to be a spiritual kingdom, a spiritual dispensation, and therefore he did not appeal to the Jews, who could only realize the fulfillment of their own prophecies in a king who would rule with earthly pomp and glory.

If you read the records, you will find that men prayed to God with the purpose of obtaining an answer, which was often delivered by means of those spiritual messengers, the angels, who are ever round us to guide and instruct us.

Those who have really understood prayer from the soul—the union with the Divine spirit—the link that binds man to God, understand the power of prayer.

There is nothing to-day that was not in the past, and through prayer we shall succeed in understanding the fullness of spiritual life.

There must be prayer that puts on one side all the limitations of the flesh, that keeps man for the time a spiritual being, and allows him to communicate with those who will minister to his spiritual wants.

You mus first endeavor to unfold your spiritual faculties, you must endeavor to direct yourself towards one end, namely, the understanding of the great spiritual truths, which can only be spiritually discerned. Until this can be done man will only regard prayer as a mere religious ceremony, and it is better never to pray than merely to look upon it in that light.

There should be a firm determination, an effort of the soul, because if when you open the faculties of your spirit to the light of day, you only open them with a weak intent, while in the unfolding condition you are liable to be taken up by any influence near you, for you cannot walk by yourself.

The soul that endeavors to develop the spiritual powers with which it is endowed, must be fully armed and rely upon spiritual aid to direct and preserve him from all the dangers that will best him. He needs guidance whene the road is difficult, before he can hope to reach a state of perfect understanding.

When a man prays with all his soul, then prayer becomes the force that, reaching beyond the Valley of the Shadow of Death, and causing earthly things to be subordinate, pierces the lower strata of heaven.

We read that Peter saw a vision. Those who are endeavoring to bring Those who are Endeavoring to bring out their latent faculties must learn that they must do so with the full desire of prayer that will overthrow existing difficulties. This is the determination we need. If a man has a task to achieve he must do it with all his might. There must be no faltering by the way; he must continue steadfast in confidence of the power and love of God; and then prayer will pass the man into the trance which is the open door to the spiritual world, into the vision that is the fulfillment of understanding.

It is usual to doubt spiritual instruction, but it is better indeed to try and prove than to accept what is heard, without an attempt to understand its value.

Cornelius related his story to Peter, telling how a man in shining raiment appeared to him while he was engaged in prayer, and that the heavenly visitant bade him send to Peter, who would be able to instruct him in the truth. Peter exclaimed, "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, that whosoever worketh righteously is acceptable unto Him." That was the meaning of Peter's vision—his lesson—that no matter what his nationality or creed, the man who endeavors to act rightly is acceptable to God.

The angels still endeavor to enlighten the minds of all men, and to proclaim the truths of immortality. Let us, then, try to learn lessons from the events of the past, and improve upon what others have done.

If the intelligences who come to us are not the spirits of the departed, why should they say they are, even giving their names and other particulars?—If not, then who are they?

Spiritualism, in the general acceptance of the term, implies a recognition of God as the infinite spirit-presence of the universe, and of a present, as well as past, intercourse and communion between the inhabitants of earth and those peopling the world of spirits. It is a fact, and a life; in method it is phenomenal and philosophical, corresponding to the inductive and deductive methods of reasoning.

These guardian angels are our friends, our companions, who hover around us; spirits of light, whispering wise council, holy hope and fortitude; and if we would realize their presence more intimately than I fear we do, if we would but see with eyes of faith, perhaps our lives would be ordered differently perhaps our feet would be less swift to seek the devious paths of unrighteousness, more ready to enter the narrow way that leadeth to eternal life; and surely if the ears of our heart were quick to hear the whisper of our angels' voices, our eyes to behold the presence of our angel guardians, our lives would be holier and happier, for happiness is only found in righteousness, and the angels of light are the messengers of the God of righteousness.

We are surrounded by space, immersed in its vasty depths. What appears to be an immeasurable void to our present organs of perception may teem with life in an infinite variety of forms.

What to us is the "blackness of darkness" may contain colors more glorious than mortal has yet seen, and the silence of midnight give forth sounds deeper, grander, and purer than material ears have ever compassed.

The "music of the spheres" dreamt of by ancient sages may, after all, be much nearer the truth than the majority suspect.

How much of the vast universe around us are our perceptions fitted to respond to? All? No, certainly not!

The eye does not perceive vibrations below 400,000,000,000,000 or above 700,000,000,000,000 per second; the lower figure represents the red, and the higher the violet rays of the spectrum.

The chemical and magnetic rays are above the violet, and are only perceptible to our senses by their action on material substances. Thus the billions of vibrations between sound and light are not perceived by us, for the simple reason that we lack the organs necessary to convey their impressions to the brain, even supposing the brain to contain the suitable receptive faculties; while the vibrations below these producing sound and above these producing light are likewise lost.

Who can say what is thus hidden from our material perceptions—the universes teeming with life, with scenery and sounds utterly beyond our ken? Possibly the extent of the, to us, invisible, is greater than that of the visible universe. Who can say?

It would appear as if the simple process of lowering or raising the sensibility of our perceptive organs would place us absolutely in another world as real and tangible as, and yet altogether different in appearance from, the one we now know; while the addition of other perceptive faculties, would increase the variety of our surroundings.

The ego—that unknowable essence which survives the dissolution of the material body—may possess the faculty of direct perception without the intervention of organs and nerves, and thus be able to perceive and appreciate at their true value every vibration in existence.

Where is the mortal who dare write "finality" to knowledge, and that would fain repair the already rent veil between this world and the next, in the vain hope of chaining mankind once again to outworn dogmas and dying creeds?

Our esteemed fellow-worker, Mr. J. J. Morse, will return soon from his visit to "our kin across the sea," and it is intended to hold a large meeting of local Spiritualists on December 22nd, to give him a hearty "welcome home." As it is hoped that the meeting will be graced by the presence of many leaders, whose names Spiritualists delight to honor, the earnest co-operation of all local Societies is cordially invited. Bills containing full particulars will shortly be distributed for exhibition in the Societies' rooms, and chairmen and secretaries are requested to kindly call the attention of their members to the proposal.

THE PHENOMENA AND TESTS.

To the Editor:—In a late Progressive Thinker, I read an article in which the writer seems to deplore the fact that people go to lectures—not so much to hear the lecturer as to have a chance of receiving a test.

If there is anything of greater importance than everything else that Spiritualism teaches, it is harmony among the workers and ourselves; still there seems to be an inclination on the part of many of our best lecturers to discredit the phenomena and work of test mediums.

In this it seems to me they are only producing inharmony among the workers. They seem to forget that we can remain at home, and for one dollar a year read a goodly quantity of the very finest thought in The Progressive Thinker or other spiritual papers, while tests are not so easily obtained. This will account for the fact that people will so often allow themselves to be punished for a whole hour in listening to a dry lecture simply to satisfy that eternal longing for a test from some departed loved one. If our lecturers are not satisfied they should reverse the thing and have the speakers follow the test medium, and see how that would work.

When everybody reaches that higher plane of thought and becomes thoroughly convinced of the truth of spirit return, then we may dispense with the phenomena; but until then, let us encourage the workers; they have a hard enough time at best.

My experience is that a poor test medium is no less desirable than a poor lecturer.

I now wish to second the proposition to purchase the old Fox home and make of it one of the principal landmarks of Spiritualism.

Why not the N. A. S. appoint a special committee to take this matter in charge, send blanks to all the different societies for a ten or twenty-five cent subscription? Let these subscription papers contain the names, addresses and occupation of every Spiritualist in the United States so far as they can be received; then publish in book form.

No Spiritualist would fail to pay 10 or 20 cents to be registered in this book, as a contributor to so important a work; besides the book should have a fair sale. This plan carried out, it seems to me it would be of vast benefit to the cause in many ways besides supplying the necessary funds to carry out a great work and building a monument to Spiritualism that all would be proud of.

CORWIN PHELPS.

Truth is the handmaid of justice; freedom is its child; peace its companion; safety walks in its steps; victory follows in its train.—Sydney Smith.

Passed to Spirit-Life.

Passed to the higher life, November 21, at Byron, Mich., Mrs. Sylvester Bates, leaving a husband and seven children to mourn the loss of a faithful, tender wife and mother. A life-long Spiritualist, she died knowing death was but a happy release from a tired body. Funeral services were conducted by Mrs. Anna L. Robinson.

Little Ruth, youngest daughter of Elsworth and Altie Brown, passed to spirit-life, November 24, 1896, aged 2 years and 21 days.

She was a beautiful child, bright beyond her years, and the sunshine of her short life still remains sacred in the memory of her parents and home friends. They have the heartfelt sympathy of all.

MRS. H. M. JACKSON.
La Grange, Ind.

Passed on, from her home in Rose Township, Mich., to the home of the spirit, Mrs. S. H. Ellinwood, on November 8, 1896, aged 63 years.

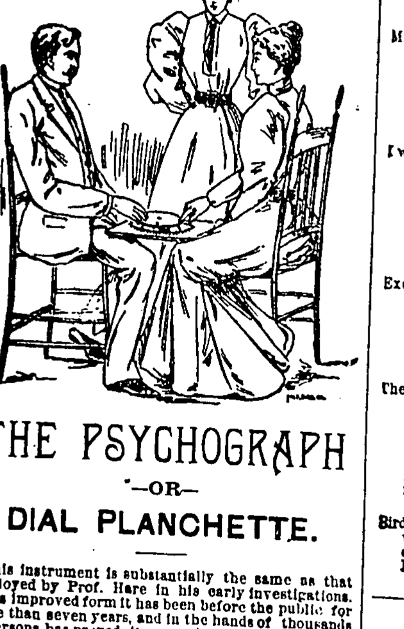
Maria A. Fuller was her maiden name. Her companion, to whom she was united in 1851, still survives her. She was an earnest Spiritualist, and espoused that cause while it was still in its infancy. Her companion has as earnestly argued and wrought fearlessly for the privilege of free thought and liberty of conscience, against dogmatic legislation and usurpation. As a natural consequence their home was filled by friends who listened to the funeral address, delivered by Julia M. Walton of Jackson.

JULIA M. WALTON.

Born to the higher life, October 27, 1896, from her home near Williamston, Mich., Eliza Griffin. She was born in the State of New York, in 1838, and was married to B. F. Griffin in 1867, in the city of Adrian, Mich., where she had united with the Wesleyan church in 1862, and was a consistent and sincere worker in that and another church, until, in 1885, when she became a Spiritualist. She became a seeker after light and comfort in this philosophy through the anguish and soul-hunger caused by the loss of an idolized and only daughter. Almost distracted by grief at this period, she could find no panacea for her troubled mind in the old faith she had before relied on. Then she investigated the proofs of spirit communion, through the medium and inspirational speaker who, at her request, made the remarks at her funeral on the 29th of October.

JULIA M. WALTON.
Jackson, Mich.

Brother Joseph Lovelace, formerly of Eudora, Kas., and one of the oldest Spiritualists in this county, passed on to the bright hereafter, at his residence in Wichita, Kansas, on the morning of December 1, 1896, after a long and painful sickness, in the 76th year of his life. At the request of the deceased in his lifetime, his remains were brought to Eudora for interment. Mr. Lovelace was a firm and steadfast Spiritualist. He exemplified the beautiful teachings of Spiritualism in his everyday life. He leaves an affectionate wife and eight children to mourn his loss. Mrs. Lull, inspirational speaker, of Lawrence, Kas., officiated at the funeral and delivered a beautiful and touching address.



O. G. RICHARDS.

Passed to the higher life, December 1, 1896, Mrs. E. Louise Deveran, aged 60 years, after a few short weeks of illness of heart disease. Her death was a surprise to all, more especially to her kind, indulgent, devoted husband, whose greatest wish from their earliest married life was but to restore to health and vigor the frail form of his wife.

A CHARACTERISTIC LETTER.

To the Editor:—Resetved your card. You want me to help you for a good cause. Dont need to talk dat way to me. You help me a great deal more by and with your paper and do me more good than dat silver dollar can do you. Such writes a so-called Dutshman. Here is thy dollar. Dont get many of them per month, but hope to have one for The Progressive Thinker for every year I have to tumble round here yet. The best paper anyhow, and cant be without it any more. As soon as I get rich I will let some more people have it too. Good by. Respectfully, EMIL LOCHER.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew, more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

FIFTY YEARS IN THE CHURCH OF ROME.
A Remarkable Book.

This is a remarkable work by FATHER CHINIQUY. It exposes even to the minutest details the corruption that exists in the Church of Rome. It is a work of 832 pages, and should be read as a matter of history by every Spiritualist. The following is a partial list of the table of contents:

CHAPTER I. The Bible and the Priest of Rome.
CHAPTER II. My first School-days at St. Thomas—The Monk and Celibacy.
CHAPTER III. The Confession of Children.
CHAPTER IV. The Shepherd whipped by his Sheep.
CHAPTER V. The Priest, Purgatory, and the poor Widow's Cow.
CHAPTER VI. Festivities in a Parsonage.
CHAPTER VII. Preparation for the First Communion—Initiation to Idolatry.
CHAPTER VIII. The First Communion.
CHAPTER IX. Intellectual Education in the Roman Catholic College.
CHAPTER X. Moral and [illegible] in the Roman Catholic College.
CHAPTER XI. Protestant Children in the Convents and Nunneries of Rome.
CHAPTER XII. Rome and Education—Why does the Church of Rome hate the Common Schools of the United States, and want to destroy them?—Why does she object to the reading of the Bible in the Schools?
CHAPTER XIII. Theology of the Church of Rome: its Anti-Social and Anti-Christian Character.
CHAPTER XIV. The Vow of Celibacy.
CHAPTER XV. The Impurities of the Theology of Rome.
CHAPTER XVI. The Priest of Rome and the Holy Fathers; or, how I swore to give up the Word of God to follow the word of Men.
CHAPTER XVII. The Roman Catholic Priesthood, or Ancient and Modern Idolatry.
CHAPTER XVIII. Nine Consequences of the Dogma of Transubstantiation—The old Paganism under a Christian name.
CHAPTER XIX. Vicarage, and Life at St. Charles, Rivierre Boyer.
CHAPTER XX. Papineau and the Patriots in 1833—The burning of "Le Canadien" by the Curate of St. Charles.
CHAPTER XXI. Grand Dinner of the Priests—The Maniac Sister of Rev. Mr. Perras.
CHAPTER XXII. I am appointed Vicar of the Curate of Charlesbourgh—The Piety, Lives and Deaths of Fathers Bedard and Perras.
CHAPTER XXIII. The Cholera Morbus of 1834—Admirable courage and self-denial of the Priests of Rome during the epidemic.
CHAPTER XXIV. I am named a Vicar of St. Roch, Quebec City—The Rev. Mr. Tetu—Tertullian—General Cargo—The Seal Skins.
CHAPTER XXV. Simony—Strange and sacrilegious traffic in the so-called Body and Blood of Christ—Enormous sums of Money made by the sale of Masses—The Society of Three Masses abolished and the Society of one Mass established.
CHAPTER XXVI. Continuation of the trade in Masses.
CHAPTER XXVII. Quebec Marine Hospital—The first time I carried the "Bon Dieu" (the wafer god) in my vest pocket—The Grand Oyster Soiree at Mr. Buteau's—The Rev. L. Parent and the "Bon Dieu" at the Oyster Soiree.

We have not space in this notice of Father Chiniquy's work to give the heads of all the Chapters. Those omitted are of especial value. The following, however, are of thrilling interest:

CHAPTER LIII. The Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary.
CHAPTER LIV. The Abomination of Auricular Confession.
CHAPTER LV. The Ecclesiastical Retreat—Conduct of the Priests—The Bishop Forbids Me to Distribute the Bible.
CHAPTER LVI. Public Acts of Simony—Thefts and Brigandage of Bishop O'Regan—General Cry of Indignation—I determine to resist him to his face—He employs Mr. Spink again to send me to Gaol, and he fails—Drags me as a Prisoner to Urbana in the Spring of 1856 and fails again—Abraham Lincoln defends me—My dear Bible becomes more than ever my Light and my Counselor.
CHAPTER LVII. Bishop O'Regan sells the Parsonage of the French Canadians of Chicago, pockets the money, and turns them out when they come to complain—He determines to turn me out of my Colony and send me to Kahokia—He forgets it next day and publishes that he has Interdicted me—My People send a Deputation to the Bishop—His Answers—The Sham Excommunication by three drunken Priests.
CHAPTER LVIII. Address from my People, asking me to remain—I am again dragged as a prisoner by the Sheriff to Urbana—Abraham Lincoln's anxiety about the issue of the Prosecution—My Distress—The Rescue—Miss Philomena Moffat sent by God to save me—Le Belle's Confession and Distress—My Innocence acknowledged—Noble Words and Conduct of Abraham Lincoln—The Oath of Miss Philomena Moffat.
CHAPTER LIX. A moment of Interruption in the Thread of my "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome," to see how my sad Provisions about my defender, Abraham Lincoln, were to be realized—Rome the Implacable Enemy of the United States.
CHAPTER LX. The Fundamental Principles of the Constitution of the United States drawn from the Gospel of Christ—My first visit to Abraham Lincoln to warn him of the Plots I knew against his Life—The Priests circulate the news that Lincoln was born in the Church of Rome—Letter of the Pope to Jeff Davis—My last visit to the President—His admirable reference to Moses—His willingness to die for his Nation's Sake.
CHAPTER LXI. Abraham Lincoln a true man of God, and a true Disciple of the Gospel—The Assassination by Booth—The tool of the Priests—John Surratt's house—The Rendezvous and Dwelling Place of the Priests—John Surratt Secreted by the Priests after the murder of Lincoln—The Assassination of Lincoln known and published in the town three hours before its occurrence.
CHAPTER LXII. Deputation of two Priests sent by the People and the Bishops of Canada to persuade us to submit to the will of the Bishop—The Deputies acknowledge publicly that the Bishop is wrong and that we are right—For peace sake, I consent to withdraw from the contest on certain conditions accepted by the Deputies—One of the Deputies turns false to his promise, and betrays us, to be put at the head of my Colony—My last Interview with him and Mr. Brassard.
CHAPTER LXIII. Mr. Desaulnier is named Vicar General of Chicago to crush us—Our People more united than ever to defend their rights—Letters of the Bishops of Montreal against me, and my answer—Mr. Brassard forced, against his conscience, to condemn us—My answer to Mr. Brassard—He writes, to beg my pardon.
CHAPTER LXIV. I write to the Pope Pius IX, and to Napoleon, Emperor of France, and send them the Legal and Public Documents proving the bad conduct of Bishop O'Regan—Grand Vicar Dunn sent to tell me of my victory at Rome, and the end of our trouble—I go to Dubuque to offer my submission to the Bishop—The peace sealed and publicly proclaimed by Grand Vicar Dunn the 25th of March, 1858.
CHAPTER LXV. Excellent testimonial from my Bishop—My Retreat—Grand Vicar Saurin and his assistant, Rev. M Granger—Grand Vicar Dunn writes me about the new storm prepared by the Jesuits—Vision—Christ offers Himself as a Gift—I am forgiven, rich, happy and saved—Back to my people.
CHAPTER LXVI. The Solemn Responsibilities of my New Position—We give up the name of Roman Catholic to call ourselves Christian Catholics—Dismay of the Roman Catholic Bishops—My Lord Duggan, Coadjutor of St. Louis, hurried to Chicago—He comes to St. Anne to persuade the People to submit to his Authority—He is ignominiously turned out, and runs away in the midst of the Cries of the People.
CHAPTER LXVII. Bird's-eye View of the Principal Events from my Conversion to this day—My Narrow Escapes—The end of the Voyage through the Desert to the Promised Land.

PRINCIPLES —OF— LIGHT AND COLOR.
BY E. D. BABBITT, M. D., LL. D.

A truly great work in which the author exhibits the results of years of research, of a mind devoted to science and truth, highly gifted with keen intuitive insight and the psychic faculty of clairvoyance, enabling him to discover and elucidate facts and principles not observable to ordinary ken. The book is of very great interest and importance, bringing to light many important points concerning light and color in their mental and physical effects and their practical application in the conservation of health and the cure of disease and sickness. Its medical value is beyond estimation, and its teachings should be known by all.

Finely illustrated with cuts and colored plates.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of the distinguished author, speaker and medium,

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

Dr. Foss, Clarksville, Ohio: Q. Admitting that genuine materialization can occur—can a pure African spirit materialize so as to be recognized through the mediumship of a blonde medium?

A. The appearance of a spirit does not depend upon that of the medium, and hence there is no reason why any negro, Indian or Chinese should not appear in the presence of the purest blonde medium if the latter be genuine.

Student, Washington, D. C.: Q. When did Confucius live, and what influence had he on the Western civilization?

A. Confucius was born 551 B. C. according to the Chinese records, but the history of his life must be regarded as a mythical growth of after years. He became idealized by the Chinese into the extreme type of that people, and thereby served effectually to fix their ideas and thought. This was more complete in its influence because of the fixity of the arbitrary and unyielding manner of writing. The characters representing ideas cannot change, and as new ones are forbidden by the scholarship which plumes itself in its exact imitation of the old. Hence new ideas are difficult to express, and there is no advance from the ancient writings or classics.

The disciples of Confucius and those who followed, recorded his sayings, and with them the proverbs and stories which had accumulated before his time. Altogether these form the history of his life and times.

While replete with gems of wisdom, proverbs and sayings, like the early chronicles of every people, the analects, and Book of Great Learning, are filled with puerile ceremonials, and rules of behavior which have been made imperative, and have served as a compress, hard and immovable, and held the Chinese in helpless bondage.

The result has been similar to what that of the Bible would have been had no one been able to express an idea without using its terms, and had not the breaking in of the learning of Greece and Rome emancipated the European mind from its influence.

Thus Confucius has been the controlling influence of the Chinese, but he has exerted no influence directly on Western civilization. Perhaps at the present time, when all religions and beliefs are being studied and compared, he is better known, and has some influence in shaping the thought of the West.

He died B. C. 478. He was disappointed that he nor his doctrines had been received by the great ones of the Empire and his last words, as recorded, are of bitterness and servile pessimism. He said as he sank on his couch: "No intelligent monarch arises; there is not one in the Empire that will make me his master. My time has come to die."

Previously he had murmured:

"The great mountain must crumble;
The strong beam must break;
And the wise man wither away like a plant."

"Humanity:" Q. We have heard about the "Humane Society," and the Band of Mercy, and desire to know more of them as we think this kind of education needed. Where can we gain this information?

A. Write to George T. Angell, president of the Humane Education Society, 19 Milk street, Boston, Mass., inclosing 25 cents to pay cost, and he will send a large parcel of literature on the subject.

This correspondent is correct in saying that humane education is needed. Animals have rights, and if we are cruel to them we shall be cruel to our fellow men. The loving, kind and gentle are alike loving to all living creatures. Bands of Mercy should be formed in every school and Sunday-school in the land. Especially is this recommended to the lyceums, for it is in the direct line of spiritual culture.

"M. R.," Sheboygan: Q. Have the conditions of the physical world any marked effect on the spirit?

A. Most assuredly. Individuals who are influenced to an unusual extent by their surroundings are regarded as nervous—a name covering a multitude of ills for which no other term is at command. A cat entering a room awakens in some the most disagreeable sensations. Another is so sensitive to the electrical state of the weather as to presage the coming change several hours or days in advance. The superstitious observation of the signs arises from the dull understanding or ignorance of this influence. That man is a magnet, and his polarity corresponds to that of the earth, is a plausible conjecture, which receives confirmation by the influence of the earth-currents on many forms of disease. Some patients are so exceedingly sensitive that they can lie at ease in no other position than with their heads to the North.

More especially is the influence of physical conditions shown at death after a lingering disease, which by reducing the strength, makes the spirit more susceptible.

"He's going out with the tide," is a common expression of all rough coastwise people. It may be called a superstition, but it is a fact that the old, infirm, and those with lingering sickness frequently die at the ebb-tide. A physician on the New England coast affirms that in critical cases he feels greatest concern at the ebbing of the tide, and if the patient survives the turn of the tide, he is hopeful of recovery. Of a list of twenty-one cases of death of aged persons or those having been long sick, with one exception all died at the ebb of the tide.

Not that the coming of going of the ocean waves as it rolls around the world has special influence; the cause is more profound. Not only is the ocean agitated—the deeper and more elastic aerial sea is more strongly fluctuated and its electric and magnetic conditions change daily with certain periodicity. The maximum of positive force is attained at high tide, constantly increasing as the tide comes in, and then recedes to the zero of negativeness with its outgoing. With the flood of water, and higher pressure of atmosphere, the forces of life are stimulated by the increasing positiveness. When these stimulants are withdrawn, the tide runs to the negative pole, and the spirit has less hold on physical life.

Man is sensitive to the influence of the sun, the moon and the stars. The influence of the moon in cases of lunacy has been observed from ancient times, and a lunar month measures many of the physical and spiritual functions of life. During health these subtile changes are not felt, or too feebly to be remarked. It is during sickness, when the physical energies are so enfeebled that slight forces turn the balance for or against, that the most palpable effects are produced. There are moon-tides, and sun-tides, and planetary and stellar tides, and at times the magnetic disturbances are greater than others, hence the subject is complicated, but that there is corelation between vital force and its environments there can be no doubt.

A spirit is a harp attuned to respond to the touch of myriad forces. It is placed in the center of these multitudinous energies coming in from every direction. It is sensitive to the touch of the sun, the moon, the planets, and to that of the farthest star that twinkles on the verge of the Milky Way. If the magnetic needle trembles because of a spot on the sun, if the magnetic currents of the earth are disturbed by the slightest activity on the solar disc, can we for a moment doubt that the more delicately ethereal spiritual perception will feel such disturbances? The sweet influences of the Pleiades has more than poetic meaning, and the silvery light of the moon brings on its beams energies to which the spirit responds.

Inquirer, Beverly: Q. What is meant by ultramontanism?

A. By the natural processes of evolution, the Pope, as head of the Church, should be more and more under the direction of the Councils. This early tendency was suppressed by the growing arrogance of Papal power, and culminated in placing in the hands of the Pope absolute and supreme power over the Church, its priests and Councils, and in the statement of its faith, discipline and dogmas.

The acknowledgement of this absolute power and infallibility of the Pope is ultramontanism.

The Ecumenical Council becomes subordinate to the Pope and voices his supreme will.

H. J. Peterson: Q. Why not start postal distributions and libraries throughout the country like some churches are doing? I am willing to distribute all my papers, and will give all my books for a circulating library.

A. This correspondent has made a most valuable suggestion, and one directly practical. The reason why there are no distributing centers of books, periodicals and tracts at cost, as some churches possess, is because wealthy Spiritualists thus far have not been sufficiently impressed with the value of the scheme, and donated funds to its furtherance. The donations to even the weaker churches, aggregate hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars, and regretful to state of those who claim Spiritualism as the heaven of their lives, there has not been one who has given to this purpose. Every book, periodical and tract has been published at the expense of the individual, usually the author, and brought before the public with great sacrifice.

It is not well to wait for large things. Every lover of the cause can do something. When a paper is read it can be mailed to someone else, and one or more extra copies may be taken, or subscribed for, for someone who will be interested. Books may be thus circulated, and, were all to engage in this work, there would be a circulation of spiritual literature which could be gained in no other way. I am fully in the faith that if someone would begin this work they would be sustained, for Spiritualists are generous when their attention is gained, and they realize the necessity. There are at the lowest estimate five thousand readers of The Progressive Thinker who will make presents, with the glad New Year, of at least a dollar's value. If all of these would choose some spiritual book, or send The Progressive Thinker for a year, what an immense missionary work would be accomplished! Five thousand homes made to know what Spiritualism really is, that did not know before! To know what Spiritualism is, is to accept it as the true philosophy of life. A book sent by a friend is read with a different feeling than one purchased. It comes with almost the personality of a letter and bears the delicate perfume of their thoughtful regard. A paper makes fifty-two such visits, every time recalling the solicitude of the sender.

FACTS ABOUT NEBRASKA.

To the Editor:— We have just returned to the land of sunshine and flowers, from a five months' sojourn in Lincoln, Neb. A few years ago Lincoln was a rapidly growing little city, but it seems to have come to a stand still, and bears an air of neglect and decay. Lincoln is the capital of the State of Nebraska; it has a very large lunatic asylum, an immense State prison, and a large number of the finest church edifices to be seen in this country. At a distance of about three miles in every direction the city is surrounded by theological colleges, like outlying forts to protect the city from invasion. Lincoln is really the worst church-cursed community that we have rested in during our travels. It is the hardest locality for a medium to work in that we have ever visited, yet we held numerous meetings during our stay there, and have no complaints to make of our own treatment; but when good honest, true, sincere, lady mediums, such as Mrs. Goodrich, and Mrs. Wagner are, have to submit to the humiliation of arrest, simply for endeavoring to spread the light of Spiritualism, and not violating any known statute law, but upon a trumped up charge which could not be sustained, then we think it time to draw the line. In this connection, we wish to mention Dr. P. S. George, 340 S. 20th street, Lincoln. He it was who assisted the mediums out of their troubles, and today Dr. George holds aloft the banner of Spiritualism in Lincoln, protecting it and its teachers and mediums from the malicious assaults of theological bigotry and ignorance. He is an earnest, sincere worker in the cause; unselfish throughout, and his doors are always open to any mediums who may pass through the place. He never refuses to assist any medium who may call upon him, to the utmost of his power, and he is well and favorably known in Lincoln. Any mediums passing through the place should by all means make the acquaintance of Dr. P. S. George.

Farewell, dear friend, farewell.
Though the day is long and dreary,
When comes sound of "Curfew Bell,"
Let it find our faces cheery,
And our hearts so filled with gladness,
With all the shadows far below,
And not a sign of sadness,
As we on life's journey go.

THE CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A True Story, Written Expressly for the Children.

Dear little children, every week as I pick up the ever welcome messenger of love and progression, The Progressive Thinker, I turn its pages in search of something that will interest the children; but often lay it down and wonder that there were so many worthy, talented articles from the pens of so many master minds, all teeming with food for maturer minds and not a word to the children that are growing up to fill our places by and by, when our days shall have been numbered and we are gone to augment the company of the higher spheres; so I have concluded that if our dear editor of the ever welcome Progressive Thinker will allow me space, I will try and fill the crying need of the hour. The master (or greatest spiritual teacher) said of the children: "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

My address is 39 West Montcalm street, Detroit, Mich. Any of our little readers who shall wish to write me, and will inclose stamp for reply, I shall be glad to hear from them and give an early reply.

When I was a very small girl, I saw many spirit children, birds, dogs, and even some ugly beasts, but as I had never heard of the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism, I did not understand what it meant. My good mother thought I was just a little deranged, and when I saw people and talked with them, she thought I was suffering from hallucination; and when I saw things that frightened me she thought I had fits, and was accordingly sent to bed and given catnip tea or other soothing drinks.

One day I fell ill. I told mother I saw two coffins in the room. As the hours flew by, I grew rapidly worse, until a doctor was called, who pronounced me dangerously ill with scarlet fever. A big red card was nailed to the house.

I can remember little that passed for days, only that I was constantly surrounded by children and older people with bright happy faces. When I was past danger they came to my bed and carried me into the parlor where were arranged several cots, all occupied with members of our family; and then for the first time I learned that every member of our family, even to parents, was sick with the dreaded disease.

They carried me to the cot where lay my youngest sister, and they told me she was dying. Kindly hands of neighbors gently lifted me that I might watch the frail spark of life as it was slowly but surely burning out; for the messenger of death had come riding by upon its pale horse and halted at our door, and cast a pall over our once happy home, and was plucking from the family bouquet one of its choicest buds. I shall never forget that hour. While the tears streamed from every eye in the room, I looked on in speechless wonder at what I saw, for many dear children, and older ones, stood by in shining garments, and they touched her eyes and they gently closed to all earthly scenes, and as they kissed her parched lips, a smile mantled her face and hovered around those lips so rapidly growing cold in death, and a sweet peace filled the whole room.

By and by the doctor said she was dead and they carried me back to my bed, and although a plastered partition was between me and the death chamber, I could still see all that transpired. I saw a woman with a sweet, motherly face advance and tenderly lift the form of my sister and bear her upwards, but, strange indeed, while I had seen her take the small form of my sister in her arms and depart, there she still lay upon the pillow with a smile upon her lips. Some of these strange forms accompanied those who floated upward, while some remained in the room.

Long I lay wondering what it all meant and what those strange people were. I thought they must be angels, but if so, where were their wings? While I still lay wondering what it all meant, they came and told me my brother was dying, and took me to his bedside.

Oh! dear children, just picture being carried again into the chamber of death, where only six hours before I had witnessed the transition of my sister; but how different this scene! My brother, only five years old, was tossing in convulsions. He made one mad leap, as if to gain the floor, with his head thrown back and his arms wildly beating the empty air.

All at once a calm settled over him, and his face, only a moment before so distorted with pain, became beautiful as a marble statue, and his little emaciated arms lay folded across his breast.

The chariot of the King had halted at his bedside and borne his little spirit to his bright home in the spheres.

That was an eventful day in my young life. Two days later, both lifeless forms were placed in a double coffin and laid away in a double grave.

After the mantle of death had been lifted from the home, and we were all able to go to the church and pay our last respect to those dear ones, I often wandered alone down to the springhouse and sat upon the rustic seat where we had so often played together; and as the little brooklet trickled at my feet, I could hear my dead brother and sister talk to me, and often they came with other children and we played together. But when I told my mother about it, she called the doctor and they talked of fits and insanity.

I overheard the doctor say: "If she imagines she sees anything more, we will take her to the asylum; but it seems such a pity, for she is such a bright child otherwise."

So, dear children, I did not dare tell anything more I saw, but every day until the days were too cold I would go and sit on the bench in the old spring-house, and play with the children who came to visit me.

Now, as my story is getting too long, I will close, and tell you more next time. Our story is a true one, occurring in my own life.

MADAME PARCELLS.

VISITS FROM LOVED ONES.

Oft you come at night, my darlings,
When I lay upon my bed,
Touching brow and cheeks and eyelids,
Whispering: "Ma, we are not dead.

"Though you laid our forms away
In the ground, so cold and hard,
Yet about the home we play
Gay as any music bard.

"And we look upon you there,
Father, Mother, both so dear,
And rejoice to know that you
Very soon will meet us here.

"Oh, the grave, it has no terrors—
Nothing there but silent dust;
And while the flowers bloom above it
We are in the old home nest.

"Mother, dear, we hear you pleading
For your loved ones, gone from view,
Yet remember we are with you
And will always prove you true."

WHAT WILL COME NEXT?

THE LUMINOUS SOUL.

Surprising Discovery of a French Scientist in Electrical Fields.

Aided by a Bath He Makes the Spirit Visible to the Eye.

CURIOUS EXPERIMENTS BY WHICH THE PHENOMENON WAS FULLY DEMONSTRATED—MANY OF THE MYSTERIES OF LIFE AND DEATH MAY BE REVEALED.

To the Editor:—A late announcement from Paris, France, to the Chicago Chronicle, is most remarkable, but not wholly unexpected. It appears from the account given that the scientific world there is greatly interested in the claim just made by Dr. Baraduc that he has solved the mystery of the human soul, and can, by the aid of an electro-luminous bath, render it visible to the naked eye. He makes this claim with all the assurance that characterizes the announcement of the discovery of a new physical element or a hitherto undiscovered planet in the world of space. "The human soul moves and is luminous," declares the doctor. "The movement of the soul is proved by the action of the effluvia which escapes from the hands, and which are able, after passing through bodies on which neither heat nor light nor electricity produces any effect, to influence the needle of an instrument known as the biometer.

"Their influence is shown by the manner in which they attract or repel this needle, according to the moral or physical sate of the person upon whom the operation is performed. The luminosity of the soul is proved by the action of these same effluvia upon photographic plates, this action being the more evident according as the deviation of the biometer's needle betrays a more pronounced movement.

"What is most curious is the fact that when the needle is attracted the effluvia leave on the photographic plate an image representing masses of light, which look like long stretches of thick network. On the other hand, when the needle is repelled small whitish spots are formed, which look like flakes of snow; under the influence of the will these spots can be made to come together into any figure desired by the operator.

CAPABLE OF DEMONSTRATION.

"If we place a plate, not under the hand, but on the forehead or chest, we obtain these whitish spots whenever those states of mind prevail which repel the needle, such as anger, joy, terror, physical activity; but when those conditions prevail which attract the needle, such as meditation, anguish, sadness, fatigue, convalescence, we obtain, not whitish spots but thick masses of light. In the former case the vital force takes outward form under the influence of the vibrations of the soul and the accelerated beats of the heart; in the latter case the vital force surges back into the human soul in order to give it new strength and courage."

In order to test the truth of these statements, Dr. Baraduc, assisted by Dr. Maurice Adam, made a very curious experiment recently on a pigeon. The experiment was cruel and will shock all antivivisectionists, but the results obtained were so wonderful that no one who has any faith in modern science can blame Dr. Baraduc for testing his strange theories in this way.

The object of Dr. Baraduc and Dr. Adam was to find out whether an animal, when under the influence of violent emotions, could make an impression on a photographic plate, and, if so, in what manner. The pigeon was fastened on a table with its wings spread out and its feet tied. A plate was then placed over its heart and the room was darkened. Naturally the poor bird was terrified. A minute later the plate was developed and the two doctors noted with satisfaction that a great quantity of vital force had escaped and had covered the the plate with a multitude of luminous spots. The experiment was repeated four times and the result was that the spots gradually diminished in size and intensity and finally disappeared altogether at the moment when the pigeon, having become accustomed to this extraordinary treatment, ceased to even feel the slightest emotion.

PHOTOGRAPHING DEATH.

The next step was to take the bird's life with the object of photographing the different phases of its death. The light from a large red lamp filled the laboratory at this moment and gave it a rather diabolical aspect. The bird was killed and four photographs were taken. One was taken at the moment when the blood began to flow, another at the moment when syncope took place, a third at the moment when the bird drew the last breath and a fourth immediately after death. Of these the first showed flakes of vital force, which had taken an outward form; the second showed a whirlpool of vital force penetrating into the body; the third showed thin clouds of vital force, analagous to the astral photographs of the bodies of dead persons, and the fourth, taken after death, showed absolutely nothing. There is no doubt that the same experiment, if tried on a human being, would give the same results. Proof of this statement, however, is not forthcoming. Eager as we may be to fathom the mysteries of life and death, we cannot very well commit murder for the purpose of attaining our object.

To the question as to what real use are such strange experiments the answer is obvious. One fact is clearly proved by them. The permanent relations which exist between the attraction and repulsion of the biometer's needle and the forms which are registered by the photographic plates prove conclusively the existence of a fluid current in the human body.

THE SOUL IN HEALTH.

When a man is in perfect health this current is in play from right to left, the right hand attracting the needle of the biometer about fifteen degrees, while the left hand repels it an equal or a slightly less distance. When a man is under the strain of prolonged physical or intellectual work both hands repel the needle; there is a loss of vital force, which is shown by fatigue.

During sleep, convalescence and rest both hands attract the needle. An increase of vital force comes to replace that which has been expended. But a current once established cannot be reversed at will. Very often the waste of vital force continues a long time after the physical or cerebral effort is over, of course to the great detriment of the body. There is, as it were, a "flight" of vital force, which is quite as depressing in its way as an actual loss of blood.

Dr. Baraduc set himself to find a way out of this difficulty; in other words, he saw that what was wanted was an instrument by means of which the expansive current could be reversed. If this could be done the physical and cerebral forces could be restored, and if necessary the time required for repose could be economized.

The manner in which Dr. Baraduc treats himself seems to show that he has succeeded in solving this difficult problem. When he finds that his physical strength is not as it should be, he shuts himself up in a small room, from the ceiling of which hang ten electric lights, and there he takes for five minutes an electro-luminous bath, which has the intensity of 320 candles. This bath of light fills his head with life-giving warmth and within an hour he is enjoying a quiet rest.

TRIED IT ON HIMSELF.

The doctor, feeling rather feverish a few days ago, took a bath of this kind. First, however, he found by the biometer that his right hand left the needle motionless, while his left hand repelled it fifteen degrees. This clearly betokened continued loss of strength. Under the influence of the bath the left hand attracted the needle seventy-five degrees, but the right hand still produced no stir in it. Half an hour later the right hand attracted the sixty degrees and the left hand repelled it five degrees. Three quarters of an hour later the right hand attracted it five degrees and the left hand forty-five degrees.

This was what the doctor wanted. He felt at that moment not the slightest fatigue and he knew by his unerring biometer that his strength had been restored by an enormous increase of vital force.

A journalist, M. Henri Desormeaux, who saw the effect of these electro-luminous baths on the doctor, took one himself and found that the effect was exactly as described by Dr. Baraduc.

M. Desormeaux and all others who have heard of Dr. Baraduc's experiments expect still more surprising revelations in the near future. The electro-luminous bath is already known as "the fountain of youth," and the strange stories told by the biometer seem to many persons a clear presage that much more of the mystery of life and death will soon be revealed to modern scientists.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

To the Editor:—After about a half century's practical, earnest work by angel friends, in the improved modern way, it is high time that they were universally recognized.

They have accomplished wonders when we consider the determined opposition from those who have for ages been making a living over two essentials to the general welfare, over which the best people say there should be no competition. We read also that these two great priestly and money monopolies also prevented the useful mediums of Galilee from establishing the divine way of salvation. The people should know that the good spirits, who have had experience in both worlds, tell the whole truth about our heavenly homes for nothing. It is suggested, therefore, that now, as knowledge is more universal, agitation should begin all over the United States to create a great awakening, so that the millennial era may begin in the lifetime of many of us.

It is estimated that there are now enough spiritualized people in each county, in every State, who have the means, and would enjoy the everlasting satisfaction of contributing towards the preparation of two long coaches—one for the gentlemen and another for the ladies—to be used next summer in helping the church to popularize their old basis, from which they have so long departed, because of the corruption of the ages.

The sides of each coach should be used for spiritual education, like the following, or something better: "Add to your faith knowledge of the great cloud of witnesses," to whom every thought is apparent and every motive revealed, for "Are they not all ministering spirits"? Heb., i, 14.

On another side: "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the spirit saith to the churches." This command is recorded seven times in the second and third chapters of Revelations.

On another side could be quoted the verse in John, iv, 1, and Luke, xii, 57, and others. On another side: "There is only one pure, true and divine religion; it is explained in the Acts of the Apostles. The Bible is the best spiritual book. Let all the churches prepare for a pentecostal awakening," etc.

The unity of humanity and the millennial era must be realized together.

If there is room, it might be added: "We are missionaries to elevate, civilize and spiritualize those who are materialized and animalized, and thus prepare the way for one brotherhood—as we are not truly happy until we are useful; and, as many of the clergy admit that they preach the man-made religion only for a living, it will therefore be an easy matter for them to advance."

It is self-evident common-sense that everyone would rejoice to have the positive knowledge that his mother was continually watching over him, whether in or out of the body.

It is believed that those who engage in this work will enjoy the utmost pleasure and delight. If only a few friends in some localities will commence, others will be inspired to join them as they journey along, selling The Progressive Thinker, Bishop Havens' Message to the Churches, and other publications, to pay expenses.

This education will be the seed to so transform the town, that on their return the following year, the various pastors will probably invite some of this Apostolic Band to describe spirits from their various pulpits. It is believed that the discussion of the above plan in every household will bring the desired result.

S. M. BALDWIN.

WHAT IS DEATH?

What is death?
The golden sunset of a day
That's run its course, and like a pale mist
Dissolves and fades away;
The last flickering beam
Of a one-time radiant light
That glowed and sparkled for one brief span,
Then faded into night.

What is death?
The curtain fall on a shifting scene,
Wherein the life was a counterpart
Of some wild dream;
The putting off of tinseled dress
And tasseled cap of clown and fool,
The last good-bye to Experience, the master,
And Earth, the school.

What is death?
The rebirth of the soul
That shoulders its burden and presses on again
Toward the goal;
The meeting of an old friend
Memory, who clasps the hand,
A constant companion ever
In a journey without end.

MOST WONDERFUL BOOKS.

The Warfare of Science With Theology.

A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. By ANDREW D. WHITE, LL. D., late President and Professor of History at Cornell University. In Two Volumes. 8vo. Cloth, Five Dollars. For Sale at This Office.

In these two large volumes are combined information that the reader could not find in the libraries of the world in fifty years. It shows the constant and determined opposition of Theology to the advancement that has been made in every branch of Science. To the Student it is indispensible. Every Free Thought Speaker should have it. It should circulate in every community. It goes into minute details, citing in all cases the authority, showing the persistency of Theology in fighting new and advanced ideas in Science.

"The magnum opus of the eminent ex-President of Cornell plants a new and notable milestone along the highway of ever-advancing human thought. The work is the masterpiece of a mind as devoid of wanton iconoclasm as of moral cowardice. It is a definite statement of where the best thinkers of the world now stand in the religio-scientific conflict. It is clear, honest, brave, and must be given a place among the great books of the year."—Chicago Tribune.

"The most valuable contribution that has yet been made to the history of the conflict between the theologians and the scientists; struggles that have alarmed timid Christians, but, as Mr. White shows, there was no occasion for alarm. The several chapters are extremely interesting, and while President White never flinches in telling the whole truth, as he thinks science has ascertained it, he is nowhere irreverent. He confronts truth, takes its hand, and follows boldly wherever truth bids him come."—Buffalo Commercial.

"The book is written almost colloquially, and so interestingly as to enchain the attention at once, and keep it enchained. Concise as a history of the universe could be made, tabulated so that instant reference to a particular bit of history, theory, or biography may be had, it will be valuable as a lexicon relating to religious controversy. It is crammed with information, sorted, sifted, winnowed, and prepared for the consumer, as reading it is of an absorbing interest, and it will probably provoke answering arguments."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"Undoubtedly the most exhaustive treatise which has been written on this subject. It is able, scholarly, critical, and impartial in tone."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"A literary event of prime importance is the appearance of 'A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom.'"—Philadelphia Press.

These two large volumes, containing about 900 pages, will be sent to any address on the receipt of the price, Five Dollars.

THE SPIRITUAL BIRTH,

OR DEATH AND ITS TO-MORROW.

The Spiritual Idea of Death, Heaven and Hell. By MOSES HULL. This pamphlet besides giving the Spiritualistic interpretation of many things in the Bible—interpretations never before given, explains the heavens and hells believed in by Spiritualists. Price, 10 cents. For sale at this office.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY S. WEIL.

Cloth, $1.25. . . . Paper, 50 cents.

This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and science are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion; that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts. BIBLE MARVEL WORKERS,

AND THE WONDROUS POWER which helped or made them perform mighty works and utter inspired words, together with some Personal Traits and Characteristics of Prophets, Apostles, and Jesus, or New Readings of "The Miracles," by ALLEN PUTNAM. Price 75 cents. For sale at this office.

The Occult Forces of Sex

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER.

This admirable work consists of three pamphlets embodied in one volume, in which questions of great importance to the race are discussed from the standpoint of an advanced social reformer. Price 50 cents. For sale at this office.

A SEX REVOLUTION,

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER,

Author of "Helen Harlow's Vow," "The Occult Forces of Sex," "Perfect Motherhood," and many other works. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

THE KORAN.

Commonly called the "Alkoran of Mohammed." Translated into English from the original Arabic, with explanatory notes taken from the most approved commentators. With a preliminary discourse by GEO. SALE. Price, cloth, $1.50. For sale at this office.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.

IT IS A MOST EXCELLENT WORK.

This work is by DR. M. L. SHERMAN, assisted by PROF. W. F. LYON. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 480 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres. It treats of the Soul of Things; Intelligence in Substance; Animal Intellects; Purity; Salvation; Discords; Good and Evil; Unnatural Ideas; Church History; Progression; Inherent in Substance; The Nebulous Theory; Particles are Entities; Justice; Impregnation of the Virgin; The Science of Death; Spiritual Death; Immortality; Mourning; The Confounding of Language; The Spirit Abodes; Matter and Spirit; Size and Distance; Spiritual Organisms; Born Again; The Key; Spirit Biography; Goes to Heaven; A Slave Master; etc., etc.

The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual aliment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A SPIRITUALIST?

—OR—

Curious Revelations from the Life of a Trance Medium.

—BY—

MRS. NETTIE COLBURN MAYNARD

Together with Portraits, Letters and Poems. Illustrated with Engravings and Frontispiece of Lincoln, from Carpenter's Portrait from Life.

This book will be found peculiar, curious, startling! more so than any work issued since Uncle Tom's Cabin. It breathes forgotten whispers which the rust of time had almost covered, and which have been snatched from the very jaws of oblivion. It deals with high official private life during the most momentous period in American History, and is a secret page from the life of him whom time serves only to make greater, more appreciated, and more understood—"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

Cloth, 12mo, illustrated, pp. 264, $1.50; Paper, 75 cents.

THE ELIMINATOR

—OR—

Skeleton Keys to Sacerdotal Secrets.

BY DR. R. B. WESTBROOK.

Profoundly reverent, but thoroughly radical; expanding the fabulous claims of ancient Judaism and dogmatic Christianity, containing many startling conclusions never before published, showing clearly the mythical character of most of the Old and New Testament stories, and proving that Jesus was an impersonation and not a person. A genuine sensation.

GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE . .

CURES CONSTIPATION!

And Many Liver and Kidney Troubles. It is a Most Pleasant Drink.

Among thousands of testimonials we receive, the following from W. H. Morse, Therapeutist and Consulting Chemist, of Garwood, N. J., speaks for itself:

"Let me commend to your notice the GOLDEN LAXATIVE COFFEE, manufactured at Ayer, Mass., by the company of that name. It is not only a grateful, refreshing and stimulating beverage, relished by all, but, as well it is mildly laxative, health-promoting and thoroughly scientific in composition; in these essentials altogether unlike any other beverage for this purpose. It is well worthy of being brought before the public. W. H. MORSE."

A small package will be sent to any address for 35 cents, and a larger package containing twice as much, for 50 cents. This package will go as far as four pounds of coffee. All can drink this coffee that pure coffee will not agree with, and it DOES cure constipation. State rights for sale to manufacture and sell this coffee. A great money-maker!

REMINISCENCES.

From a Veteran Spiritualist of the Olden Time.

Some Most Excellent Advice Given.

To the Editor:—When you started The Progressive Thinker, and put the price at only one dollar a year, it was thought that its life would be of short duration, and when you commenced to enlarge it, the world was amazed and the Christians declared the Devil was not dead yet.

As time went on your paper continued to improve in many ways, and I now predict that it will continue improving, and when the times improve and your circulation increases, the world will open its eyes when it hears that The Progressive Thinker has reached its hundred thousand yearly subscribers, and its five hundred thousand readers. How oft have I heard men and women say that The Progressive Thinker was food for them, and on no account could they do without it.

Is the world of Christians retrograding or are they growing mad over their failure in not stopping the progress of Modern Spiritualism? Petitions a mile long will flood Congress when it convenes, praying it to place their Bible God in the way of all men and women who will not take the oath of allegiance to their Gods. How many men have we in Congress who will stand firm to principle and deny this petition? No doubt Mr. Cleveland would gladly sign a bill of that kind, and Mr. McKinley, being a good Christian, would not withhold his official hand if Congress passed the law.

What are the Spiritualists and Liberalists of this nation doing? Are they asleep? Do they intend to let this bill become a law, without making an effort to stop it? No, never! Lead us to the front and we will demand our rights and prove to our posterity that we did all in our power to make freedom the password to their independence when they come on the stage of action. Religious liberty is not all we must fight for: if we yield in that, soon the right of franchise will be taken from us, as well as the right to testify in procuring property. This is called a nation of freemen, but its freedom is in the balance, and unless we watch these Christians closely we will become a class of slaves, subject to be dictated to by a host of dogmatic Christians, who even hate us more than they do their Devil.

The Christian world, with the Catholics at the head, are leading on to a moneyed monarchy, and unless the common people stand up for their rights they will ere long be without any.

Spiritualism has up to the present time been sliding along with ease and comfort, but we have been watched with jealous eyes, and until we become more strongly organized, we are liable to be pounced down upon with a power that will crush us down with a living weight that will keep us down for a long time. We are sleeping over a volcano, and we know not how soon it will belch forth and crush us out of existence. In the time of peace prepare for war.

Spiritualism is an innovation in the religious arena, such as has never been heard of before. We have glided along seemingly unnoticed, but there is an undercurrent at work among the Christians that will soon call a halt to our progressive movements. The laws they have passed relative to the practice of our healing mediums, and many other things unnoticed by us, tend to show which way the wind is blowing. And now comes the greatest effort of their lives to crush us out with one fell swoop, in this petition praying Congress to pass a law making their Bible and their God a holy standard to swear by. Eternal vigilance is the watch-dog, to keep on their track all the time, for they need watching or they will steal our liberty from us. The Spiritualists of America are looking to The Progressive Thinker for counsel and advice in all emergencies pertaining to their religious liberty and phenomenal work. It behooves every Spiritualist in the country to keep an eye to windward and watch every movement made by our enemies, for they are slyly at work doing all in their power to undermine us by passing laws that will in the end disfranchise us and destroy our influence for doing good in the world.

The Christians are all united in their endeavors to destroy our influence by blackening the characters of our mediums, in order to find some excuse for arresting them when the time comes for them to do so. Let us all live good and pure lives, and set an example for them to go by. We have all the signs following us that Jesus and St. Paul instructed us in, having the power from high heaven to do the same things that they did, and having the same praises, the blessings of humanity.

The Christians have no right whatever to claim to be the followers of Jesus, for none of the signs follow them, hence they are impostors and their influence should be curtailed as much as possible.

Discontent and unhappiness is abroad in the land, suicides and murders are of common occurrence, and hardly a day passes but we hear through the press of some fearful tragedy almost too horrible to believe.

Have not the Christians had full control of all civil and religious matters for the last eighteen hundred years, and who but they should be held responsible for all the unhappiness that now exists in the family of man?

Much of this unhappiness exists among the Christians, and their prayers avail them not.

Is not Christianity a failure, and is it not about time that it came to an ending?

It has been the custom in the past ages, when or wherever anything new came up that was superior to the old, the old must give way for the new to take its place.

Now in as much as Spiritualism and its religious tendencies are far in advance of anything that the Christians have to offer, would it not be well for them to take a back seat, and let the people see for themselves what good there is in Modern Spiritualism?

Is it not about time that the whole world understood what is meant by the spiritual philosophy? Are we not ready to give them instructions in our heaven-born philosophy and religion? The phenomena that we have among us is a forerunner of what is to come afterwards. Our works are proven of what comes to pass and our religion is seconded by what we bring forth.

The world of spirits is with us, and the fulfillment of the old prophets is fast coming true. These signs shall follow those that believe. Christians, do they follow you? No. Then why not come up to the altar of truth and worship with us and partake with us the good things we enjoy, handed down to us by the holy ones in the spirit-world?

The religion of Spiritualism is no chimera, for it originated in high heaven and is given us for the benefit of humanity. All that we have we freely give, for these gifts are only bestowed upon us for the benefit of others. Christians, why do you pass laws prohibiting the healing of the sick by our healing mediums, when Jesus distinctly said that others coming after him should do even greater things than he did? Why do you stand in your own light and swear eternal vengeance on those who are fulfilling the prophecies that Jesus made? Ar you not a little inconsistent in the stand you have taken in regard to our heaven-born philosophy and its workers on earth, who are joint workers of those on high, who have nothing but good to bestow upon the children of earth?

In this nineteenth century we find the fulfillment of nearly all the prophecies made in the past, and we find them nowhere except among our mediums. Through Spiritualism the world is to receive a new light, and a new religion that will take the place of all others and redeem the world from sin and misery. The angels have bestowed on us their most holy gifts, and it behooves us to make the best of them.

The Progressive Thinker is the dawning light of this age, and its editor is endowed with an excellent mission, and the better he is sustained the more enlightened the world will become. It behooves every Spiritualist and every freethinker that reads The Progressive Thinker to do his duty by getting as many new subscribers as he can. Let every reader do his duty to the cause he loves so well, by doing all in his power to assist in this grand movement that is destined to reform the world. Every Spiritualist who has the evidence of our holy truths should consider himself or herself a stockholder in The Progressive Thinker and make his or her influence felt everywhere.

We are promised better times in the coming future; now let us work for the good of the cause so near our hearts. If we will all do our duty, we can by the first of the near year, double the subscription of our beloved Progressive Thinker, and my word for it, if we do we will be well paid for it in the shape of a larger and improved paper. It is a shame to withold our patronage when every week we get more than ten times the worth of our money in the noble words given us in that best of all spiritual papers.

The Christians are doing all they can to put us down; now let us convince them that we have the best weekly paper published on the continent, and it will soon have at least one hundred thousand subscribers and not less than five hundred thousand weekly readers. Let us work while the day lasts and do our duty to humanity.

Testimonial to Dr. J. H. Randall.

To the Editor:—The Children's Progressive Lyceum which was organized by the energy and persistent labor of Dr. J. H. Randall while serving as lecturer for the First Spiritualist Church of Columbus, Ohio, recently gave a very interesting and meritorious entertainment, at which the following paper was read and adopted by a unanimous vote of the lyceum and the society. In behalf of our worthy brother and the cause he represents, we ask you to publish the same in your valuable paper:

To All Whom It May Concern:—We the undersigned do hereby testify our appreciation and esteem of our worthy brother, Dr. J. H. Randall, and we recommend him as an earnest, active and tireless worker for the cause of Spiritualism. Having served our society, the First Spiritualists' Church of Columbus, Ohio, for three months, and being engaged for a longer period, we unite in saying that while living the truths of Spiritualism he has been a faithful advocate and worker whose services as an organizer of the children's lyceum, and whose lectures pertaining to our beautiful and scientific philosophy and religion have sparkled with flashes of inspirational thoughts of that high order which stamps the individual as a leader, and which must alone of necessity place and keep him in the front rank of our speakers. To individuals and societies engaging the services of speakers we could not recommend a better one.

This testimonial is freely given, because we recognize the superior abilities and exceptional usefulness of Brother Randall to extend the influence of Spiritualism, in which work we, the members and officials of this society, hope he may be kept constantly employed.

CAMP-MEETING IN FLORIDA.

The Spiritualists will hold a camp-meeting at Lake Helen, Florida, 125 miles south of Jacksonville, on the Florida East Coast Branch Railroad, from New Smyrna, to commence February 14, and to close March 31, 1897. This will be the third annual camp-meeting of the Southern Cassadaga Association.

A new auditorium is being built, also a club house, the latter for people to occupy who wish to board themselves.

There are several new cottages nearly finished. The hotel will accomodate some sixty people or more.

I have secured a special low rate by water from New York City to Jacksonville, Florida, for two excursions. The first one will sail January 9, by the Comanche steamship of the Clyde Line. This ship is first-class, and all the appointments superb.

All who go in on any of my parties will have free board and lodgings in elegant staterooms, and the cost of the round trip is so low that many people of limited means can go. I can ticket people through to Lake Helen by this excursion, and they can return singly any time before June 1, 1897.

On arriving at Jacksonville, the party can go direct to Lake Helen by the Florida East Coast Railroad, through St. Augustine, Ormond, Daytona, changing cars at New Smyrna for Lake Helen.

Many people in New England have already engaged passage, intending to visit Lake Helen during the camp-meeting.

Write me early for information (enclosing stamp) of the place, prices of tickets, etc., and I can give you good staterooms. The ocean trip lasts some three days. H. A. BUDINGTON.

of all diseases that flesh is heir to, and will give you proof of her powers, by sending requirements as per small advertisement for diagnosis of your case. Here is one of her many cures:

"St. Louis, June 21, 1896.

MY DEAR MRS. DOBSON:—I herewith enclose $1.15 for another month's remedies for my sister Emma. I can't tell you how much good these medicines do her and how thankful and grateful we are for having applied for them. When she began taking this last medicine, she had considerable distress in the bowels and stomach, but after a week she was relieved and we are convinced if she had not the medicine she would have had a serious sick spell as liver, stomach and bowels were in a bad condition. Now everything seems in good order; still we feel as if more medicine will eventually cure all her ailments. We thank you sincerely for prompt reply, and wish you all the success you so well merit.
With affectionate regards, very truly,

PHILADELPHIA NEWS.

Spiritualists Active and Doing Good Work.

To the Editor:—The Philadelphia Spiritualist Society, under the able administration of Mr. Locke, has been meeting with a very successful season. Moses Hull has been giving us a course of lectures during November, and has left us with many regrets at the parting. As an exponent of Biblical literature, he stands foremost and no one can listen to his lectures and not be benefited.

All good soldiers study the position of the enemy, and to have an explanation of Biblical foundations, in a manner that is both concise and learned, and leaving no doubt as to its validity, lays bare the foundations of the enemy's works and makes them vulnerable to the attacks of spiritual truth. Discussions upon this line attract many people from the church, and they take back with them the truths they have learned, and become a leaven in the old and dried-up loaf of Christian dogmatism, and a light that reveals the true meaning of many manifestations given in the Bible.

The society has also obtained a State charter, which gives us a legal standing and also affords better protection to our mediums and speakers.

During December we shall listen to Prof. Wm. F. Peck, and in January that capable demonstrator of science within the realm of Spiritualism, Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood, returns to us. Many await his coming with the highest appreciation of past efforts.

In February E. W. Sprague will lecture and give mental phenomena and readings. March brings to us Mrs. Helen A. Palmer, and in April we shall have the pleasure of listening to the gifted blind orator, A. E. Tisdale. With this array of talent we have no doubt of being able to carry forward our work successfully.

Our lyceum is doing well and growing. The Progressive Thinker and other spiritual papers are for sale at our door on Sundays, and at our Friday night seance.

CHARLES L. G. FRORER, Secy.

ESOTERIC VIBRATION.

A common topic of conversation, in these days of marvelous mental and spiritual unfolding, among believers in both a reality and unreality of life, is the power and effect of vibration. It is not doubted by either scientists or occultist that in the wonderful simplicity of vibrations lies all the complexities of change in form, which make our earth such a beautiful and glorious home for those who are alive to think the thoughts of the day. But the outer, visible vibration, perceived by personal sense, plainly indicates that an esoteric vibration must also exist as a cause and manifester of the visible.

Have you ever tried to tell what a vibration is, and how it is made? Did you ever formulate an explanation of where the effect begins and what it ends in? Can you tell what part of created things are effected? Did it ever seem plausible to you that there is but one law, and that the law of polarization? Would you believe that the corollary must also assert the existence of but one motion, and that is vibration? Life is vibration and death the cessation thereof.

These and other similar questions, Dr. W. P. Phelon, who has a reputation as a teacher, lecturer and writer on mystic subjects, lucidly discusses, in "Esoteric Vibration," a little booklet, on the lines of The Hermetic Brotherhood, which is just issued. Sent by mail, on receipt of 25 cents. For sale by the Hermetic Publishing Co., 619 Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Ill.

A Good Offer.

Dr. E. J. Worst,

of Ashland, Ohio, will mail any reader of The Progressive Thinker one of his new Aerial Catarrh Inhalers with medicine enough for one year free. He will allow you three days as a trial, then if perfectly satisfied, send him $1; if not, return it to him in the original package. Catarrh, asthma, colds in the head, bronchitis and tuberculosis immediately relieved and speedily cured. Don't pay big prices for worthless inhalers. Address above. 376

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records," Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and will repaid by its perusal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Valuable Books and Pamphlets.

We have on hand a limited number of copies of the various writings and lectures of Mrs. Maria M. King, whose name ranks high in the list of Spiritualist authors, for profundity in philosophic thought. Her elucidations of various questions pertaining to the science and philosophy of Spiritualism, as well as the related field of natural science, are truly remarkable for their depth and clearness. These books and pamphlets constitute of themselves a noble Spiritual library, of sufficient intrinsic value to worthily engage the study and thought of the wisest students in spiritual science.

Although slightly shop-worn, they are in good condition, and we offer them at reduced rates, as follows:

The Principles of Nature, as Discovered in the Development and Structure of the Universe. Material and Spiritual Magnetic Forces. Laws of Spiritual Manifestations and Mediumship. Spiritual Planes and Spheres. Given inspirationally, by Mrs. Maria M. King. In three volumes, 8vo. A remarkable work; among the greatest in the literature of Spiritualism. Price reduced from $1.75 to $1.25 per volume. Postage 12 cents.

PAMPHLETS.

The Spiritual Philosophy versus Diabolism. Two lectures by Mrs. Maria M. King. Price reduced from 25 cents to 20 cents.

Mediumship. A chapter of Experiences. By Mrs. Maria M. King. Price 10 cents.

God the Father, and the Man the Image of God. Two lectures. By Mrs. Maria M. King. Price reduced from 25 cents to 20 cents.

What Is Spiritualism? and Shall Spiritualists Have a Creed? Two lectures. By Mrs. Maria M. King. Price reduced from 25 cents to 20 cents.

Social Evils: Their Causes and Cure. By Mrs. Maria M. King. Price reduced from 25 cents to 20 cents.

The Brotherhood of Man, and What Follows from It. Two lectures. By Mrs. Maria M. King. Price reduced from 25 cents to 20 cents.

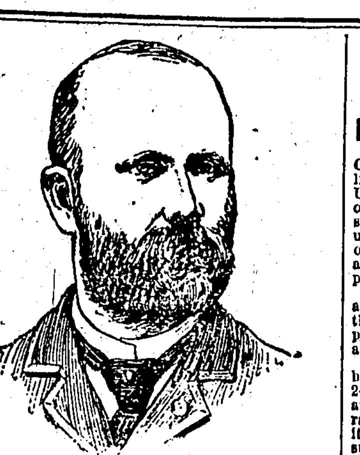
NEW BOOKS.

Scientific Demonstration of Theology, Prophecy and Revelation. By H. B. Bear, Preston, O.

A Biblical disquisition, brief and pithy, of especial interest to those who like to delve in Bible teachings.

From Youth to Age: Adventures in a Varied Life. By D. B. Lovejoy. Authors' Protective Publishing Co., Chicago.

Reads like an autobiography, and is of sustained interest from beginning to end. Incidents and events occurring from boyhood to manhood and old age are related in a realistic style.



Commentaries on Hebrew and Christian Mythology. By Judge Parish B. Ladd, LL.B., of the San Francisco Bar. Truth Seeker Company, New York.

Whoso would inform themselves concerning Hebrew and Christian Mythology, from the standpoint of a radical freethinker, would enjoy this very succinct and able presentation of the subject. The volume evinces much research into Jewish, and other ancient records as well as the writings of Christian "fathers" so-called; and the author plainly sets forth the flimsy foundation on which the Christian church rests. The frauds and impostures connected with the so-called sacred Scriptures are proven by a surplus of evidence. The author's legal training and practice has well fitted him to weigh and sift evidence, and the result of years of patient investigation and study is fearlessly and candidly presented. The volume is a valuable acquisition to radical freethought literature. For sale at this office. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 75 cents.

The Old and the New Ideal. A Solution of That Part of the Social Question Which Pertains to Love, Marriage and Sexual Intercourse. By Emil F. Ruedebusch.

The author would do away with all law concerning these matters so vital to the welfare of society. He is opposed to legal interference. How such a plan could better the condition of mankind is a problem difficult to solve. If matters are bad now, in spite of law, how can absence of law make them better? There is certainly nothing of a moralizing or spiritualizing nature in the mere condition of being without legal restraint. A lawless condition does not change men's natures for the better. If the devil of lust is in them, freedom from law will not cure their obsession or malady, nor lessen the evils of vice. The author's "solution" does not solve the question. U.

PEN-FLASHES FROM THE PACIFIC COAST.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

Does the world move upward? Is this a progressive period? Pessimists say not. Politicians declare that the party coming into power, no matter which, will surely ruin the country. Preachers and a class of conservative students quote a few of the sayings of some of the sages of India, Greece and Rome, and then lapse into a woful prophecy of terrible impending cataclysms physical and social. They tell of Turkish atrocities, of the Cuban war, of unjust Congressional legislation, and of the wicked laws passed by the different State Legislatures. All, everything is on the way to chaos—and the golden age of legislation was in the past.

Was it? Read the following from ancient Rome's famous "twelve tables."

"A foreigner can gain no property in a thing by long possession. * * * If a debtor does not pay his debt when due, the creditor may take him away and bind him with cords or with fetters, which must not be more than fifteen pounds' weight. The creditor may keep the debtor sixty days in jail. * * * A father may kill at its birth a child monstrously deformed. He shall have a right of life and death over all his lawful children, and also of selling them as slaves. If a father sells his child thrice, the child shall afterwards be free from him. * * * He who shall willfully and maliciously set fire to a house or to a stack of corn piled against a house shall be bound, beaten with rods and burnt alive. He who slightly insults another shall be fined twenty-five pounds of copper. If anyone publicly defame another, or make verses to his disgrace, he shall be beaten with a stick. * * * If he break the jawbone of a freeman, he shall pay three-hundred pounds of copper; if of a slave, one hundred and fifty pounds of copper. * * * There shall be no right of marriage between the Patricians and the Plebeians. * * * Virgins may exercise themselves in running, wrestling, and throwing quoits and darts, that their children may be strong. Every child must be examined at birth by the wise men. If it be strong and well proportioned, orders may be given for its education; but if it be weakly and deformed, it shall be thrown into a deep cavern, or killed outright." Some of these later laws are no doubt of Spartan or Grecian origin.

THE BIGOTRY OF UNIVERSALISTS.

Unitarianism stands for liberal religious thought. Unitarians have no established creed, no fixed confession of faith. Unitarianism is not to-day what it was in Channing's time; not what it was in Theodore Parker's time. It is eminently elastic. Many Unitarians are distinctively Spiritualists. The same may be said of their preachers. In brief, Unitarianism stands for liberalism. It is the antipodes of Roman Catholicism. Universalism is a sort of a half way house between them.

Here is an Indiana "whereas," with one of a series of narrow, sectarian resolutions:

Whereas, The Universalist churches and convention of Indiana have been all builded up to their present position upon the theory that the Bible is infallible authority in all matters of religious faith and practice:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Universalist convention that the Circuit Committee and the officers of the churches of the State should use their influence to prevent the employment, by any church in the State, of any minister who is in any way given to the practices set forth in the preamble to these resolutions; and that the Committee on Fellowship of this convention ought not to grant any license of fellowship to any preacher who is not certainly known to be in harmony with the doctrines of our church, and especially a believer in the Bible as an infallible rule of faith and practice in all matters pertaining to the religious life.

And yet, there are Spiritualists paying out their money to build up this little no-hell sect—no hell hereafter, but a bitter, persecuting hell in this world for such as do not believe the Bible to be an "infallible rule of faith and practice," including Solomon's wife business, David's moral leprosy, and Peter's profanity. Universalism is now little more than another name for sectarian conservatism. It has become, in fact, the symbol of bigotry and theological pecksniffianism.

The erudite B. F. Underwood well says of it, in the Freethought Magazine:

"But now, Universalism is conservative; it is averse to innovation; it thinks more of religious 'respectability' than of reform; its preachers, many of them, congratulate themselves on how much they, in contrast with Unitarians, believe, and go beyond the orthodox clergy in denouncing modern liberal thought. The denomination is controlled by a syndicate, so to speak, composed of extremely conservative men, and the tendency the last few years, has been to greater conservatism in the pulpit. Naturally the accessions to the churches are more conservative in character than formerly. It is a waning sect. As a protest against intolerance, injustice and inhanity, and as a reform movement, Universalism has spent its force. It continues to exist now simply as one of the numerous respectable sects of the day with no aggressive tendencies, with no reformatory spirit, with no especial work for it to do."

DR. WILLIAM EDWARDS CALLED TO ACCOUNT.

[Dr. Edwards is medical superintendent of the Kalamazoo (Mich.) lunatic asylum].

Dear Doctor:—Within the past few years I have been called upon to diagnose, or treat, perhaps a dozen patients in the Kalamazoo Asylum; called upon to do so by the friends (Mrs. Whistler, of Allegan, Mich., being the last), of the reputed insane. Accordingly, in justice to my convictions as a practicing physician and of deep studies in the line of psychology, occultism, and the invisible influences surrounding human beings, I feel it my duty to thus personally address you.

It is not for the graceless purpose of criticism, but more for the purpose of suggestion, coupled with the hope that you will study hypnotism and the finer magnetic forces, and so bring them into practical and permanent use in treating the insane, that I fraternally write you.

I am of the opinion that no physician should persume to medically treat the insane, so-called; or, the really insane, unless a close student of psychic research, and an adapt in hypnotism, biology and the psychic influences that necessarily affect human lives for good or ill. Huddling a class of afflicted inmates, pronounced insane, into one great building, where each must psychically sense the vibratory auras of the others, something as thought affects thought; and there dosing them with drastic drugs, is a most potent method for prolonging their mental derangements. To the thinker, to the students, and to the really learned physician, this is patent! How many of the medical professors in the Michigan Asylum for the insane are conversant with hypnotism and its occult laws, together with trance, vision, intuition, clairvoyance, clairaudance, obsession—in a word—rational Spiritualism; which Spiritualism, by the way, underlies all the moral philosophies and all the great religions of the world.

A united materialism, bigotry and ignorance deny the demonstrated facts that prove the reality of these psychic phenomena. Still they occur. They occurred in remote antiquity, they occurred in New Testament times, they occurred in the post- Apostolic period, they occurred during, and were acknowledged by the Alexandrian school of philosophers.

The reign of law is now admitted. Its sweep is universal. The principles, the laws of the universe are immutable; and, necessarily therefore, what transpired in the past, psychically may—and psychically does transpire in the present, modified only by time, national and racial idiosyncrasies. We are surrounded by and enveloped in a realm of unseen forces and intelligences. The clairvoyant sees them. The clairaudient hears them. John upon Patmos heard music in Heaven. This was not imagination, nor hallucination. Nor is it such to-day. Much that is called hallucination is spirit influence, and perhaps of a demoniac character. Invisible agencies affect and obsess at times the more sensative of human beings. This is not new. The late distinguished Judge Edmonds, of New York, informed me that he conscientiously believed that nine-tenths of the pronounced insane were the subjects of obsessing influences from the invisible world. The living in this world may also obsess the living. Jesus of old cast out these obsessing demons. The Apostolic Fathers did the same, the Alexandrian teachers had formulas for demagnetizing those considered deranged. There are eminent physicians in Paris and Berlin to-day who are making use of hypnotism and the psychic forces accompanying Spiritualist mediums in treating the insane, and with the most marvelous success. Are you doing it in the Michigan Asylum? Are you abreast of the times? Have you made hypnotism and the finer soul forces a study? Do you apply the results in treating the insane placed under your care? As an American citizen, as a physician, and as president of the College of Science, California, where these higher, finer forces constitute a large portion of the curriculum, I have a right—aye, it is my solemn duty to ask these questions, and to press—earnestly press—them upon you for consideration. I remain, sir, very truly yours. J. M. PEEBLES.

San Diego, Cal.

Liberalists of all schools and especially Spiritualists should give more attention to the study of hypnotism, suggestion and the potency of the unseen psychic forces.

The power of the hypnotist over his subject should not be thought of lightly or minimized. It has been demonstrated over and over again that the hypnotized person is a very automaton doing deeds and obeying the commands of the hypnotist that he would not do if he were fully and consciously himself. The power of the hypnotist depends upon will, concentration, suggestion and fixedness of thought. Hypnotists maintaining their identity over these in those invisible realms are hypnotists still, and may and do, if they so choose, influence both spirits and mortals. When influencing the latter unwisely, ignorantly or maliciously it is called obsession. Whatever opinions may have obtained in the past, I think no intelligent Spiritualist at present denies the fact, sad as the fact may be.

ANIMAL SOULS IN HEAVEN.

I have never known a scholarly representative Spiritualist to affirm any such irrational, unphilosophical position, as that the brutes and insects of this world exist as such in the spiritual world. I have never known or heard of an independent clairvoyant affirming any such stupid stuff. Patmos John's beast with seven heads and ten horns is not in existence; neither is Isaiah's description of the wolf, leopard, lion and lamb, lying down together and the child playing on "the hole of the asp." If the prophet referred to anything rational in this passage, it was to a millennium on earth. The fact of the weaned child putting its hand into or "on the cockatrice's den," is the proof that the whole affair pertains to this world.

The article of B. F. Underwood in defense of animals and their kind treatment was excellent. I have often tried to impress the same thoughts—kindness to animals—upon my fellowmen. Having only this life as the measure of their conscious existence, they deserve our care, attention and tender kindnesses.

That old-time medium and sage of Berlin Heights, Hudson Tuttle, has written columns upon columns against the idea that lions and tigers, crows and caterpillars exist hereafter as individualized beings. All independent clairvoyants know enough to distinguish between living entities and astral shadows, or make-up automatons to please a temporary fancy.

"Yes;" the objector says, "there's no proof that beasts aspire to immortality." These that say they do, should go to work and prove it. They have the affirmative. To ask a logician to prove a negative is either ignorance, or cheeky impudence. Will some of those who advocate beast and bug immortality question these creatures, hear what they say, and report.

W. J. Colville's band of controlling influences was asked both in private and public, while lecturing in San Diego, if the animals of this world existed in the spiritual world, and these exalted intelligences replied through his organism, no! in language unmistakable.

J. J. Morse, twenty-seven years a magnificent trance speaker and medium for the higher intelligences, was asked, when in San Diego last week, if animals and insects existed in the heavenly world. The spirits replied, no! in terms as unmistakable, as they were eloquent and logical.

But we are gravely told that "animals will cease to thirst for blood in the spirit form," and serpents will no more hiss nor sting. That will be nice! But how does the writer know this? Where are his proofs? Assertions are cheap, and count little in this matter of brute immortality. Yes, it is nice to be told that the tiger will not growl over there, that the adder will not sting over there, that the rattle-snake will not bite over there, that the bed-bug will not crawl over there. Where then is their identity? What hocus-pocus resurrection has so suddenly made all these pests lively?

The San Diego Daily Union, of September 28th, informs us that "Three big rats attacked the two-months-old child of Isaac Asher, Baltimore, Md., gnawing and eating its neck and face and head to such an extent that the child quickly died." Now, if man's identity remains—if men know themselves beyond the grave, rats, if immortal, must also know themselves, taking with them their characteristics and tendencies. Will these spirit rats desire to gnaw the sweet faces of little babes in the beautiful Summer Land?

We must take "our pets with us" to the Spiritual world, say a few Spiritualists. Charles Carson, at the great San Francisco Exhibition exhibited the wonderful powers and pranks of some trained fleas, of wich the Examiner said "he had become very fond." Will he still have those pet fleas—possibly vast bevies of them, in the spiritual world to love and train? Flea immortality!

Low as the Bushmen of Australia are, they are capable of education and considerable civilization. And yet I have seen them catch and eat—eat with seeming relish—the vermin from their own heads. Mice they consider a delicacy. Have these mice and lice immortal souls? Do they exist in the spiritual world?

It is a well-established fact that the lower and grosser the status in the scale of being, the more prolific. Plato died childless. Wayside weeds are exceedingly fruitful in blossoms, while the magnificent century plant blossoms but once in a hundred years. The fecundity of insects is simply marvelous; the apnis, producing by germination, begets some 60,000,000 offspring per year. The common spider produces 200 of its kind at a single brood; the ant of our country, 5,000; the queen-bee lays in one season 500,000 eggs; a single oyster contains, according to Poli, no less than 1,200,000 eggs. The white ant of India produces, during a part of the season, 84,000 eggs each day. This is 2,592,000 in a month. These figures are not fictitious, but solid facts based upon careful observation. And now, saying nothing of unnumbered millions of lions, tigers, hyenas, wolves, hedgehogs, lizards, toads, and slimy serpents that inhabited the earth in the past, think, reflect upon the countless myriads of aphides, oysters, ants, bees, wasps, flies, fleas, stinging mosquitoes and poisonous serpents on earth to-day; and believe, if you can, that they are immortal, destined to exist in the heavenly life. Why, they would form spheres of animals, spheres of spiders, spheres of immortal serpents, and vast concentric zones of stinging mosquitoes, absolutely measureless in extent. And, what is still more unpleasant to contemplate, mortals born into spirit life would be necessitated to wade and wallow through these spheres of insects, these belts of lizards, and zones of spirit serpents, on their way to the angel's home in glory—the summerland of immortality.

But "clairvoyants see animals in the spirit world."

Quite likely. So they professedly see ships approaching us laden with gold, see oil-wells where there is no oil, lead-mines where no lead exists and psychological pictures that have hardly a shadow of reality in them. When clairvoyance proves itself infallible, it will do to place in it implicit confidence. Clairvoyance should never be confounded with psychological presentations.

"But spirits say there are animals in the spirit world." Certainly they do. And other spirits occupying different planes and more exalted conditions, say emphatically there are none.

Certain spirits earth-bound say anything and everything. The way to stop the return of lying spirits is to stop sending them over there into the other life.

That there is a higher order of animal life, and birds of beautiful plumage, in certain spheres of the hereafter life, is plausible enough; but if so, they are indigenous to those sphere, and not the products of earth's grossness and beastliness. Angelic affections flow out to little children, glorified souls, and the Christs of the ages, rather than to insects and animals.

Flies, as physicians and naturalists know, are carriers and conveyers of the contagious germs of disease. They are also attracted to bald-heads and housewives' pies. A fly will produce 5,000 larvae at a laying, each of which very soon produces 20,000 more. From spring to autumn a single fly, says Linnaeus, will produce 2,000,000. The question is, have these countless sextillions of flies—of pests, immortal souls existing in the heavenly world of progress? Think of it—fly immortality—fleas leaping and flies buzzing about in the "angels home in glory!"

Have beasts, brutes and insects immortal souls? Soul, as defined by standard dictionaries is, "the principle of mental and spiritual life; the part of man's nature that is especially characterized by the attributes of self-consciousness, personal identity, moral reason, conscience and the higher emotions." Have animals, and insects the "attributes of personal identity, moral reason and conscience?" No one has affirmed, or attempted to prove it. Who ever heard of a virtuous wolf, a religious dog, a benevolent hyena or an honorable conscientious cat? And yet, these are among the qualities constituting the immortal soul. Have animals then immortal souls? Verdict—unproven!

Prove then that these lower orders of beasts and bugs have immortal souls, before you talk or write of their continued and conscious existence. If anyone says they aspire to immortality, prove it.

The soul—the divine inmost of man, desiring and capable of endless progression, is of too much importance to cease to exist; while beasts that bellow and insects that sting are too unimportant to exist in the spiritual world. So far as we know brutes and birds exhaust their possibilities in this world. Not so with man. His possibilities, his aspirations to live forever are prophecies of his grand endless unfoldment in the infinite hereafter.

There is not a shred of proof that animals clairvoyantly see animals in the spiritual world. If they do, let them intelligently so testify; or write books proving it. Because a cat "rubbed against what seemed empty space," "playing around a grave," and was found "stretched thereon dead," the question is solemnly asked—why "the cat died there?" Doubtless because she had a convulsive fit, and didn't know enough to find catnip to eat.

Women that advocate the immortality of pug dogs and poodle dogs with the fleas that bite them, had better transfer their affections to little babes, and beautiful children that have within them the prophecies of immortality and infinite possibilities. If they have no children of their own, let them find, feed, clothe, and educate poor orphan children—and let the dogs alone!

When toads, serpents, hawks and butcher birds—creatures of the lower kingdom die, earth goes to its kindred earth, and the spiritual substance constituting their spiritual structures reverts to, and is absorbed in, the surrounding ocean of spirit substance to form material for other and higher organism. Man has one more top story, the moral and divine, than insects or brutes. He alone defies death!

That there possibly are, in the to us invisible realms, what corresponds to animals and pets, is very probable, and to a class of earth-bound unspiritual spirits, they are doubtless real, just as a rag doll is a real babe to the child.

Just as musicians continue their music, and poets their poesy in spirit life, so no doubt but that mechanics of this world will for a time, out of kindness, manufacture "poodle dogs" and pet brutes and "trained flees" for those who on earth loved them so, and these are doubtless what dependent clairvoyants see.

No independent clairvoyant ever saw animals in the spiritual or heavenly world. This is true from Hudson Tuttle down along the years to W. J. Colville, and other intermediaries, controlled by wise spirits ancient or modern. There is not a particle of proof that animals and insects have immortal souls endowed with self-consciousness, moral reason and conscience. There is no proof that they could serve any moral use in the spiritual world. There is no proof that beasts, bugs and all species of insect life do not exhaust their possibilities in this world. There is no proof that they have the moral and spiritual natures of men and angels. There is no proof that they desire a progressive immortality of existence.

As compared with man they are imperfect structures, arrested developments, unfinished arches, incomplete temples, hence have no conscious individualized and morally constituted souls, yearning for immortality and eternal progression. No logician, no scholar would be so illogical as to affirm of a part what he would of the whole. The human soul—and the human soul only, allied to the Infinite Over-soul as a crystal drop to an everflowing fountain, is a divine entity, in which lie the germinal possibilities and prophecies of man's angelic destiny. Those who desire to controvert my positions and advocate bug and beast immortality, I turn over to the tender mercies of Hudson Tuttle. I leave to-morrow, December 1st, for San Francisco on my third tour around the world.

RECEPTION TO J. J. MORSE.

This distinguished Englishman (that Americans own a large corner lot in), thinker, writer, speaker, having finished his year's engagement with the San Francisco Psychical Society, visited by request San Diego, delivering two masterly lectures.

For vigor of thought, for clean, crisp logic and profound argument, I've never heard these lectures excelled. They ought to have been heard by the reputed 3,000 Spiritualists of San Diego; and yet, a majority of these would sooner run after a mystic rap, see a table lift its legs, or pay fifty cents to witness a sleight of hand performance than listen to a sage from the Heavens. It is their loss, not mine.

This sensitive and finely-tuned intermediary, Mr. Morse, is influenced—controlled by a learned Chinese sage of ancient Cathay. And be it said to his praise, he acknowledges his guidance—his helps from the dwellers in these higher homes of immortality. The members of the First Spiritualist Society gave him an elegant reception, consisting of a welcome—speeches, recitations, music, toasts, responses, a Shakspearean reading by Mr. Ravlin—and tables loaded with ice-cream, cakes and fruits. The hall was beautifully decorated by the ladies. The whole occasion was most enjoyable. Everybody was happy. Mr. Morse's closing remarks, after the departure of his angel guide, were exceedingly well conceived, breathing the fraternal spirit of sympathy, and good will. He leaves behind him a host of friends in California. In his addresses he several times called me his "Spiritual father," referring to my personal kindnesses to him in his early days of mediumship—and while on my lecture tours in England and Scotland. I have a large family of spiritual children; and while esteeming them all, there is no one of whom I am prouder than of J. J. Morse. He needs no praise, no words of commendation. Unassumingly he wears his laurels. Departing from our shores, as he will in a few days, we can only say, our loss is Britain's gain.

N. S. RAVLIN.

Every Sunday increases Mr. Ravlin's audiences. He is a magnificant platform orator. His Shakspearean readings are as grand as matchless; and the more one listens to his fervid, stirling, uplifting eloquence, the better he likes the man. While destructive on the lines of the theology, he is constructive, and the truth of Spiritualism may be proud of him as an advocate. He is clairvoyant, besides being blessed with other spiritual gifts. But what a leap, from thirty years a Calvinistic close-communion Baptist preacher, into the knowledge, the wisdom, and the ecstatic glories of Spiritualism! Long may he live to storm the castle of the old and build upon its ruins the temple of eternal truth.

In a few days, December 5, I sail for Honolulu and so on around the world. I leave only sunny memories behind me. Peace and good will to all.

SELF-KNOWLEDGE

An Open Book to Human Understanding.

Shall we know each other there?

This seems to be the great question asked by all peoples and in all ages.

What satisfaction would it be to us to know that we live after the change called death, if we could not also feel that we shall know each other? Would not the future life appear to us an unending season of banishment, to last on and on forever, and we exiles, as it were, on some far-off desert, and would not our present existence seem a heaven in comparison, in spite of its cares and sorrows?

If Spiritualism proves a continuity of life (and if it does not, then we have no proof), it also proves that we shall know each other, and shall know also as we are known. I may shock the incredulous perhaps who have no knowledge of the higher thought of mental science, when I assert that we may not wait for our final dissolution to take place before we learn this. We can know each other here, as well, and be cognizant of the motives and intentions of each toward the other, if we make a careful study of mentality; for mental science teaches not only the way to health, but the way to all truth, and we can know each other's thoughts and motives, and see, not through a glass darkly, but face to face, in this life as well as in the next.

Get a right understanding of self and all these things will be revealed to you plainly and unmistakably. Mental science teaches this to all who will make it a study. This will not only apply in a spiritual sense, but in a material sense also, in the everyday walks of life, in business, friendship, and love affairs.

You will not say, when you enter into a business contract, "I don't know but I am wrong, but I think I have a right estimation of this person; however, time will tell." Your will know your man when you stand face to face with him, for you will be able to read his thoughts and intentions—for thoughts are things, and mental science is the talisman that opens up to you the meaning of them. The lover will then have no doubt concerning the sincerity of the one beloved, but will be able to read the inmost heart.

I would like to impress upon every poor soul who is struggling with the errors of life, the importance and help to be derived from the study of this holy science. I say holy, for it is holy. It makes a person whole, complete in all things; even a slight knowledge of its teachings will be a certain help to everyone who looks into it prayerfully and trustingly. It is a help to the poor man struggling for the daily bread to feed the mouths of his little ones. It is a help to the overworked and tired mother, trying so patiently to bring up her little ones as best she can. It is a help to the man of business, whose brow is furrowed with the lines of care and perplexities that always attend such. It is a help to the brother and sister and every member of the home circle; even the little child feels it, for it carries healing wherever it goes. It is a help to the prisoner and to the unfortunate and wayward, for it teaches them the way to a better life, and that the only true happiness is in right living. In fact, it teaches us all the true way to happiness, and happiness is what every soul is seeking.

'Tis true these conditions cannot be reached in a day; it is an upward growth to which there is no ending, and the longer we study, the clearer will be our understanding of all things in life. It is an upward climb, and happy indeed is he who has the better knowledge of this science for his power over all things is greater.

AUGUSTA FRANCES TRIPP.

PERTINENT, PRACTICAL.

Reminiscent and Prospective Suggetions,

For Spiritualists to Consider and Fulfill.

To the Editor:—I have dropped into a reminiscent mood, and have been overhauling the log-book of memory, beginning when I was (as I am yet) a "high private" in the unpopular army of progress, which was fighting its way, contesting the field step by step against the solid phalanx of old orthodoxy.

And what an army we had to meet. The pious deacon with his "awkward squad"—the pulpit orator with his disciplined company—the bishop with his regiment, even to the assumed sucessor of St Peter with his legions of purblind adherents. Their catapults hurled the grossest falsehoods, and the vilest epithets that would most effectually appeal to the prejudices of the masses of the people blinded by ignorance and superstition.

It was before the higher criticism had euphonized Hell to Sheol, and the Devil was still going about like a roaring lion seeking to devour all who proclaimed the final overthrow of his power, and the triumph of good or God.

The lake of fire and brimstone, though cooling off somewhat, was still hot enough for all practical purposes, and the material for paving hell was still being consigned occasionally to that place by the most bigoted worshipers of John Calvin.

Another wing of the army was composed of camp-followers—those who hung upon the skirts of the churches for popularity—for standing in society. This class is by no means extinct yet. All of these were doing battle openly.

But the noble army of progress had other foes to fight. They were those whose baser passions and lusts had been kept in subjection by the fear of Hell. They were willing converts, or professed to be, to the doctrine of the continuity of life beyond the grave without hell. The fear thus removed, they gave loose rein to their passions, and, joining the army of progress, gave its enemies an excuse for asserting that Spiritualism and free-loveism were synonymous terms.

But a change has been gradually wrought in the tactics of war. Comparatively few of the better class of clergymen attempt to storm the batteries of the new philosophy. The secular press, as a whole, is becoming much more tolerant, and many journals are ready to publish articles that really favor the philosophy, but without reference to the name. All right. We bid them God speed.

The growth of the army has been such that those who now join it have little difficulty in stemming the tide of religious bigotry and intolerance. A man or woman can now manifest a strong tendency to liberality and still not be ostracised or boycotted.

But there is a wide-spread undercurrent in this direction that would astonish the staid old orthodox and the secular press if they were made to realize its full exent.

This liberality of religious sentiment is held by members of nearly all denominations. They have covertly gained and quietly enjoy the knowledge of spirit return, but for various reasons, according to their several environments, and their socialities, maintain their formal relations with the church. Their influence and their money go there, but they stand on neutral ground, and neither help nor hinder us.

But the army of progress is not yet to be disbanded. And it never will be. So long as the might of truth and the laws of progress prevail, so long the army will continue to increase, till the enemies of human brotherhood are vanquished.

But the time is approaching for a grand review. The close of its first semi-centennial and the beginning of its second will undoubtedly be celebrated in a manner and with zeal becoming such an event. What better or more opportune time for this work than the closing year of its half century of work in the field of reforms?

I come now to the real purpose of this writing. It is to suggest that, during the fiftieth year of the life of modern Spiritualism, an organized, or, at least a concerted movement be made throughout the length and breadth of the land to rid the army of progress of all who are not genuine media, but profess to be.

Let every organized society either through its officers, or by a committee appointed for that purpose, or as a committee of the whole, take measures to ascertain the true worth, both moral and medial of all who are not well known and of established reputation.

When those are found, be they male or female, who are unworthy to bear the banner of progress, an effort should be made to protect the public against their swindling works, by exposing them until they find "it doesn't pay," and they will "cease to do evil" in that line of operations.

I am aware that it will be a difficult and delicate undertaking in many cases, and great care and precaution must be exercised to see that no injustice is done to any worthy medium who is in process of unfoldment. As all fakes and mountebanks are "in it for what it is worth," the surest way to rid our ranks of them is to make it unprofitable.

We have too many phenomena-hunters—too many who are apt to patronize these wandering fakirs who advertise their wonderful powers—drawn there by curiosity. By doing so they but set the example for those who are earnest investigators, and they, of course, are not profited by following the lead of those who are known in community as Spiritualists.

Let every true Spiritualist appoint himself or herself a committee of one to do his best till March 31, 1898, to make fake mediumship pecuniarily unprofitable. A. S. HINKLEY.

NEW CHRISTMAS HYMN.

Set the bells of heaven ringing—echoing from the shining shore,
For the Christ of love and light is come, to reign forevermore.

Long has man in darkness wandered, groping anxiously for light,
Scarce a ray of hope to lead him from the gloom of Error's night.

Look we far among the peoples, viewing scenes of human life—
All the sadness of existence, all its bitterness and strife.

Troubles press the weak and weary, anguish wrings men's hearts with pain,
And the wail of souls afflicted swells to heaven in sad refrain.

Sickness, sorrow, pain of parting from the dearest ones we love,
Fill our hearts with keenest anguish, and our cry is sent above.

Loved and loving—hated, hating—all alike in death must fall;
Over each—the high, the lowly—spreads the mantling mortal pall.

Death appears as robed with terror, hurling his unerring dart,
Striking down, alas! the dearest and the nearest to our heart.

And, by Error's teachings guided, we cry out against our fate,
Viewing Death as fearful monster whom no sacrifice can sate.

In our haste and in our blindness, oft in sadness have we said:
Better that we live in darkness than be numbered with the dead!

Now a light is shining 'round us—lo! the angel world is here!
Death is shorn of nameless terrors—spirit loved ones now appear.

Angel friends have built a ladder from the mortal to the skies,
And, descending and ascending, fill our souls with glad surprise.

Lo! the night of gloom is ended, banished by the light of day.
And the brightness of the glory melts the shadows all away.

For the angel hosts are with us, in our homes and in our hearts:
O, the glory of their presence! the sweet joy their love imparts!

With our vision now enlightened, look we o'er life's stormy lea:
Now no more the King of Terrors—Death the Beautiful—we see.

Heaven is with us in our sadness—we behold with clearer sight:
Death's not sinking into darkness, but a rising into light!

Lo! kind Nature's voice is calling to the spirit: Come away!
Let the dust return to dust—the clay return to kindred clay.

Lo! the angels are around us, and we hear their song again:
Light is come with joy and gladness: Peace on earth! Good will to men!

Set the bells of heaven ringing—echoing from the shining shore;
Death is but a passing onward! we shall live forevermore!

Set the bells of heaven ringing—echoing over land and sea,
Ringing out the night of sadness—ringing joy that man is free.

Ring the bells of earth and heaven, notes of gladness sweet and clear,
Till the echoes of the chorus float from shining sphere to sphere.

Ring the joy-bells of the heavens—let the joyful earth agree,
For the Christ of love and light is come—the Truth has made man free.

Set the bells of heaven ringing—echoing from the shining shore,
For the Christ of love and light is come to reign forevermore!

GUARDIAN ANGELS.

With us in our wanderings;
With us when we rest;
Ever waking thoughts most holy,
Purified and best.

Roaming where'er we may,
O'er the sea or land;
Ever strengthened, led and guided
By a helping hand.

Ministering angels now
Are the glorified;
Heavenly comforters are those
Whom we say have died.

Watchful care they give us now,
Tender love bestow,
Drawing nearer, nearer heaven
Helping us to go. —Selected.

Public sentiment powerfully restrains men from doing wrong; but when they have done wrong, sets itself as powerfully against them.—Beecher.

SKEPTICISM OR FAITH.

What It Does for the World.

Some of the Many Sacred Superstitions and Harmful Errors Exposed.

Skepticism has been one of the most alarming specters and terrifying apparitions of the church in every age of the world. Not a skepticism of the divine parentage of man, nor of the infinite goodness and love of God, nor of the pure moral precepts of Jesus, but a doubt of the total depravity of man, the anger and vengeance of God, the infallibility of the Bible, and of the illogical and irrational dogmas and ordinances of the church. Skepticism has always been stigmatized as the satanic mother of "heresy" and "infidelity," which have ever been denounced as the greatest of crimes, and the most worthy of persecution or of death. And yet there is no proposition in mathematics which can be so conclusively demonstrated as the fact that skepticism has been one of the most potent and efficient factors in the salvation and progress of the world. The skepticism of honest and thoughtful men, as to the divine right of kings and of priests to "exercise authority over us," has already begun the great work of emancipating the world from their domination, and establishing the jubilee era of civil and religious and personal liberty.

SKEPTICISM.

To skepticism we are indebted for our emancipation from that sacred system of "revealed science," declared by the fathers of the church to be "the sum of all knowledge." That sacred system of revealed science represented the Almighty source of causation as a gigantic and anthropomorphic king; and the natural formation of worlds and all other organisms, as the mechanical products of a royal "designer" and "architect." It was interpreted to teach that the earth was a flat and stationary plain, and that the sky was stretched over it "like a skin," in which the sun, moon and stars "ran their daily circuit round the earth," that the earth was "made" out of nothing, and, with man and all its plants and animals, was finished and completed in six literal days.

A WONDEROUS PLAN.

Above the sky was the future heaven of ecstatic bliss, while below the earth was the lake of fire and brimstone and the excruciating tortures of an endless hell. That "revealed science" also taught the unnatural philosophy that man was first made upright, pure and wise, but by eating a forbidden fruit he at once "fell into the lowest conditions of savagery, and with his entire posterity into a hopeless state of total depravity and death. In that awful condition, man's only claim and inheritance from his maker was the endowment of a wretched immortality in the fiery billows of hell. But foreseeing and foreknowing the weakness and "fall" and consequent ruin of the human family, man's mechanical "designer" and "creator" had predevised a "wonderous plan" for the partial salvation of the smallest possible percentage of his descendants from the wreckage, but long ages thereafter were required for its full and complete consummation. In the meantime, countless millions passed away and below into their "inheritance," so that "hell's every wave broke on a living shore, heaped with the damned like pebbles." This "wonderous scheme" provided for the murder of an innocent and just man by "wicked hands and murderers," and that every believer in the efficacy of the murder and blood of that innocent man to wash away the "original sin" and curse should nominally and partially be restored to his primeval purity and uprightness.

THE WHITE WINGED ANGEL.

Skepticism and doubt as to the correctness of the various points in this wonderous system of "revealed science has been the direct cause of all the civil and religious liberty of the world, and of all of the discoveries of natural science and of pure religion, and of all the human elevation and progress of the world. We can safely conclude, therefore, that skepticism has been the brightest harbinger of good will and the whitest-winged angel of hope and salvation that has ever descended from God out of heaven to this earth. And if it is ever proper to predicate "the favor of God" upon any matter whatever, the results of skepticism fully justifies the assertion that "God has smiled" upon the legitimate work of the "skeptic" far more than he ever has upon the legitimate work of "the church."

DIVINE REVELATION.

Nothing can be more evident than the fact that if any Bible, or any system of government, or of religion or science, is a "divine revelation," and from a Being of infinite wisdom, it must be as absolutely perfect and unchangeable as the laws of nature and the forces which maintain the wonderous harmony of the starry heavens. Such a "revelation" must necessarily be intolerant of any contradiction or skepticism. It must necessarily denounce every effort to modify or change it, and regard as impious and sacrilegious every movement or advance upon it. It must also demand implicit faith in its absolute perfection, and in its unqualified acceptance; and "faith," being founded upon the unchangeable past, must in its very nature be also unchangeable, unprogressive and stationary.

SANCTIFIED SUPERSTITION.

The dark cloud of sanctified superstitions, of sacred ignorance, and of civil and religious despotism which cursed and blighted the earth during two-thirds of the Christian era, when faith was dominant and triumphant and "skepticism" was banished from the earth—is the darkest and most hopeless period of the world's blackest history. While faith most stubbornly resisted, skepticism quietly persisted in its investigations, until the laws which govern the sidereal heavens were discovered, and the harmonious action of the solar system and the stellar universe rationally accounted for and fully explained. Skepticism has made the earth a satellite of the sun and a minor member of the solar system, instead of being the stationary center of the starry heavens, according to "revealed science" and its indurated "faith." Against the direful maledictions of "faith," it has most clearly shown that the only possible "fall of man" from his undeveloped and savage ancestors has been a slow and gradual "falling upward," or a constant progression from a lower to a higher plane.

It has established the universal reign of unchangeable and natural law, which has forever banished any possibility of the supernatural and the miraculous, as perpetuated from the idolatrous and barbarous ages by faith.

NATURAL SCIENCE.

Science, consisting exclusively in knowing the ways and methods and philosophy by which the almighty energy produces phenomena and effects, it follows as logically as day the night, that the skepticism of natural science, and not faith, has discovered and revealed the only living and true God.

The great volume of nature, with all its wonderous products and infinite sources of knowledge, cannot be the work of man's wisdom or device, but is entirely the work of that almighty energy or vital force which the uninformed personify and call God. From that manifestation of its methods and ways, we only can learn what that eternal source of causation really is and must be, and what it is not and cannot be. And that unbiased volume attests the fact that while there is a supreme power, there is and can be no supreme being or personal God; that there is an omnipotent, ubiquitous and inorganic vital force, but no personal and local deity, to which it is as absurd to impute the likeness and passions of men as it would be to personify and ascribe human attributes to the sun. Jesus, the first great iconoclast and skeptic of bibliolatry and the orthodox beliefs of his day, discovered and proclaimed that the God they ignorantly worshiped was "spirit," or a vital power which tended to a universal rightness, order and harmony in all things.

THE VITAL POWER OF SPIRIT.

That vital power or "spirit" which Jesus discovered is the all-pervading life of the universe, and is everywhere equally present, for it is in all and through all, and is that in which we life and move and have our being; so that "we are its offspring." That there never has been and never can be the least change in the ways and methods and operations of that eternal spirit, either by request, entreaty or petition, and that those ways and methods are fixed and uniform or natural laws in which there "is neither variableness nor shadow of turning" is proof conclusive that the "spirit" is not personal or anthropomorphic in any sense whatever. The very starting point of all the pernicious errors and sacred superstitions of every system of religion since the world began, is that sacred relict of idolatry which still believes that God is an anthropomorphic and personal being. There is one significant fact to which the general attention is seldom ever directed, and that is the well-known fact that every system of idolatry known to history has been based upon the unscientific and barbarous idea of a personal god. And the quasi semi-civilized and barbarous system, in many respects, of which Moses is the reputed founder, is not an exception, but a proof of that fact. That a "personal deity" is of idolatrous origin, and marks the dividing line between irrational paganism and its superstitions, and the enlightenment of rational and natural science, no one can successfully deny.

To illustrate the darkening and pernicious influences of that false idea, I have only to state that the president of a college once affirmed from a Salem pulpit that, "The world is a complicated machine, whose motive power is not found in its belts, its shafts, or its wheels; neither is it found by following them up to the huge piston rod which propels all these; for before you can discover the motive power that moves them all, you must go to the other side of the wall where hidden from sight lies the immense steam boilers and there you will find the mighty power that moves it all." And such childish and pagan philosophy is the "spiritual force" most usually given from the pulpit as theological science. But when this learned professor leaves the pagan rostrum and takes the chair of philosophy, he will doubtless tell his class that the earth is not a machine, but an organism, which is constantly controlled in all its movements and operations by the sun and by inherent properties and vital forces; and that the planetary system has no analogy to a sawmill, and is not "run" by belts, shafts and steam boilers, but by indigenous, inherent and persistent forces, which make all things self-propelling and without danger of stoppage.

In the pulpit he would follow the pagan explanation of volcanoes and earthquakes by teaching that "Elohim toucheth the mountains and they smoke;" and that "Jehovah looketh upon the earth and it trembleth." But in the professor's chair he would tell his class that while the Bible explanation was quite poetic and metaphorical, that such causes were as inadequate and unadaptable as the beating of tomtoms by the savages to dispel an eclipse of the moon.

It is very evident to the thoughtful mind that the pernicious effects of teaching such false and unscientific paganism to our children and the feeble-minded is beyond estimate, as it keeps the thoughts and ideas of the people still lingering in the very lap of pagan idolatry and sacred superstition.

Skepticism has only "begun" the blessed work of emancipating our country from the damnable tyranny of superstition and idolatry. Hindered and retarded by the unprogressive nature of "faith," in these sacred relics, the "Christian world" to-day is but little better than half barbarous or semi-civilized.

But the day of reason and of liberty dawneth when the anthropomorphic "gods many" of idolatry and the sacred superstitions of our pagan ancestors shall be gathered to their tombs with their co-ordinated moles and bats. Amen. So mote it be. S. C. ADAMS.

ARENA PUBLISHING COMPANY.

On petition of the creditors of the Arena Publishing Company made Oct. 1, 1896, before Judge Dunbar to appoint a temporary receiver, A. D. Chandler, Esq., was appointed for the protection and adjustment of the interests of the creditors during a reorganization of this company. The officers of the company did not contest the petition, feeling that it is for the best interests of all parties concerned as an equitable plan pending the business changes to be made.

The Arena Company will be recapitalized by experienced business men and placed in new hands and on a firm financial basis, the magazine to be an open court for the promulgation of all authoritative and important opinions.

The business of the Arena, both as a magazine and as a book-publishing house, has had quite a phenomenal growth, but had not sufficient capital to handle the business into which it had developed. With the reorganized company the Arena will be enabled to extend its growth and add to its reputation now so well established, in the success of which all readers and thinkers feel a personal interest on account of the national influence which this publication has attained.

I CURE FITS

When I say I cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS a life-long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

Timely Thoughts, and Good, Practical Suggestions.

President H. D. Barrett Sends a Christmas Present to Spiritualists.

To the Editor:—The year 1896, S. E. 49, is near its close, and with the approach of the glad holiday season, Spiritualists can well afford to pause a few moments to glance in retrospect over the year now lost in the ocean of years in the past. At the last holiday time, when festivities of all kinds were rife, when enjoyment was at its height, no doubt many good resolutions were formed with the full intention of carrying the same into effect with the new year that was then dawning. Festivals, socials, Christmas entertainments, etc., are again in order. King Carnival is holding High Court, and millions of his subjects are rejoicing, from one side of the globe to the other. The people are forming resolutions for better lives and nobler purposes, as they did one year ago, hoping that they may be able to carry them into effect during the coming twelve months.

How many of us have lived up to our holiday resolutions of one year ago? How many lives have we brightened with some little deed of kindness, or some token of brotherly sympathy and affection? How many hearts have been touched and quickened by the spiritual deed we have implanted therein? How much have we done to aid the Children's Lyceum and to make the little ones feel that we want them to have a spiritual home of their own, as well as one for ourselves? How much have we done to strengthen the cause of Spiritualism in the communities where we live? Have we attended the meetings of the local society with due regularity? Have we encouraged the speakers by a timely word of appreciation, or kindly advice? Have we gone half way to meet some other worker in the cause in an effort to harmonize our differences? Have we remembered that other communities have need of spiritual food, and done all we could to send it to them? Have we remembered the Spiritualist papers, and done what we could to circulate the jeweled thoughts that sparkle upon their pages?

The vast majority of us will be forced to silence when we are confronted by these searching questions. They show us that we have forgotten our good resolutions in the too close application we have made to our own happiness, and private enjoyment. "What we would, that we do not," and wait for some one else to do the work for us. We are unsubscribe for one or more of the Spiritual teachings of the past, with the idea that some one else has paid our every debt, and that it won't matter very much after all whether we really do anything ourselves or not.

We have talked earnestly in favor of both the lyceum, and local society, then staid at home from both. Some of us have paid our money to support Unitarian and orthodox churches, and proved our devotion to our cash by sending our children to the Sunday-Schools of those churches whose teachings we know to be false. Others of us have forsaken our home society of Spiritualists because of some fancied slight, some petty jealousy of the officers, or some puerile fancy for the wonderful, and gone to meetings conducted by some itinerant medium, with uncertain gifts, who is too often waiting to entrap the unwary, or one whose record must not be mentioned lest he be wanted for a prison offense in some other locality.

We have forgotten our sick neighbor over the way, who has not our knowledge of the future, and permitted him to sail for an unknown shore without the chart and compass that will enable him to know his route for certainty, through the mediumship of Spiritualism. We have gone to the Spiritualist halls occasionally, and slipped hurriedly out, without having greeted the speaker, or said one word to cheer him in his work, or to strengthen the hands of the society's chief officials in their efforts to make the meetings cheerful, harmonious, and educational. We have not seen the extended hand of our quondam opponent, nor have we tried to bridge the chasm of our difficulties by the arch-way of fraternity. We have neglected to subsribe for one or more of the Spiritualist papers, and if we do take one, have forgotten to loan it to a neighbor who is just beginning to inquire into the subject of Spiritualism.

Have we kept none of our resolutions? Yes, we went to a Spiritualist camp-meeting, staid ten days or a month, gorged ourselves with spiritual food, and, like a bruin in winter, fed upon our store for the year, with our faculties in a complete dormant state in every direction.

We are now facing a new year. Let our resolutions be accompanied by corresponding deeds, that the world may see the good that Spiritualism has done us. If we are unable to do all the work we wish done, let us remember that we now have a servant to aid us, who will, if properly cared for, work out ideals, and give to the world a Spiritualism that will truly be the healing of all nations. That servant is the National Spiritualists' Association, now ready to move in every good work, as soon as the sinews of war are placed in its hands. The light of Spiritualism will be shed abroad over the land as soon as means are at hand to place a good corps of missionaries in the field. Local societies will be strengthened by a friendly lift from the N. S. A., when its officials are enabled to make them timely visits—when they can go, not begging for cash, but for a closer union in thought and effort for the sake of the cause we love so well. Literature of all kinds can be circulated freely among the reading masses as soon as means are at hand for its publication and distribution. Our Spiritualist papers can be aided by it in the same way, hence sustained in their good work.

Our duty then is obvious. Let us sustain the N. S. A. It is now Christmastide. The new year is upon us, fraught with high hopes and fond anticipations. By uniting our forces, we can do a grand work. By putting our good resolutions into practice, we can make the world see the true value of our Spiritualism. Let us, therefore, unite our contributions, be they large or small, that our servant may be enabled to assist us in carrying our good resolutions into effect. At this point, when the sun begins to retrace his steps, when we know that the reign of the Ice Giants is to be supplanted by that of Flora, let us in our rejoicing remember our cause, and give with glad hearts to the treasury of the angels for the sake of sorrowing humanity whom we fain would help to find light and knowledge.

Are there not ten thousand Spiritualists who are interested in our cause to the extent of five or ten dollars per year? Spiritualists cease supporting the churches for a year, for an experiment, and put your money into Spiritualism. You will be pleased and well paid with the exchange. Now is the glad holiday time. Let us give, with glad and willing hearts to a good and noble cause. We will be one of ten thousand to start the New Year's offering to the N. S. A., at ten dollars, payable at any time prior to March 31, 1897, S. E. 50. Come forward, friends, and help us. Send contributions to Francis B. Woodbury, secretary, N. S. A., Washington, D. C.

THE CHRISTMAS GREETING.

It was only the night before Christmas,
And the snow was falling fast,
The sky was heavy with leaden clouds,
And as the chill winds cast
The snow in the face of a lonely child,
He moaned, and sadly said:
"Oh, who will take pity on such as I,
Whose papa and mamma are dead?"

It was in a great big city,
And hundreds were sweeping by,
But none seemed to notice the suffering child,
Or hear his pitiful cry.
"Only a penny," he humbly said,
And the child began to weep,
And held out his trembling little hand,
"I have no place to sleep."

But the people rudely pushed him away,
And onward passed the crowd,
And the child stepped back by a door-step cold
And sadly moaned aloud:
"Oh, mamma and papa, it was not so
When you were here with me;
Last Christmas I had a nice warm home,
With a pretty Christmas tree.

"But oh! how terrible was that night,
Just one short year ago,
My life was turned from happiness
To the darkest night of woe.
I can see the Christmas tree again,
With its candles shining bright;
I can see the pretty presents now,
That were on that tree that night.

"And mamma's bright face as she saw my joy,
And papa's gay laugh and song;
But oh! I can see that fire again,
And I hear the fireman's gong.
For the window curtains caught on fire,
And the room was all aflame,
And as mama tried to put it out,
Her dress caught fire the same,

"Papa caught her in his arms,
But the tree was on fire round his head,
And before the firemen could get us out
My papa and mamma were dead.
They took them away from that blackened home,
And laid them away in the grave,
And me to a lonely, great, big house
My poor little life to save.

"They say I almost went to see
My papa and mamma again;
For I was burned in a fearful way
And suffered such terrible pain.
Oh, mamma and papa, can't I come
And be with the angels bright,
And join in your Christmas songs again,
As I did last Christmas night?

"Over where you are 'tis never cold,
And God's little ones never weep,
And never grow hungry and suffer from want
Of a good, warm place to sleep."
The poor child shivered and closer shrank
To the cold and frosty wall;
His voice grew so faint that as people passed
They did not hear him at all.

"Only a penny" he sadly moaned;
But the wind brought back the wall,
And he sank on the pavement white and cold,
And his little face so pale
Was soon covered o'er with the drifting snow
As it whirled about so wild,
And hid from sight the little form
Of that lonely little child.

But now from heaven two spirits came,
And led him each by the hand,
And folded him close to their angel breasts
In that beautiful summer land.
For father and mother had heard his wail;
Heaven's gate stood open wide,
And they came to carry their precious child
Across to the other side.

Across to the other side,
Where the angel friends are singing
And waiting to welcome each beautiful soul
That the tide of life keeps bringing
No more his little feet shall tread
This cold and heartless earth;
He has reached that heavenly home above,
That home of priceless worth.

For 'tis Christmas day in heaven,
And the Christmas bells are ringing,
And again he joins his sweet little voice
With his father's and mother's in singing.
And this is the song they sing up there,
As heaven their voices fill,
"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth Peace among men of good will."

THE NEXT WORLD INTERVIEWED

To the Editor:—I have just finished reading the beautiful book published by The Progressive Thinker, "The Next World Interviewed," with a relish that I did not expect when I at first scanned its pages.

My pen is too meagre to convey my appreciation of this grand work. The only disappointment that came to me was, that there was not more of it. But for a book of its size, it is the most gratifying in its earnest instructions and descriptions, of any communications that I have ever read. So many able pens will do this book and its medium, Mrs. S. G. Horn, justice, that I do not feel able or capable of conveying my idea of the sweet and sublime thoughts of the goodness of God to mortals through the powers of this gifted medium. Her every utterance is truth, purity, goodness and love.

To the investigator, to the uninitiated, and the sincere believer, its naturalness speaks the truth itself. Our best beloved ones who have passed

"The jasper gates,
Where slanting sunbeams for us wait," return and corroborate all the statements made in "The Next World Interviewed."

I feel, Mr. Francis, that you are doing the grandest work of all; you stand at the helm of the great and powerful ship Progression; which is heavily laden with all sorts of merchandise. The spirit-world has furnished you with a crew of the best mediums and writers, noble thinkers and workers, that are now in the valley of this life. This co-operation you are guiding into the harbor of everlasting joy, where flags will float in the fragrant breezes born of spicy fields in the garden of God, where lamps are lighted with His undying love, that all who are blinded by darkness may see the way to the Father's house. Your work to help others is blessed by a host of shining ones who sing glorious anthems around your daily life.

THE OLD WOMAN.

She Is Compared with the New Woman.

The Old Man Is Preferred to the New Man.

In The Progressive Thinker, some time ago, under the heading of "The New Woman," was an article by Eva A. Cassell, which, if you will kindly allow me, I would like to criticise a little. I believe Mrs. Cassell to be a lady of unexceptional qualities, and one I would like to consider a personal friend; and because I take exception to some of her statements I do not wish her to think otherwise.

"Sex is an accident of birth," so she says. True, and is not birth itself an accident? No doubt the sister has thought on the chances there were against our coming into existence at all. If the slightest thing had occurred different from what did occur, then you and I would never have been human beings, let alone two poor, abused women.

The question that was asked of Robert G. Ingersoll and other prominent men and women not long ago, was what they considered would be a greater calamity than death. I was not asked, but if I had been my reply would be: I would consider it infinitely a greater calamity not to have been born.

Now, if you look upon femininity as an accident, birth is an accident, and, in fact, there are no laws governing the universe, but all is accident. Then if she and I are compelled to "grovel in grease and ashes," is that not also an accident? Then why not meet it bravely? I know servant girls who hate kitchen work, but their accident of birth compels them to do it for a living.

The great Creator—the power that brought all these things into existence—had a design in view when he created all animal life, male and female, with laws governing the same; and what is the apparent design but the propagation of new beings? If this life were all there was of our active individual existence, then I would ask what is the use of all this pain and suffering in this mortal life?

I look upon my dear little boy, and ask myself: What would induce me to part with him? Do I regret the pain it caused me? Ah, rather than part with his prattle—his "mammas" and "papas," I'd willingly suffer it all again till flesh would cease to bear any more, and then pray for strength to bear more—knowing, too, that if life here would cease, loving spirit friends would receive him to their beautiful home.

The writer of this is permitted many times to visit, in clairvoyant visions, the bright future home, and has many times conversed with her departed friends, and the great source of regret with many of those who die young and unmarried is, that they have left no posterity.

The lady points out a great source of insanity and crime, and that is: "Man shows a criminal indifference in begetting offspring." Now, I don't like to see it all laid on the men. Are not the women a little to blame too?

And she calls it indifference, when in ninety-nine out of one hundred cases it is simple ignorance on the part of both sexes. Our boys and girls are allowed to grow up in ignorance on the most vital question before us to-day. They are compelled to learn lessons that are of no practical benefit to them in any way, while the practical lessons of life are completely ignored or are taught them by those almost as ignorant.

What does the average girl of sixteen to twenty (marriageable age) know of the laws governing maternity? A large per cent do not know what they are getting married for, even.

Who, even of fathers and mothers, know what effect impressions made previous to birth have upon the child, or whether they should yield to notions, cravings, etc., or exercise will power and control these fancies and desires?

The old women will say: Don't eat this, or don't do that—till, if she were to listen to all, she would neither eat, drink nor move for the whole period, and keep the coming mother in a nervous strain all the time.

Now, my remedy is not to lay blame on either sex as a class, but on the neglect to properly educate the youth. Let these subjects be taught by teachers who have made it a special study, so that the coming generation may be able to use a little practical knowledge with them; then there will be no "enforced motherhood." Then the women will see what benefit it is to them to be mothers of a wise posterity. And the public schools are the place for such practical, essential education to be taught. Why our public speakers, teachers and writers do not agitate this question more is a mystery. Now, as it is, only those contemplating a medical practice make any special study of the subject.

A young, prospective mother, with a still more ignorant husband, is constantly calling in medical advice unnecessarily, which is expensive, while in many cases it is very necessary they neglect to do so. Really, I would like to see that coming new man she is going to give us a picture of. Is it that scandal-monger, club-lover and woman-hater remodeled, or is it an entirely new invention? But I'll tell you it has got to be a vast improvement on the former, if I exchange my old man for him.

TO BOHEMIAN SPIRITUALISTS.

No doubt there is a considerable number of Bohemians in this country, who find a great comfort in our beautiful spiritual philosophy and religion, and who desire that all our countrymen may learn what Spiritualism really is. If all the Bohemian Spiritualists who read this, will write to me at once, they will recieve a letter from me and will learn how Spiritualism might spread with but little assistance of theirs among our countrymen. Please, also send names and addresses of Bohemians of whom you know that are Spiritualists. Adress all communications

TESTING MEDIUMS.

Has Some Notions of Her Own.

In a late issue of The Progressive Thinker, Allie Lindsay Lynch speaks of the skepticism of many, and of the desire of others to pay a cash premium for a satisfactory test. Now Allie is too kind to say that she does not believe heaven sells its assurance at $100 a chunk, so I will say it for her.

If I were a materializing medium, I would not take such an offer.

Should someone offer me $100 to trot out some living friend, and exhibit that friend on the street corner, would I do it?

The person who makes such an offer as this, does it in a peculiar spirit, for should he or she really wish to hold the hand of some materialized spirit, until that spirit dematerialized, and sunk to a patch of white film the size of a hand, and then finally to a white dot, and then disappear at his feet—he has only to attend, in an honest, kindly spirit, some good seance. I do not mean to say that he could hold the hand after the body has disappeared, but until the dematerialization had dissolved the hand held in his grasp.

I have done this, and I am not one favored of heaven, neither am I one that could possibly have been deceived in this matter. But I wonder why I say this here. I do not go about declaring that I am positive Edison has used the X-ray satisfactorily. It is a fact, and needs no backing. No more does materialization need backing from me or any one else. It is one of the facts of the century, and those who know it should simply smile at the doubts of those who either do not know, or choose not to know it. I can add nothing to the fact by saying that I have held the spirit-hands in mine until they have dissolved, as it were, dematerialized, till my fingers sunk onto my own palm. But I have done so. The one-hundred-dollar man can do so if he chooses, and he can keep his money and his affidavit, and his thanks, all to himself.

I think we sometimes cater to the spirit of contrariness when we pay any attention to such "offers."

I can tell doubters of another far more curious thing: I have a favorite medium to whom I go as often as opportunity offers. Through his tin trumpet my father talked to me. There was nothing out of the usual order in this. Later, at a materializing seance, my father called me to the cabinet curtain and talked to me—now rejoice all ye doubters—in a voice and accent strongly German. And my father was a "Down East Yankee," and had never heard a German speak, never in his life.

Yes, I'll admit it did seem funny to me—at first. I understood the laws that governed the "phenomena," but it seemed the queerest thing on earth to hear my father speak with a foreign twist on his tongue.

But listen. This was the first time he came. The next time he brought more of his own Yankee twang with him, and having gotten "the hang of the school house" as it were, after that he had his own voice and manner of speaking. The conversation was in an audible voice, and such that my German medium could not have spoken with the pure Yankee tone, not if his soul had paid the forfeit.

Dreadfully perplexing my $100 friends, is it not? Well, well, never mind, wait till you get over there yourself. You will not have to come back, likely, if you don't want to.

There are so many people who are so anxious to believe that the dead will stay put, once they get them "planted," that really, it is love's labor lost to try to convince them to the contrary.

MAUD VAUGHN.

Bottlebinding.

You can't judge of the quality of a book by the binding, nor tell the contents by the title. You look for the name of the author before you buy the book. The name of Robert Louis Stevenson (for instance) on the back guarantees the inside of the book, whatever the outside may be.

There's a parallel between books and bottles. The binding, or wrapper, of a bottle is no guide to the quality of the medicine the bottle contains. The title on the bottle is no warrant for confidence in the contents. It all depends on the author's name. Never mind who made the bottle. Who made the medicine? That's the question.

Think of this when buying Sarsaparilla. It isn't the binding of the bottle or the name of the medicine that you're to go by. That's only printer's ink and paper! The question is, who made the medicine? What's the author's name? When you see Ayer's name on a Sarsaparilla bottle, that's enough. The name Ayer guarantees the best, and has done so for 50 years.

HYPNOTISM;

Its Facts, Theories and Related Phenomena, with Explanatory Anecdotes, Descriptions and Reminiscences.

BY CARL SEXTUS. THE BOOK IS largely a record of the facts and demonstrations which the author has seen, heard of or presented in his own experiments. The history of the various phases of the science is succinctly presented, and the various theories clearly stated. Many of the experiments described occurred in Chicago. The pictorial illustrations add much to the interest and value of the book, which will be found very interesting to the general reader, as well as helpful and instructive to the student. The work is a handsome volume of 300 pages, bound in cloth. Price, $2.00. For sale at the office of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

Researches in Oriental History.

BY G. W. BROWN, M. D.

One Vol. 12mo, 407 Pages, Cloth, $1.50.

GENERAL DIVISION.

1. RESEARCHES IN JEWISH HISTORY.
2. RESEARCHES IN ZOROASTRIANISM.
3. DERIVATION OF CHRISTIANITY.
4. WHENCE OUR ARYAN ANCESTORS?

The whole comprises an earnest but fruitless search for a Historical Jesus.

In this volume the Jews are clearly shown not to have been the holy and favored people they claim to have been. The Messianic idea is traced to the Babylonian Philosopher, 2850 years B. C., and its history is outlined, following the waves of emigration, until it is fully developed into Christianity, with a mythical hero at Alexandria, in Egypt, soon after the commencement of the Christian era.

The book demonstrates that Christianity and its central hero are mythical; that the whole system is based on fraud, falsehood, forgery, fear and force; and that its rites, ceremonials, dogmas and superstitions are but survivals of so-called paganism. It shows vast research among the records of the past; its facts are mostly gleaned from Christian authority; and no person can read it without instruction and profit, whether he reaches the same conclusions with the author or otherwise. THE LYCEUM GUIDE.

For the Home, the Lyceum and Societies.

A Manual of Physical, Intellectual and Spiritual Culture.

COMPILED BY EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

A COLLECTION OF MUSIC AND Songs, Golden Chain Recitations, Memory Gems, Choral Responses, Funeral Services, Programs for sessions, Parliamentary Rules, Instructions for Organizing and conducting Lyceums, Instructions for Physical Culture, Calisthenics and Marching; Banners, Standards, the Band of Mercy, etc.; a book by the aid of which a Progressive Lyceum, a Spiritual or Liberal Society may be organized and conducted, without other assistance. It supplies the wants of Spiritual Societies for fresh Spiritual songs, with music free from the dismal tone of the old hymnology. It furnishes a unique selection of choice readings and responses such as no other selection contains. It gives a practical system of graceful calisthenics, every step of which is made plain by engravings. It gives instructions how to make the badges and banners and instructs in marching. It shows how to establish a Band of Mercy as auxiliary to the Lyceum, and has all the most beautiful songs which have been gathered up by that movement.

The author and compiler of this Guide is eminently prepared for the task by years of devoted labor in the Lyceum. The book is the result of practical work and tested by the interest awakened in the actual session of the Lyceum.

While intended for the working Lyceum, the guide is admirably adapted to the needs of the family, supplying 76 pages of new spiritual music and words found nowhere else, except in sheet form at many times the cost. The book has been placed at the remarkably low price of 50 cents, sent postpaid.

HE CRITICISES THE N. S. A.

THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION.

A few thoughts on the subject of organization, a theme that has ever seemed to me as an important in the evelopment and expression of any principle. As sure as men are brought to ee—and by seeing is implied much more than knowing—that there are silent laws of order and organization everywhere at work in the universe, and hat it does not depend on any one man r set of men to operate these unseen nd silent laws, and that all the results he world has ever achieved, are the utcome solely of the working of these aws. However history may applaud his man or seek to deify that, just so oon will human authority and form anish like the mist of the morning in he risen sun, and the supreme power of the spiritual vindicate itself in the affairs of nations and men. Spiritualism has come not a day too soon to emancipate the human soul, and Spiritualism or the spuermundane element of which it is composed silently puts aside human agencies, whether personal merely or organized. As soon as they have done the work it appointed to them, it has more regard for the work itself than to the individual doer of it.

Hence it selects its instruments according to their peculiar fitness for the purpose in hand; never for the aggrandizement of the instrument. It silently organizes its plans in obedience to the needs, and it, but no less effectively, deposes existing leaders and organizations when their usefulness is over, or they prove inadequate to the needs of the hour, by withdrawing from them any farther work or support.

THE PERFECT ORGANIZATION.

The perfect organization of the Roman Catholic Church serves to hold each integral part of that powerful body intact; not a child left out or forgotten in that stupendous plan; a thousand things insisted upon that seem to the casual onlooker foolish and puerile, but to a closer student of organization appear, as they are, the small particles of cement that hold the greater things in place, and without which the institution would fall into speedy decay. Less perfect, and consequently less powerful are the Protestant organizations, and yet banded together as they are as an organic body, they wield an influence that is mighty indeed, and which has secured to them privileges that inorganized bodies cannot enjoy.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

The Salvation Army, despised and reviled by all alike in their inciplency are to-day a powerful organization, reaping the benefits that ever accrue to a concerted plan of action. No one is too weak to be of service in their propaganda. Labor unions have had strength to win victories just in proportion to the strength of their organizations; their failures have ever come from a lack of unity in themselves.

POLITICAL PARTIES.

The splendid achievements of the Republican party in its history in the past, as well as in the late campaign, is due to an almost perfect organization. The People's party, despised, ridiculed, as all new movements are, has gone on steadily in the work of organization until to-day its number seems formidable when it comes to counting the votes; and either party will welcome them, and they have gained that measure of consideration that is ever paid to organization.

THEOSOPHISTS — SPIRITUALISTS.

The Theosophists are perfecting their organization, gaining ground hefe in America, and have sent out organizers to foreign countries, and because of concerted action they are gaining as helpers many who have stood with the Spiritualists in the past, and who would do so to-day if there was any incentive for so doing. But, alas! many localities that boasted of good societies as many as thirty years ago, and perhaps until the last few years held Spiritual meetings, are to-day without any society whatever; the people scattered about—many are found in the church or have lost interest altogether.

HIGH AND LOW TIDES.

In all these years since the first rap at Hydesville the interest has had its high and low tides in almost every locality. Many of the brightest lights on the spiritual platform have been compelled to seek other means of gaining a livelihood since they were not sustained or supported by the Spiritualists; petty jealousies and an inclination to belittle each other has marked and marred the work, and an incalculable injury done to the cause thereby.

A NATURAL ORGANIZATION.

We have at this time a National Organization composed of a small minority of the Spiritualists of this country—not but what all Spiritualists would like to be identified with a National movement, and assist in the work attached thereto, and share the honors in so important a work, but the facts in the case are these. Many who have devoted much study and work to the subject of organization, who even participated in the formation of the National to a certain extent, found themselves at the close of the convention outside the doors, so to speak; not even members of the thing they had created. The consequence was that many who went to Chicago cheerfully paying their expenses, full of enthusiasm, and eager to work for the cause they had already sacrificed so much for, went home disappointed, and in many instances disgusted with the action of that meeting. The Association is three years old, and as the Editor of The Progressive Thinker says, there are thousands who do not know anything of the action of the convention held in Washington, and candor compels me to add, that there are thousands who do not care; they are not interested; they are not represented; they do not belong to the Association, and nothing that they have done as yet will convince them that there is anything to be gained in being individual members. And in the columns of The Progressive Thinker of a few weeks since there was a notice of a withdrawal of a society and the reasons given therefor. One gentleman, in speaking of the matter said that "he still regretted the time spent in the Chicago affair." Said he could have employed his time more profitably at the World's Fair, which he missed altogether because of his interest in the cause of Spiritualism, which in his judgment had not been organized properly. The selections of officers, and the manner in which the nominations were made he considered unfair to the people who were there for the purpose of participating in the selection, and finally he claimed the only literature he had received since the organization was an appeal for money, and a circular advertising a private enterprise of one of the officers. He would not contribute a cent to a thing to which he could not belong, and which in his opinion benefited less than a dozen people, some of whom he knew had been coaxed for hours before they would consent to assist the thing even with their presence; but once there insisted upon running the affair, although up to that time they had disparaged the work of those who were laboring for organization. And farther, that at this great convention of Spiritualists, meetings had been held and efforts made to displace one or more of the noblest workers in the cause who appeared on the programme, and this by people who pose as mediums and teachers of a Harmonial Philosophy "controlled by angels." And, as he says, while they did not succeed at that particular time, ultimately the results of their devilish work must have been all they desired, since the individual they tried particularly to injure came into possession of the facts and quietly retired, hurt no doubt, but never murmuring. And the cause lost for the time being one of its ablest, brainiest workers, and the unwise action of that convention shut out for three years a great number of men and women who ought by all means to have been actively engaged in the work for that period as they had been previous to the formation of the so-called National.

INTENSELY CRITICAL.

Now, my dear reader, I will no doubt be criticized for giving a few inside facts in regard to this matter, but I believe I can stand it as well as the grand spiritual mediums who have been counted out, as I do not profess to be a medium, and have no ax to grind. The one whose objections I have cited is a gentleman, a Spiritualist and a business man of large experience, and more than all, one who understands the subject of organization, and who has contributed more than any gentleman I know to the success of several of the most powerful organizations in the world, in his own and many other States, and his advice is constantly being sought, and if he were the only one we would not think of raising the question we do, but he is one of many, and I firmly believe that President Barrett, and many more who belong to the National will welcome a plan of action that will bring every intelligent Spiritualist into the work; that will identify every speaker of known ability with them, for I have always considered "that everything that is not with us is against us." The thought comes as we look about us and see the rascally frauds; the scattered people without a society or a newspaper; the neglected children; the idle workers of known ability; the cheap speaker and fortune telling "test" giver; the dingy halls; the wretched excuse for music that abounds in many places in our broad land. The thought comes, have we begun right, have we sought to bind together the scattered strength of our people? There are mediums all over the land who are led by the same bright throng of arisen intelligences. Have we sought their aid, their advice, their co-operation in this important work, for be it known that each one has a place and an influence that no one else can have? Can we afford to go on without them? Can we afford to go on for another year without organizing the States and providing for State conventions? Can we afford to let another year go by without making the National Convention migratory, its location each year to be determined by the needs of the cause? Can we afford to let the Christian church educate our children? Can we afford to follow in the footsteps of the church, and collect vast sums to erect a temple in Washington, when for lack of funds we permit laws to be passed in every State in the Union that debars our Heaven-born healers from practice, and that makes the exercise of mediumship a crime?

Somebody must call a halt. "One swallow does not make a summer." One president, one wonderful inspired speaker, and one book do not make a National organization.

We must have the opportunity to work together, and unless this is done shortly, judging from the experiences of the last few years, we will be lost to memory in some localities. We must have an organization that will mean something to the world and to the people, that will benefit the cause, the society and the individual member, that no society can truthfully say "there is no benefit to us in being a member of," but on the other hand a thing that all societies and workers will be alike blessed in being a part of.

This society should be terror to frauds and pretenders of high and low degree—then Spiritualism would take its proper place in the world. A defender of the rights of the individual; an outward expression of the brotherhood of man, and a consistent example of Spiritualism as taught by the exalted intelligences that are back of this great movement; and who after all will see that justice is done.

DR. FREDERICK HORMAN.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

SECRETARY WOODBURY AT LEXINGTON, KY.

Sunday, November 22nd, was a gala day for the First Spiritualist Society, of Lexington, Ky. We were honored with a visit from Brother Woodbury of the N. S. A., whose presence was to our little struggling society, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, while the kind words of encouragement that he spoke to us, was as the cooling waters of a spring in a dry place. At our evening meeting, held in the Common Pleas room of the court house, he addressed an audience of over two hundred, setting forth in forcible language the beauties of our beautiful religion, free thought for all, and let each individual with his or her own paddle steer life's canoe according to their own good judgment. His words were well received by all, and we regretted very much that he could not stop with us longer. We offer him in evidence, that God's people still inherit and hold the broad acres of Blue Grass that carpet the fields of the dark and bloody ground of old Kentucky, and that no honest medium need fear the clutches of Kentucky law. Our guns are loaded for different game.

Mrs. Mary Garrett, a well known physical medium of Cincinnati, is also with us. She gave our little society her services also, and added her thankfully received contribution in the way of trance and natural self-speeches, followed with tests—all of which added to the enjoyment of the evening.

Mrs. Garrett is holding seances night and day, while with us. She is giving the people of this little inland city of churches, something to think about on a rainy day. We believe her to be an honest, good medium. We also offer here in evidence, that it requires no passport but good behavior to make one safe with our people. SAM F. GRAY.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

HE DEFENDS THE N. S. A.

THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION.

"Happy he whose inward ear
Angel comforings can hear
O'er the rabble's laughter,
And while hatred's fagots burn,
Glimpses through the smoke discern
Of the good hereafter."

"Spiritualism in its early days, like a flood, gathered all the floating rubbish on its tide, and by many is judged rather by this accident than by the force of its torrent. This is not exceptional. All countries and all religions have their professional lazzaroni, beggars, tramps, hangers-on, leeches, and vampires. The divine philosophy of Spiritualism is no exception. Its pure garments have been dabbled with the slime of selfishness, and polluted by the vampires of "passion." That it has endured all that has been cast upon it, and not only endured, but grown strong, indicates its tenacious vitality and the inherent strength of its glorious truth. We believe in 'missions;' that our spirit friends have a 'work' for each and every one of us; but we also believe that they desire us to be individuals, and not to be led at random by any 'reform,' however exalted.

"That Spiritualism has shaken off these burdens, which at first seemed inevitably crushing it to earth, indicates its inherent power. It has also swept by the rocks and shoals of partisan leadership, on which this great boon to humanity would otherwise have been irretrievably lost. There has not been, from the first, a scarcity of men and women who desired to grasp the immeasurable power it wielded; nor have they been backward in making the attempt. Ruin and disaster pursued them, and this with swiftest feet, and taught the world that this last great religion must be free from the tyranny of individual rule. The day of supernatural prophets, oracles, and special seers, has passed. All mediums are prophets; and all inspiration must be subject to reason."

THE BAR OF REASON.

Thus has written one of the ablest teachers. The present officers of the N. S. A. are unanimous in their efforts to conduct its business affairs, not in the interest of any faction or clique, but in the interest of and for all our people.

The Board of Trustees consists of nine persons, mentally endowed with a fair knowledge of business principles, and all of them pledged to transact the business of this association without dictation from any person, any medium or control of any medium. We give thanks to our spirit friends always for their kind ministrations. We are always pleased to welcome them and receive their advice and council. We do not desire to dictate to others, and we will not submit to absolute dictation from spirits, in the body, or out. Reason is our only guide. We have known of human lives being wrecked. We have seen families destroyed, fortunes squandered, through abject and perfect submission to the directions an dictations given by and through a self-psycologized medium; said directions being more the creations of said medium's brain than a message from an advanced spirit. Consequently we call to the bar of reason every communication. If such a test is wrong, it is our mistake. Abject servitude to the spirits of men out of the body, is no better than abject servitude to those in the body and may lead to as bad or worse results.

PERNICIOUS DICTATION.

The Roman Church is applauded by many who think their judgment superior and expect others to endorse their views. The great success of the Roman Church depends on the absolute giving up of all views and accepting the dictum of the priest as the word of God. Such persons will not endorse organization because they fear it is too "churchy;" "its organizing a new sect," etc. On one hand they endorse perfect organization and supreme dictation; on the other they do not accept organization that is free from dictation entirely. Supreme dictators in religious matters may have a perfect business organization, but a true American has no respect for them as dictators. This spirit of "My way is absolutely right," "You must submit," ought to have gone overboard when the tea did in Boston Harbor. Tyranny of men or spirits ought never control a National Association of Spiritualists; if so we have gained nothing by organization. "This society shall be conducted as I say or there will be no society here" is the spirit that has North, South, East and West, destroyed our associations, and the present officers of the N. S. A., having seen the dire results of such dictation desire to try and be as free from this spirit as possible.

FRATERNAL CO-OPERATION.

It is the watch word of the hour. I do not think the methods adopted by any political party are those which should be adopted by the management of any National Spiritualist Association. I am personally ashamed of them all and their great achievements in recent times seems to be regulated by the amount of cash they can control.

The fact that the present N. S. A. is "composed of a small minority of the Spiritualists of this country," is not the fault of its officers. Once for all, allow me to say that those who were the advance agents of the N. S. A. may have made some mistakes in regard to the Chicago Convention; being human, I suppose they did, but they did not make the mistake of attempting to keep any one out of the N. S. A. Spiritualists who have secured a good living from organized Spiritualist societies for years have said very unkind things about the N. S. A.; because, forsooth, "I, the great self-appointed I am of Spiritualism" did not receive an invitation, printed on gilt edge paper and presented on a silver salver to the Chicago Convention. What did they want? A carriage to meet them at the depot, some one to board them while there, some to pay all bills and a salary beside?

ANY REASONABLE PLAN.

The present Board will adopt any reasonable plan that will bring into the N. S. A. ranks all. Spiritualists have been implored, begged, and prayed to come especially to the last convention, and those who could not come were requested to send their views as to "How the N. S. A should be conducted." Could we do more. We have not only sought aid and advice of all, but we have been to the expense of endeavoring to arrange a department of the N. S. A. for the mediums themselves, in which they can protect themselves and assist the N. S. A.

Every opportunity is given for all to affiliate with the N. S. A.

First. By membership in a local society chartered by it and the payment of twenty-five cents once a year to help sustain it.

Second. By sending one whole dollar to the Secretary and becoming a contributing member.

Every honest, decent, respectable means has always been used to induce the Spiritualists of America to affiliate themselves with the N. S. A.. If they have not done so, pray who is to blame? That some may have been called and few chosen is not the fault of those who happened to be elected officers of the N. S. A.

STATE ASSOCIATIONS.

During the past year the president and secretary have endeavored to enthuse Spiritualists to organize State Associations. We are now actively engaged in this work. Two State Associations have been recently organized as a result. Every State in the Union should have a State Association.

BRANDS OF ENTHUSIASM.

What a wonderful phenomena our friend alludes to. Many who went to Chicago "cheerfully paying their expenses." We are thankful for so much, a true indication that the millennium may not have always to be postponed, and that in the near future we shall not have to offer a salary to "reformers" to assemble in convention for humanity's sake. Our friend seems to lament that these people were "full of enthusiasm." I am not one of Brother Moore's Blue Grass Prohibitionists, but I do most respectfully submit that as this was a Spiritual Convention at Chicago. It was very meritorious to go there full of enthusiasm; it would have been very disgraceful to have attended that Convention full of spirits frumenti, or spirits vini gallici.

But there are various brands of enthusiasm: There is the broad gauge enthusiasm that is helpful and generous, ready to do anything under the heavens that is for the interest of humanity; and there is a brand of enthusiasm that is riotously enthusiastic if I and mine are in, but is not enthusiastic at all if others are selected even by a unanimous vote to office.

PROGRESSIVE THINKER EDITOR.

True, the editor of The Progressive Thinker did say there were thousands of Spiritualists who did not know anything about what the convention last held in Washington, did. Why? They were too confoundedly disinterested in their own religion (the best under heaven) to pay one dollar in a year for a Spiritualist paper as good as The Progressive Thinker is. True, there are those who cannot afford even that much for a paper, but there are thousands who can afford it who do not, and then have the audacity to whine about what they do not know about the N. S. A.

WELL THAT IT WITHDREW.

The notice of the withdrawal of one society pleases some people; well, it pleased the officials of the N. S. A. too. We do not believe every Spiritualist in the N. S. A. ought to be ordained as a minister of the gospel. We protest against wholesale ordination and we prefer that any society that desires to ordain all applicants or many applicants should not be affiliated with the present N. S. A. We believe sincerely ordination should be restricted rather than encouraged. The fact that one gentleman "still regrets the time spent in the Chicago affair" proves that said gentleman does not realize that life is too short to be used up "regretting." As we cannot travel this way but once, let us use our time wisely in endeavoring to leave the world better than we found it. His judgment. Oh! yes. There are several such people in this world. It would take from now until eternity is passed to organize, so that some one man or woman would not arise and say, "In my judgment so and so is wrong."

RESTRICTIVE LAWS.

Laws are passed already in most of the States in the Union regulating the practice of medicine; passed while Spiritualists were quarreling over non-essentials; passed while they were discussing organization; passed while some of them were grumbling because some society dared to remain in the Spiritual fold and be known as a "church;" passed after the Spiritualists had been warned by such scholarly men as S. B. Brittan, who said years ago, that such laws were sure to be enacted if Spiritualists did not organize. The "halt" was called a long time ago, my friends; many people are now just hearing it. The "rantankerous" "my judgment" spirits have argued "the plat" until the train of progression has rolled nearly by. Reason, judgment, is all right, but self sometimes must be lost sight of.

"The Boogy" of "Footsteps of the Church" will not scare thinking people now. Progressive people among us are agitated trying to hold a place at the head of the procession so that we shall not be obliged to go into the "footstep business" behind the church of the "Free," led by Dr. Thomas, Minot J. Savage, Reed Stuart, Eben Rexford, Crocker, and men of such advanced views, that they have left creeds and superstitions entirely behind. Footsteps of the church are pressing very near the promised land of the Spiritualists.

If we do not sustain the organization, imperfect though it may be which we have, which the Unitarians frankly admit is better than they had twenty years after they first organized, we may find ourselves in the footsteps of the church and not be able to help ourselves.

THE FRAUD QUESTION.

The N. S. A. should be a terror to frauds and pretenders of high and low degree. Where to begin and where to stop are very important factors in the terror business, especially if you want to be just.

Don't be to hasty even with frauds; a scamp well hanged with rope he arranges himself, is more satisfactory than denunciation which only brings in return a large number of letters from forty-year Spiritualists "who know he is a genuine medium, and are positive he is an honest man."

BUSINESS PRINCIPLES.

The business of the N. S. A. is conducted on business principles. It has benefited more than one dozen of people. This institution has sent its able president out through the country from Maine to California, to address thousands of people hungry for Truth, tals without any regard to the fact, "can the people pay for his services?" Of his missionary work none but the angels of God can sum up the result. This institution has been working quietly to elliminate fortune-tellers, and charm-sellers from our ranks, people who have disgraced Spiritualism and caused the arrest of honest spirit mediums.

A GRAND WORK.

This institution has founded a library containing the works of all the best Spiritualist authors at the Nation's capital, which is visited by many of the most prominent people of the day. This institution has sent out thousands of pages of literature to people of all denominations, thus educating, not only the people, but the clergy in regard to the great truths of Spiritualism. This institution of the people, by the people, for the people, that has united at Washington, D. C., Jews, Unitarians, Secularists, Spiritualists, Seven Day Baptists, Adventists, Universalists, and others in an American Protective Association, that is American and non-sectarian, first last and always, and will defend to the last the constitutional rights of the people. This institution whose officers are working all the time to organize Spiritualists, not for any personal ends, but for salvation and protection of the cause of the Angels among men—such an institution only benefited one dozen individuals? Bosh!

THE SCARE CROW.

The National Spiritual temple scarecrow also is once more aired. Awful, isn't it? Some aged Spiritualists want to leave some money as a fund toward erecting in Washington a National Temple school, library, headquarters of the N. S. A., combined, same to be a National Memorial Temple. The N. S. A. officials knowing that these persons have cherished this desire have been rash enough to dare to assist them in arranging to leave their money for the object they most desire. Is that not an awful crime? Would it not be sad if there should be such a temple erected in Washington, where our friend's Roman Church is centering its power, in massive structures and marble halls, and every Protestant denomination doing the same? Why not make it a sin for Spiritualists to do anything in the same way church people do? Because its like church people, etc.

IT IS TRUE.

Yes, it is true that, in many localities, good societies that used to exist are no more. It is true that many of the shining lights of Spiritualism have been compelled to seek other means of livlihood because of lack of support of Spiritualists. It is true there are rascally frauds; that many of our meetings are conducted on the show plan; the advertising around the entrance of some of our dingy meeting places would disgrace a side show to a circus. It is true we cannot afford to let the church educate our children. It is true that there are too many restrictive laws already applying to healers and mediums, and it is also true that none of these problems can be successfully solved until we are willing sometimes to submit that "My judgment" may not always be right;" "that I will try and put self out of sight for a while and let the spirit that characterizes some of the people of the Salvation Army, rule. Organization will solve all the problems that trouble us, but that organization must be completed now, not one hundred dred years from now.

The next ten years will decide many things, not only in regard to Spiritualism, but in regard to the Constitutional rights of the American citizen. United we shall win, divided we shall fall. If the N. S. A. of to-day is destroyed by a combination of fault finders, kickers, charm-sellers, and fraud promoters, farewell to organized Spiritualism in America, for a long time; perhaps forever.

Finally, our friend has travelled a long way to say absolutely nothing new. "One president, one inspired speaker, one book" does not make a National Association. 158 chartered societies, whose representatives gather in convention annually, do, and if our friend, and his friend, are true Spiritualists they will try to aid the N. S. A. to become perfect in its organization, instead of using valuable time extolling the Catholic Church, the Republican party, etc., etc., and endeavoring to start "A argument." May he and his friend cooperate for the good of humanity with those who labor not for money, or glory, but that humanity may realize immortality a fact.

PLEA FOR THE NEW WOMAN.

in continual penance on account of the sin she brought into the world." And Sir Henry Maine remarks that "no society which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions is ever likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by middle Roman law."

Christianity would do nothing to raise the status of women in Japan; it might, however do much to retard it. Unlike the stolid Chinese, who disregard laws of chastity, cleanliness, and order, it is said that the peace and plenty which characterize the homes of Japan render them the most attractive and interesting people of the Orient; while the perpetual amiability, gentleness, and refinement of their manners is the wonder of the western world." Smoothing rough traits by a growing sense of polish and dignity, tempering her military character in harmony with the spiritual needs that a changed environment has wrought, clearing her industrial path of the rubbish which destroys social feeling and makes co-operation impossible, bridging over old difficulties, seeking fresh experience in the realm of thought, lifting herself above that party spirit of narrow conservatism which renders the social and political state of Turkey almost as immovable as the fixed stars—Japan, with her eyes turned toward the west, is keeping time to the beat of civilization. J. R. Buchanan predicts that Japan will be foremost "in the second cycle of cosmic progress, which will be pre-eminently the cycle of woman."

The tide of evolution sometimes rolls backward, though, in measuring human affairs by protracted periods of time, its general trend is upward and onward. During the childhood of the human race, when the human mind is untilled, and before the seeds of imagination have been planted, every wrong, even slavery, despite its numerous and apparent defects, must have served as the means to an end—a link in the chain of cause and effect; else, in the struggle for existence, the seeds of destruction would have been sown, which would, in time, have ripened into harvest, and the nations that trafficked in flesh and blood would have gradually ceased to exist. "The functions of every organ evolved in an organism must have tended to its preservation." Had slavery, however, heedless of physical conditions which imply change, been stereotyped and retained as a permanent form of government, there would have ensued, in the process of time, an intellectual torpor, akin to death—the powers of the mind becoming benumbed and misdirected, the soul isolated and hollow, the sympathies seared and deadened. "Conduct that under certain circumstances would tend to strengthen a society, may, under a change of circumstances, tend to weaken it; just as the clothing and food that are in the Arctic regions preservative, would be in the tropics deleterious and destructive. The ethical character of conduct must change if circumstances change the ethical results of that conduct."

A nation may be likened unto an immense social machine, unable, during the primitive stages of development, to perform its functions normally, its possibilities narrow and limited in action, subject to frequent disturbances, occasional disintegration, and destructive friction caused by the clashing of its parts, but becoming, in the process of experience (which is root and branch of all true progress), a more harmonious and complex arrangement, gradually commingling its multiform divisions, making co-operation less difficult, creating thereby a greater demand for tools of endurance, energy, and precision and a more careful adjustment of their parts. After the machine is in good running order, any impediment or crippling, however slight, of any one of its component parts or functions, by artificial clogging, obstructs the healthy movement of the whole, rendering the divine influx of fresh awakening and experience proportionately arduous. Another point to be noted is, that if the cogs insist on dictating to the wheels, and the ropes to the pulleys, disorder will become contagious, universal confusion reign, and, if tenaciously persisted in, the whole mechanical contrivance will be shattered into fragments, which only an immense period of time can gather together again.

Is it not possible that this spirit of dictation within the human family is the cause of the greater portion of the misery, drunkenness, crime, and vice that have blighted society's fair face, and sown seeds of discord in the earth? And is it not possible that by a clearer understanding of the nature of the human faculties, much of this evil may be averted in the future?

The final goal of human progress is to place the brain in its normal sphere—a goal which may never be reached, but toward which we should direct our united abilities! When people are given equal rights, and their brains permitted to assume their natural proportions, there need be no fear that one sex will usurp the sphere of the other, or that the feminine element will rebel against itself. Place women in their normal sphere, and, like the laws of mechanical force, they will follow the line of least resistance.

THE ETHEREAL BODY.

A Philosophical Study of the Subject,

With Answers to the Questions of Alcinous.

To the Editor:—Having in previous communications attempted briefly to answer three of the fifteen questions propounded by Alcinous, in your issue of October 31, I will now return to the subject and consider some of the remaining points.

Before doing so, however, I observe that your correspondent has, in The Progressive Thinker for December 12, requested my reasons for saying that "spirit per se is formless, and also inquired: "What objections to the propositions assumed in the following statements?

"1. The universe is an essence composed of mind and matter acting and reacting upon each other.

"2. That all elements and all manifestations of life in Nature are the phenomena of life entities, human in type, expressing themselves in infinite forms.

"3. That sex, from the single life form to the complex, furnishes an evoluted protoplasm or ovum suitable to the growth of the entities re-embodying on their path or round of evolution.

"4. The physical body is a miscrocosm made up of entities which are being humanized by the ego of the body—the God of the little world.

"5. That all breathing forms breathe in and expel entities of varying forms and color of aura.

"6. That thought sets diversified entities in motion peculiar to the thought, who send off an aura corresponding to the character of the thought and its associations."

I stated that, in my view, "spirit per se is formless" because form is a property of matter, and also because I regard spirit as omnipresent, therefore unaffected by limitations of space, as it is also eternal, therefore unaffected by limitations of time. By its incessant action it produces the forms in which matter manifests. These forms are ever changing because spirit is ever operating in and upon them, combining and recombining atoms without cessation. The universe is also the infiniverse. Spirit is universal and infinite, has no outline and is therefore formless. The individualized manifestations of spirit expressed through matter have material forms, however ethereal the matter of which they are constructed may be, but spirit per se has none.

In place of the first proposition above quoted, I would suggest the following for the consideration of Alcinous and others who may be interested:

The universe is composed of spirit and matter, which are co-eternal, and which by acting and reacting upon each other produce individualized minds. The physical element entering largely into the mental, each mind will occupy its own place, higher or lower in the scale according to the character of the physical organism through which it is developed.

In the second proposition I would insert "variety of" between the last two words.

The remaining propositions I would accept as they read and would further say that the three last contain most important truths, some of which I have learned by actual experience. This, however, would furnish matter for a volume and I must at present refrain from entering upon it.

I must now return to the original questions. The fourth in order reads: "Can the ego while in the earthly physical form converse with its astral self?"

While there are some who appear to think this possible, there are objections to the idea which have certainly great weight. Which in this case would be the real ego? that animating the physical, or that which had quitted it together with the astral? If there were two egos, one would be I and the other some other I. Where I am, there is my consciousness. If my astral body leaves the physical and goes elsewhere, and I am conscious of being with it, my physical brain is unconscious. The knowledge gained during my excursion with my astral may be communicated by me to my physical brain on my return, or it may not. But if, being fully conscious of my actual presence in the physical body, I converse with an astral who holds different views to myself or possesses knowledge which I have not, I am forced to the conclusion that it is not I but another who is expressing himself to me in that manner.

The next question is: "What degree of communication exists between an astral body and a spirit (in the sense in which the latter term is accepted)?

The degree of communication existing between the astral body of one yet in physical life and one decarnate is probably subject to considerable variation. Nevertheless, granting even a temporary separation from the grosser physical form, it would seem rational to conclude that the facilities for communication with the unseen would be increased, and experience bears us out in this conclusion. In hours of sleep or in the trance condition, or when our mentalities are totally absorbed in contemplation so that we become oblivious to our physical conditions and material surroundings, are the moments we find specially adapted for converse with the spirit-world. When the astral quits the physical, it is for the time being freed from its restrictions. It is temporarily in a condition similar to that of the discarnate, and can therefore converse with it more readily than at other times. But whether in or out of the body, such communications are between two human minds, and the degree must be dependent on the harmony of vibrations between them: E. J. BOWTELL.

THE CAT OUT OF THE BAG.

Mrs. Atzina M. Knapp, a lately returned Armenian missionary, is now visiting her brother in Lawrence, Kans. The Kansas City Star devotes considerable space with the recital of her story, which is illustrated. We clip one entire paragraph, which gives the lie to the statement of the missionaries, that the terrible massacres are causeless. And the reader will observe: "There are Armenian national committees in all the European capitals striving to stimulate international opinion." It is an old maxim that "fools and children tell the truth." Here the missionary lets the cat out of the bag, and shows that these committees in their heart-rending recitals, are trying "to create sympathy for (the Armenian) their aspirations for political freedom."

Don't misunderstand us: We do not deny that gross excesses, a terrible sacrifice of life and waste of property, has grown out of this rebellion. It is the same as in all countries, Christian, Mohammedan or Pagan, where a revolution is pending. Our own war of Independence, as the war of the Rebellion, have horrid tales to tell, as had the revolution in France, and as is now daily transpiring in Cuba. In semi-civilized countries like Turkey and Armenia, the atrocities are barbarous, and that is all we need say about it. There is greater need of intervention on the part of the great powers, to stay the waste of life and property in our neighboring island than in Turkey. And so all Christian nations would say if Spain was under Mohammedan rule. But here is Mrs. Knapp's statement:

"The Armenians, though once a courageous and warlike people, are now submissive, and have been unable to make resistance against the cruelties practiced upon them by Turkish governors and Kurdish brigands. Of late years, finding that England would do nothing for them, they have started a revolutionary movement in the endeavor to realize their independence through the intervention of the powers. There was a rising in 1882 which the Turks promptly suppressed, but the movement has continued and now there are Armenian national committees in all the European capitals striving to stimulate international opinion of their country's wrongs, and to create sympathy for its aspirations after political freedom."

MOST DEADLY ROT.

The National Christian Citizenship League closed its convention in Chicago last week. Long resolutions were adopted and ordered sent to President Cleveland and President-elect McKinley. The resolutions declare among other things that:

"From the written revelation of divine law we learn that Jesus Christ is the Savior and King, not only of individuals, families, and the church, but also of nations. The law of Christ should be the acknowledged moral standard of our constitutional organization and governmental administration. The public trust of civic office cannot be safely placed in the hands of any class of men except those possessing the Bible standard of qualification—namely: able men chosen from among the people, men who fear God and hate covetousness.

"We commend President Cleveland for his recent distinct official recognition of Jesus Christ as the mediator by whom in confession of sin and thanksgiving we are to come before God."

God in the Constitution! That will be the next move! "Jesus Christ is the Savior and King!" Alas! what next, in this "enlightened" country?

OH, THE BIGOTS.

"Nonchurchgoers in Portland, Me., are much excited over a peculiar canvass now in progress in that city. Under well-organized leaders 280 people are making a house-to-house canvass and reporting to a central committee of churchgoers the names of such as neglect churchly duties. A rumor that a list of delinquents is to be published makes the stay-at-homes fearful that their moral status, as gauged by church attendance, may be in some way affected socially or financially."

The above news item shows to what straits bigots will resort to secure church attendance. When they get God in the Constitution all must attend church.

LAUDABLE.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Indiana is engaged in the laudable attempt to prohibit the sale of cigarettes in that State. We hope they will be successful. Health and life are more endangered by the use of cigarettes than by alcoholic stimulants. The latter is a diffusive stimulant, and increases the heart's action, while tobacco in all its forms is a depressant, decreasing the action of that vital organ, and creating a demand for intoxicants. Both are prejudicial to health and should be avoided as destructives.

SECULARISM AS TAUGHT BY ITS FOUNDER.

A Secularist is defined as one who accepts a system of ethics based on natural morality. He believes that education and government should be conducted without the introduction of a religious element. So early as 1859, that eminent English scholar, G. J. Holyoke, published a book entitled "Principles of Secularism," which has had a large reading among the educated. He seemed to think one life at a time was the design of Nature. He neither affirmed nor denied the existence of a God, or the immortality of the soul; but insisted that as creatures of earth, humanity should do the best it was capable to make this life a happy one. Mr. Holyoke is recognized as the father of Secularism, and justly so. He has just given to the English public a new work, which he entitles, "The Origin and Nature of Secularism," In giving the difference between a Christian and a Secularist, he says: "A Christian seeks to serve God, a Secularist to serve man." He contrasts the two by saying in substance:

1. Secularism substitutes the study of the laws and uses of the universe in place of the study of the origin of the universe. 2. It would make a wise use of this life instead of using it as a preparation for another. 3. In place of Revelation it offers for guidance, observation, investigation, and experience. 4. Instead of the providence of Scripture, it directs to the providence of Science. 5. As a substitute for prayer it proposes self-help and the employment of all the resources of manliness and industry. 6. It teaches that man is a risen, not a fallen creature. 7. For endless perdition it substitutes the warnings and penalties of causation attending the violation of the laws of nature or of truth. 8. Secularism aims at the education of conscience in the service of man, it being a more practical form of duty than service to God.

The author claims that morality is independent of theology; that the teachings of the latter are deceitful, dishonest, and often pernicious; that manliness and freedom are impossible while men are bound to a false superstition. We commend his pithy rules for human conduct as worthy so distinguished a teacher:

1. Truth in speech.
2. Honesty in transactions.
3. Industry in business.
4. Equity in according gain among those whose diligence and vigilance help to produce it.

It is claimed the Ethical Culture Societies, without adopting the name, are practically Secularists. Spiritualists very generally, occupy nearly the same plane.

SAYS HE WON'T STOP.

A quotation appeared in these columns several months ago, extracted from a press interview with F. Hopkinson Smith, an artist who had spent a long time in Turkey, had just returned to New York, and who gave a very pleasant account of life in Constantinople, with his favorable impression of the Sultan, and the assertion that the Turks were goaded to excesses by the outrages of the Armenians, who were incited to wrong-doing by the missionaries. He said the accounts of massacres were greatly exaggerated for the purpose of enlisting outside powers to intervene in behalf of the insurgents. A press dispatch from New York on the 6th inst., contains the following interesting information:

"F. Hopkinson Smith, the author, artist and engineer, who has been vigorous in the use of his tongue and pen in defending the course of the Turks in the Armenian difficulties, has recently received a very unpleasant reminder that there are some persons who object to his statements. He has been, in fact, ordered to cease giving his side of the story for publication under penalty of dire consequences. While the threat was implied, still it was a threat, but Mr. Smith does not wish to consider it as such. He prefers to regard the affair as trivial; but his friends do not agree with him and are afraid something may happen to him.

"Two men have called at his house and given him warning. The second said the Armenian Revolutionary Committee had sent word to Mr. Smith that he must stop defending the Turkish government. 'They say I must stop, do they?' said Smith. 'Well, I won't stop. I know the Sultan is a broad-minded man, with a big heart that is filled with love for his fellow-beings. I know the Armenians have goaded the Turkish people into committing the massacres with the view of arousing the sympathy of Europe. These things I know, and knowing them, I am going to defend the Sultan and his people.'"

FANATICISM REBUKED.

The steamship Tallahassa arrived in New York on the 6th inst., from a long voyage in a disabled condition. To save the vessel and cargo from sinking it was deemed advisable to unload her at once, and place her in the dry dock. The work had progressed but a few hours when the foreman in charge was arrested for violating the Sunday law. The magistrate before whom the case was brought voiced the feelings of all persons of sense when he said:

"It was all nonsense to make this arrest. You might as well arrest a man for endeavoring to subdue the flames if his house is burning on Sunday. The prisoner is discharged."

The wretch who commenced that prosecution would have preferred the ship and crew had gone to the bottom of the sea rather than save it by labor on Sunday. That is the idea he wished the public to believe but it was cheap notoriety he wanted as a zealous Christian. The chickens should roost high in the neighborhood of that fellow's home.

THERE IT IS AGAIN.

Miss Mae Kelley, a very estimable lady of Duluth, Minn., fell dead on the evening of the 10th inst., while singing "He Giveth His Beloved Sleep," at a Catholic fair. Col. Ingersoll is only prodded with severe neuralgiac pains for his blasphemy, while those engaged in adulation of the Supreme are killed outright. Tickling the ear of Omnipotence with praise does not seem to meet with approbation in heavenly circles.

Eloquence is relative. One can no more pronounce on the eloquence of any composition than on the wholesomeness of a medicine without knowing for whom it is intended.—Whately.

Evil is wrought by want of thought as well as by want of heart.—Hood.

THEOMANIACS.

They Say "A Fool Is Born Every Minute and They Never Die."

To the Editor:—The Chicago Record of Friday, the 18th inst., says that "resolutions" were passed the day before at the convention of "Christian" (Jesus-Bible-God-Blood-Cash-Etc.) Citizenship and ordered sent to President Cleveland and President-elect McKinley. The resolutions are declared to be "principles of political science, drawn from the word of God, and essential to the highest welfare of our country." Among them is the following:

"The public trust of civil office cannot be safely placed in the hands of any class of men, except those possessing the Bible standard of qualifications—viz., able men, chosen from among the people; men who FEAR God and hate covetousness. Only by the recognition of these principles can we overcome the evils of the saloons, Sabbath desecration IN ALL FORMS, especially the conscience-debauching Sunday newspaper, the awful blight to our family and social life; the unholy divorce and marriage laws, and all other forms of social impurity; nor to solve such perplexing problems as the relation of our PUBLIC education to Christianity, or the relations of capital to labor."

There you have it! No man should hold office unless he subscribes to old orthodoxy and "fears" God!

Why should not these theomaniacs—we beg pardon of the shade of Webster for coining a new word to describe these fellows with a theological "wheel" buzzing where they should possess brains, but such a word seems necessary—why should they not "resolve" that no man should possess citizenship at all unless he loves endless fire, dotes on the Devil and "fears" God?

"Go to!" theomaniacs—ciphers of intellect—study American history and learn that those who founded this nation "feared" neither God nor King George.

Restrict "Sabbath desecration in all forms"—re-enact the "blue laws," set up whipping posts for those who prefer to laugh in the theater rather than mourn at the "sinners' bench;" cut off the barber-shops and bath-houses—better be unshorn and unclean than offend the "most merciful one;" close the saloons—let the homeless go to church if they want to get warm; abolish spiritual and freethought meetings and lock up the mediums and lecturers in jail for unchristian conduct—their doings and doctrines lead to "perdition," and the people must be "saved." Stop the cars, close the parks, bar the boulevards—it is sinful to indulge in "earthly things" even to get a little fresh air at the risk of being "forever lost" in "eternal torments" with the "Devil and his angels." Compel ALL to enter in at the "straight (laced) gate," walk in the "narrow (minded) path" that leadeth the calves to the "lamb." In a word, abolish personal liberty, restrain mirth and joy and hope. Hurrah for the Inquisition and the Dark Ages!

"Go to!" theomaniacs—your crooked legs show how you dare not desert the "narrow way," how you want to fly the track—both sides at once! Your "nutty" intellects will never turn the course of "the Ship of State."

And the Sunday newspaper! Ah! that "conscience-debauching" Eden "Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil," its fruit so fair to look upon—its sparkling wit is the wine that renders the sensible intellect callous to the "possible last chance of eternal salvation;" its terse and stirring news columns take away any desire the reader may have regarding the doings of "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" in the musty, foul smelling ages of the long-ago; its poetry "knocks out" the snivelling hymn-books of the old "witch burners" and Roger Williams' persecutors—fine examples of charity and mercy. The bright, instructive, entertaining, educational and literary features of the Sunday newspaper are all, according to the Theomaniac, so many open doorways to "Hell." Around its sturdy trunk is wound the serpent of Enlightenment and Wisdom; its bending branches are laden with the fruit of Reason, Observation and Experience—so many apples of spiritual poison, to partake whereof is to suffer spiritual death and forfeit "eternal life."

"Go to!" O, Theomaniacs; go to, with thy tommy-rot.

The Sunday paper is one of the crowning achievements of man, by man and for man.

With it the Sabbath is subordinate to man; without it man is a slave of Sunday superstition and ignorance.

With it the progress of mankind is assured; without it we would drift backward in civilization and the home would be in danger of being pervaded by that sober, long-faced, eat-oats-out-of-a-churn sacred melancholy, so essential to "salvation," that our forefathers (who had no Sunday papers) possessed when they went nosing around for witches and heretics.

The "awful blight" of the Sunday paper is not apparent in the home, where it enters like a burst of sunlight, music and flowers, but in the empty pews of orthodox churches—for he who would desert a home brightened by wife, children and the Sunday paper—the free-thought Sunday trinity—for a salvation pew must be addled in his top story—a true Theomaniac.

If the Sunday paper is a "blight" why not stop all the lesser "blights"—the daily and weekly press? Let nothing be published save by permission of priest or pastor; let every paper have its theomaniac censorship; let the "ads" be interspersed with salvation songs and warnings to the wicked, orthodox mottoes and scriptural texts, and brimstone sermons take the place of the editorial columns. My! How the papers would sell!

And those "unholy divorce and marriage laws!" What's the matter here, Mr. Theomaniac? Are you people missing any fees? Do Spiritualists prefer their own kind of "Rev."?

And your sympathy for down-trodden labor! Is someone working on Sunday who ought to be dropping his nickel in the contribution box?

The public schools are too secular also. The "perplexing problem" of "the relation of our public education to Christianity" must be solved by substituting once one "are" three and three times one "am" one for arithmetic; the Bible for the "reader;" a catechism for chemistry, and the "fear" of God for American history. Let no one teach in the public schools who is not already a Sunday-school teacher. Let the little children learn Bible extracts for their pieces and have school opened and closed each day with salvation songs and prayers.

When only those who "fear" God hold office, when every policeman's "billy" swings for the Bible, when the Sabbath is no longer desecrated by "worldly" recreation, when the world stops revolving every seventh day, when Germans lose their thirst for beer, when birds refuse to sing or fishes swim on Sunday, when the Sunday paper is forever "squelched" and the press is regulated by Theomaniacs, when every "ungodly" place of amusement is closed and only churches are open on Sunday, when all social relations are cut and dried by orthodoxy, when the secular school has been Christianized, when mankind has lapsed back into the Dark Ages and witches and heretics are again burned and the Inquisition once more dominates the land—then, O, then will be the glad dawn of the Millennial Era, the Theomaniac will beg, pray and bully and be the great "I am" of a "perfect" Christian civilization. MENOS.

A PITHY REMARK.

Judge Goggin, of this city, in discharging a young woman from an unlawful arrest the other day, on habeas corpus proceedings, casually remarked in closing:

"They are raising money for the Armenians who are oppressed by the Turks, but it seems to me there are lots of Turks in Chicago."

We suppose the quid nunes will call this an extra-judicial opinion of the learned Judge, but we apprehend a large amount of practical observation passed in review as he made the expression.

S. P PUTNAM AND MISS COLLINS.

S. P. Putnam was a prominent worker in the ranks of liberalism. He was always active, energetic and never failed in being present where his services were most needed. In his death the free-thought movement has lost one of its most valuable members. Miss May Collins whose body was found by the side of Mr. Putnam's was a brilliant young lady, with bright prospects before her had she lived. Her address, delivered in this city, appears on another page, and will be read with great interest by everybody.

SKETCHES

Remember, please, that the outline sketches of persons and things that appear from time to time in The Progressive Thinker have no claim to being high artistic productions. They are simply given for what they purport to be, "sketches," but which can be far more easily recognized than the pale half-tone productions which pass as having merit. The sketches of Miss Collins and S. P. Putnam which appear on our fifth page, together with the lecture of the former, will be instantly recognized by those who are acquainted with the parties.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS.

To all of our readers we extend a cordial greeting, hoping that each one may have a Merry Christmas, and, wherever possible, see to it that the poor and unfortunate are favored with some of the good cheer that usually accompanies this day among the prosperous. Though this day is of Pagan origin, and in no sense any more sacred than any other day of the week, yet custom has attached to it significant importance and so far as it results in adding temporary pleasure and happiness to each one, feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, it is most excellent.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

We publish his last Pen Flashes this week from the Pacific Coast. His next communication will probably come from Australia.

THIS NUMBER OF THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

It will be found especially interesting. From the first to the last page the interest will not lag.

VERILY, WHAT NEXT?

Under the head of "A New Programme," we announced a radical new departure from the general routine of work assumed by the average Spiritualist paper. We do not follow old established usages unless we are thoroughly convinced that they are the best, which is very rarely the case. We established the original dollar Spiritualist paper, and introduced a new era in the line of Spiritualistic journalism. Others have followed after us, but in all candor the only thing in which they have equalled us, is in the price of the paper—one dollar.

We now have three books which we send out at a nominal cost to our subscribers: The two volumes of the Encyclopaedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit-World, and The Next World Interviewed. The three volumes will be sent out to those who remit a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker The Encyclopaedia of Death and Life in the Spirit-World, when ordered singly, will be sold at 50 cents per copy. The Next World Interviewed at 35 cts. Those who order the three books at one time will get them as follows:

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	$ .45
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	.45
The Next World Interviewed	.35
Total	$1.25

NO. OF PAGES IN EACH BOOK.

Vol. I. of the Encyclopaedia	400
Vol. II. of the Encyclopaedia	400
The Next World Interviewed	250

Each of these books is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and printed on fine paper, and as prices go, are well worth one dollar per volume.

Bear in mind that this Library is being formed for the exclusive benefit of our subscribers, and all orders for one or more of these books must be accompanied with a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. To all others the price will be one dollar per copy.

Just think of the great good that will be accomplished by this plan which we have outlined. Tell your neighbors about it, and get them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

I have long thought that the different abilities of men, which we call wisdom or prudence for the conduct of public affairs or private life, grow directly out of that little grain of good sense which they bring with them into the world, and that the defect of it in men comes from some want in their conception or birth.—Sir W. Temple.

Waste cannot be accurately told, though we are sensible how destructive it is. Economy on the one hand, by which a certain income is made to maintain a man genteelly, and waste on the other, by which, on the same income, another man lives shabbily, cannot be defined. It is a very nice thing; as one man wears his coat out much sooner than another, we cannot tell how.—Johnson.

Surely oak and the threefold brass surrounded his heart who first trusted a frail vessel to the merciless ocean.—Horace.

A man's fortune is frequently decided by his first address. If pleasing, others at once conclude he has merit; but if ungraceful, they decide against him.—Chesterfield.

There are hosts of men, of the profoundest thought, who find nothing in the disclosures of science to shake their faith in the eternal virtues of reason and religion.—George Ripley.

Different minds incline to different objects; one pursues the vast alone, the wonderful, the wild; another sighs for harmony and grace, and gentlest beauty.—Akenside.

SOLON AND MARY.

CHAPTER I.

THE FUTURE OF ELECTRICITY.

SOLON AND MARY VISIT BENJAMIN FRANKLIN WITHIN THE HEAVENLY SPHERES.

After we had constructed our home among the angels, we desired to visit some of those beautiful Temples of Wisdom which we had passed after entering in at the gate of the Shining City. As we were now a completed angel, our thoughts and desires were one—although we bore two forms, yet, like the two hemispheres of a human brain, acting simultaneously for the elimination of thought, our two spiritual bodies, the positive and the negative, or male and female, acted in like manner, in perfect unison and harmony for the eliminating of thoughts and desires on a greater, grander scale than is possible for a spirit, or a man or woman singly. An earthly man's thought, at best, is an imperfect half thought, although forceful and positive; a woman's thought is an imperfect half-thought, although a shade more spiritual, interior, and less positive; but, when the true union of the right positive and negative takes place, as it invariably must before an angel can be formed, then the thoughts, which are eliminated from the blending, become round, full, perfect and harmonious in all their parts, and may be compared to beautiful, lovely and perfect children, which they represent.

The physical union of man and woman, on the lower plane of life, brings forth the physical bodies of children. As physical human bodies are not generated in the spiritual and angelic spheres, the union of the spiritual bodies of man and woman bring forth perfect and beautiful thoughts, which, to them, are their spiritual or angelic children; and as each thought, eliminated from the blending, is but one thought—or one child—it can be readily understood how impossible it would be for one half to think one way and the other half to think another way, or, that one should desire one thing and the other something else. If this were to happen, it would be conclusive evidence that the two spirits were not, and never could become an angel. But the great, unchangeable, natural law is—that until the true union takes place, an angel cannot be the result, they are yet but wandering spirits, seeking to become an angel—desiring to enter the angelic cities. Such had been Mary; such had been Solon; such, nevermore to be—the angel was perfected; their thoughts and desires were one.

And thus our thoughts went forth as one thought, our desires as one desire.

We desired, first, to visit a shining temple which we had observed on our way hither. As all the temples, which we had seen, differed from each other, we had no difficulty in remembering the appearance of the one we wished to enter first.

This temple had dazzled us with its beauty and brightness. It had seemed to our sight somewhat as the sun appears to the eyes of man, or, rather, as a rising sun when but half its disk is seen above the horison. It was in the form of a great, rising sun, shooting forth innumerable rays of dazzling light, each ray pencilled in all the exquisite colors of the rainbow, but far more beautiful and refined than the heavier, coarser colors of the earthly rainbow.

The temple was in the form of a perfect half-globe, its base resting on a bank of rosy clouds for the earth of the angelic city was not more dense than the clouds of earth, and these clouds were piled up like an earthly high hill, or mountain, terrace upon terrace, cloud upon cloud.

The door of the temple was reached by many, very many, steps of palest, shining gold. We observed, as we approached, a beautiful banner flying from the apex of the temple, formed like a kite; and as we inspected it more closely, we saw that the long, golden string of the beautiful kite was held in the hands of a tiny statue, appearing like pale bronze, the face upturned, the eyes looking earnestly at the flying, floating wavering kite, as it pitched and tossed about. Upon the shining, white surface of the kite were the following words: "The Truth Shall Make Us Free."

Over the arched, amber entrance to the interior of this beautiful temple, was the name, written in words of flaming light: "Benjamin Franklin," and, upon the door: "Electrical Institute." In a half-circle, over a small, white button, were the words: "Whosoever desires to enter, touch this button." Touching the button, the door at once opened wide, and, we entered, immediately finding ourselves within a vast space, for, the half-globe, forming the temple, was very large—so large, indeed, that it appeared very much as the domed heavens of earth appear, the interior being of a pale blue.

We looked around with eager curiosity. There being no vestibule, the thought occurred to us that Franklin's economy did not admit of anything which could be called superfluous. That which met our gaze was wonderful in the extreme.

In the center of this vast, circular room was a raised dais or throne, and, standing upon it, were two forms, which we recognized at once as those belonging to Benjamin Franklin; for Franklin, like all who have attained angelhood, bore two forms, male and female, and, like all other angels, there was no disparity between the two forms—they balanced and perfected each other; they were one—and therefore we shall speak of them as Franklin.

The dais was revolving slowly around, so that Franklin's eyes could successfully take in all the details of this vast workshop, as we may call it, and no part escape scrutiny, for they were directing, personally, all this intricate business.

The dais slowly revolved until their eyes met ours; they smiled and saluted us; then, like a revolving light, their radiant glances were lost to us for a short time: immediately there flashed out, on the blue walls of the temple, in letters of flaming gold, the following sentences:

"Electricity is the motive power revolving this dais. All harbor lights, as well as revolving lights, will yet be lighted and worked by the aid of electricity. Electric cable wires will be run to all shoals, dangerous reefs, rocks, and small islands; and groups together will be instantly lighted by the touch of a finger. This appertains to the earth below. FRANKLIN."

Again the radiant glances and smiles flashed upon us, then, slowly disappeared, as around the dais swung, and other sentences flashed out on the blue vault:

"All signalling will yet be done after the manner of this writing—it will be projected, by electrical apparatus, from high towers, against the atmosphere, for even hundreds of miles out over the sea. Towers will yet be erected all over the habitable, earthly, globe, and messages, of various import, will be projected into the atmosphere, to be read by thousands of people at once. Immense electrical flash-lights, will, at some future period, reach the moon, and the inhabitants of Mars; pictorial representations will be hurled into their atmospheres, and responses, from the inhabitants of Mars, will be obtained. The moon is not inhabited by man—nothing, as yet, but few of the lower reptiles. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN."

Franklin now descended from the dais, and with welcoming eyes, and smiling lips, approached us; our hands met in a sympathetic clasp:

"We feel honored," he said, "that this Institute should be the first to be visited by a new-made angel. Will you come with us and take seats upon the dais? It will be to you as an observatory."

We gladly consented, and soon found ourselves— together with Franklin—slowly revolving, as the dais swung around.

"Electricity is the pivot, or motive power, on which all worlds swing within their orbits. Electricity will yet be the motive power of all machinery that will move on earth; and the earth will soon be circumnavigated, entirely, by means of electricity; behold! all cars will be run by electricity; all ships which plough the ocean or seas; vehicles, of all kinds, will be moved by its power; all printing will be done by its aid; everywhere, where fire is needed, there will it be called into requisition, and the whole world will be lighted by it. We are now merely speaking of the earth on which we once lived. Every ray which shoots forth from all suns are purely electrical, and electricity is the principle, or moving power of all life and growth wherever found. Electricity will yet carry airships swiftly around the earthly globe, and transport its inhabitants from one point to another with the swiftness of the lightning's flash; and, poor crazy Ben., as he used sometimes to be called, will receive his just meed of praise.

How many times, when on earth, he wandered, with aching heart, away from all human habitation, carrying his folded kite, hidden beneath the skirts of his long surtout, to get away from the rabble who were continually surrounding him, if he did not, sneering, and crying out: "There goes crazy Ben! That fool! That lunatic—Franklin! He is possessed of a devil, and it ought to be whipped out of him. Come; let us complain of him—have him taken before the Magistrate—who will order him to be tied to the whipping-post, and given the proper number of lashes—that will send the evil spirit out of him."

His own wife looked at him with curious, half-fearful eyes, and begged him to refrain from such foolish projects. "I am ashamed of you;" she said, "going about like a schoolboy, with a kite beneath your arm! What will the people say? they are all talking about you now. Are you demented, Ben? or, getting foolish?" and she would wind up with ridicule, poking fun at him.

Thus it has ever been; thus it will be while some brave souls lead the way for the multitude to follow.

O! ye dames, and damsels; ye husbands, and young men; see to it that ye do not likewise. Encourage and sustain those who think they have some higher truth to give the world—some grand secret of nature to discover and divulge.

If Franklin had not been a man of means, with considerable influence among those who were higher in power, he would, most assuredly, have been tied to the whipping-post, and soundly flogged, for trying to bring down lightning from the clouds, and bottling it up; but, his astute mind could, even then, see what great results would follow, if he could but chain the lightning and make use of it" said he.

"My dear Solon," continued Franklin, you will readily understand, that if the electrical rays from the sun can paint the clouds in all imaginable colors, likewise, an electrical light can be so arranged that it can, at first, paint the clouds by the projecting of colored rays arranged in the form of letters, or pictures, and, as people grow wiser still, they can thus paint the evening sky, and, last of all, the clear blue dome of the heavens. Think not, my Solon, that Franklin is idle, or ever has been since he left the earth, for, as fast as he could think out or discover a new method for the use of the electrical current, immediately he put himself en rapport with some person, yet on the earth, who had sufficient brain power to receive the impressions conveyed, work them out, and give them to the world. What did he care whether they bore the name of Morse, Edison, or any other name? What is in a name, after all? It is light and truth which the people on the earth want; the man who gives it is but the medium between the heavens and the earth; names are of little account, and might as well be wiped out, as for that matter."

"Well," we asked, "how about the air-ships?"

"Look!" he replied, and we looked.

Ah, yes; it was all clear at once!

"Powerful magnets placed on high eminences will draw the electrical current as straight as the needle to the pole. Manage your air-ship in that way, and they will soon become a success. A powerful magnet placed on the highest eminence in New York will draw an electrical air-ship in a straight line from Boston, and so on from place to place around the globe," and the pictorial representation of this was what we were looking at as he pointed.

"Now we come to pictures," continued Franklin: "we paint all our thoughts as pictures, on the brain of sensitives still on earth. They say that they see such and such scenes, or that they are impressed with this and that; many laugh and sneer at them.

"Oh! ye thick heads—whose brains are, in comparison, as coarse, brown paper, to that finely prepared sensitive paper of the photographer—laugh not, neither sneer, for such acts but proclaim your own obtuseness! Look in a mirror, laugh and sneer at the reflection it gives you, and you will have a boon companion; for what gives you back your own reflection or picture? Electrical rays, nothing more, nothing less; electrical rays, which you call light, strike first your, sneering face, from thence dart straight on their course; where? oh! sneering face?—straight for the great magnetic globe, the counterpart of the sun, they cannot get through the mirror, for some cunning hand has placed an impenetrable shield at the back of the glass; they cannot get through that way, therefore they bend or are deflected from their straight course, and throw the picture of your sneering face back on your own obtuse brain, through the camera of your haughty eyes; but the rays do not stop there, but once more deflect after leaving the picture or impression; they are but slightly robbed; a thousand other rays are carrying the picture straight on to impress it on whatever is impressible; the same rays which have shown you the picture soon join their comrades, and your sneering face has, perhaps, been photographed a thousand times before it reaches the great magnetic globe; here it is at last absorbed and changed from a sneer to wonder and amazement! for neither the mind of man, spirit nor angel, is able to conceive of the working of this great laboratory; herein, as with the brain of man, are stored all the pictures which the electrical rays of its counterpart, the sun, have ever brought to it. More than this I am not able, at present, to tell you, my dear Solon. All pictures, whatever their nature, will yet be painted by the use of electrical rays, which will make them so life-like they will only need a living spirit within, to cause them to move and speak: all printing will eyetually be done in the same way, and, Ben. Franklin with his kite hidden beneath the tails of his coat, for fear of the rabble whom he wished to benefit, and the sneers of his wife whom he desired to love, was the medium, or key, which unlocked all this wealth of useful knowledge to the world."

Franklin looked at us with his large, searching, beautiful, brown eyes, and the massive dome of his grand head rose above him, shooting forth rays of fine electric light, shoot forth the rays of the sun; but the two brains acted like one, (one a magnetic globe, the other electric,) male and female, positive and negative.

No; Ben. Franklin never went insane, although some who laughed and sneered at him did. Ben. Franklin did not die in the gutter a drunkard, although some of the most urgent to have him whipped did. Ben Franklin never came to want or starvation, yet some of his enemies did. He began with one loaf, and ended his earthly carreer with a million: his money was dross, and he left it, but his despised kite, his electricity, his knowledge and power he carried with him.

Poor! Where he flew one kite, he has now flown a million; but the dome of his angelic temple still retains the image of the little forlorn, despised kite, and its holder, a miniature copy of Ben. himself.

We left the dais; Franklin bade us adieu, and we departed to our home among the angels, within that shining city we had so long waited to enter.

THE CHURCH OF THE SOUL.

To the Editor:—I fear our friends at a distance will think the Church of the Soul, has ceased to exist; if so, let me assure them we are "still on deck," sending out as best we can the pure white rays of spiritual light. In common, however, with humanity at large, we have felt the pressure financially of the times, making it in this respect a little harder to "paddle our own canoe," but the years gone by stand out in bold relief as proof positive that we are not made of stuff that can be frightened by trifles, and therefore, we are not only patiently waiting for the good times which are promised, but we are still ready to make personal sacrifices for the sake of our noble cause. I cannot in one letter tell you all that has been done since the season opened, especially as I want to announce the change that has been made in the Band of Harmony, which for some time past has been in a transition state.

During the present month it has been reorganized; with Mrs. M. Haire as president, Mrs. S. Gieselman, as secretary, and Mrs. Dr. Bushnell as treasurer, and in doing this it has been thought best to yield to the general wish, and hold the Thursday evening meeting at the different private homes of our friends.

This has been decided upon for two reasons: First and foremost because it was felt in the home the social feature could be better taken care of than in a public hall; and, second, for financial reasons, chopping off expenses wherever it could be wisely done, thus letting whatever financial benefits there might be, go direct into the treasury of the church, instead of to the landlord.

The new move was inaugurated on Thursday, December 3rd, at the charming home of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Roger's Park. About fifty responded to the invitation, and future plans were discussed, and work mapped out. On Thursday, December 10th, the home of our president; Dr. Dewolf was placed at our service, and about ninety enjoyed the exercises of the evening.

But perhaps that which makes the change a more important one, is the organization of an afternoon Ladies meeting for the purposes of social intercourse and spiritual upbuilding. These meetings will be especially devoted to the discussions of such subjects as are of especial interest to women. About forty names are already upon the new roll and these we trust will be continually increasing numbers. The plan proposed is to hold these meetings alternately on the three available sides of the city. The ladies meeting at three o'clock—taking with them a light lunch, in order to save the hostess any additional trouble, and remaining for the evening meeting at eight o'clock when the gentlemen will put in an appearance. The general social feature will not be lost sight of, and probably a monthly social will be provided for when the plans are all matured.

Thus the ball keeps rolling, and perhaps we are surely if slowly learning the lesson that that which looks like shadow is often the vehicle which bears to us our greatest blessings. Yours fraternally CAROLINE CATLIN.

"Voltaire's Romances," translated from the French. With numerous illustrations. These lighter works of the brilliant Frenchman, and invincible enemy of the Catholic Church, are worthy of wide reading. Wit, philosophy and romance are combined, with the skill of a master mind. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

"The Religion of the Future." By Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and well repaid by its perusal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

THE UNFORTUNATES

"A Plea for the New Woman."

A Lecture Delivered in Chicago by Miss May Collins, the Brilliant Young Lady, Who With S. P. Putnam, Was Found Dead in Boston, Mass.

It has been abundantly proven by able historians and economists that the actions of mankind, in the aggregate, are governed by law. To this, statistics bear ample evidence. The physical, mental, and moral are no longer believed to be subject to the decrees of providence and separated each from the other by a wall erected by a capricious deity. Belonging each in the domain of the natural, they shade into each other by such minute gradations that it is beyond the power of the human intellect to discover where the one ends and the other begins, or if, in reality, they have any actual existence apart from each other. On this belief in invariable order rests the philosopher's hope for the future; and that mind and morals, as well as matter, are governed by law, must be conceded before a solid foundation for a future science of ethics is possible. Nature's laws work slowly but surely; and it is by the study of her methods in the governance of mankind that we gather strength, tenderness, and determination.

Conceding that mental and moral phenomena, like physical phenomena, are governed by law, immutable and invariable, it is reasonable to suppose that the advance of liberty, as expressed in the growth of human equality, is no exception to the same general law, and that the attainment of this great prize is not the joyous achievement of a moment, accompanied by a trumpet blast of sudden triumph, but a slow and painful evolution, fraught with blood and tears extending upward through many long centuries of alternate war and peace, privilege and conquest, extortion and submission, arrogance and servility, monopoly and labor, degradation and woe. It is not a difficult thing to discern that the general drift of human society, during its different stages of development, is towards democracy. Of course there are smaller and more insignificant laws that operate against the larger and more powerful ones, and thus impede human progress, but these, in their turn, being counteracted by other small laws, their influence gradually diminishes, and, in the sweep of evolution, is very nearly, or entirely, lost sight of; while the general current of human affairs, controlled by those larger and more unvarying laws, never recedes, but continues always upward and onward.

So with this great principle of equal rights. Those whose influence operates against it may affect private and individual opinion, and thus, in a greater or less degree, retard its progress; but "there is a divintly that shapes our ends," and that great and powerful law of evolution, loaded with purpose, and each day pushing us farther (whether we will or no) toward the kingdom of liberty and the goal of justice, is not to be overcome by such mean feeling and petty endeavor; and the signs of the times show that the tyranny of sex is as sure to be uprooted from our social, political, financial, and marital systems in the progress of civilization, as is the divine right of priest and king, and the right of the rich to control the poor. This is law, and the progress of the last few centuries proclaims it. Conditions must and will be so arranged that no individual will be oppressed and hampered by social and political laws, or proscribed and restricted to any special sphere, each being left free to develop his or her particular tastes, talents, or inclinations in any way preferred, and unfettered by those conventional rules established by the ignorance and superstition of past ages, which, if observed in every particular, would be a death blow to individual aspiration and ambition. Growth is inherent throughout the universe, and it was never intended that hope should cease, or the waters of life grow stagnant. In the tenderest sentiments of the human heart, in the holiest aspirations of the human mind, in all that enriches and ennobles human thought in all that constitutes a broad mentality, nature finds her highest expression. And it is the law of love alone, of which Prof. Joseph Rodes Buchanan speaks, that is to stifle by degrees every unkind feeling, and purge the human mind of all uncleanliness, until not a vestige of primitive barbarism remains to recall the history of a degraded past.

Everywhere to-day are the evil results of a false education regarding the destiny, duties, and privileges of one-half the human race. The progress of the human intellect, as recorded in history, stands as a burning witness to the fact that the dark and dingy superstition regarding woman's sphere sink into oblivion in proportion as we emerge from cruelty into kindness, from slavery into independence, from barbarism into an enlightened civilization. Not many realize this fact, however, for they have not the knowledge of evolution, and, above all, the historical culture, that would enable them to appreciate it. How few recognize the force of natural law, and its bearing upon our deportment and dealing with our fellow mortals! When a farmer plants a crop of corn or wheat he does not select a scraggy, barren district, where growth is impossible, but a fertile soil, where nature's bosom yields sufficient nourishment, and where an abundant harvest will be the outcome of a healthful climate. We do not plant seed in our garden and hedge the spot about with a great high fence, so that the tree which springs from the seed cannot spread and branch beyond certain limits, and burst into blossom and fruit, according to its innate tendency. The laws of nature imply growth, and in planting a tree or a crop we observe her laws. Again, in order that a flower may blossom prettily, we do not place it in a dark cellar or loathsome vault, where dampness and decay are inevitable, and where the root has the advantage of neither sunshine nor rain to insure its health and increase its vitality. We do not do this; yet the rude restraints and artificial barriers we place about women bear a striking resemblance to the illustration offered.

Let us consider this question from a sociological standpoint. Of the fact that the mental and moral elevation of a country depends largely upon the share its women have in the formation of social laws and customs, and upon the degree in which they participate in religious and legislative assemblies, conspicuous illustrations abound in history—illustrations too numerous to mention here. Sparta furnishes a striking example of some of the bravest men, some of the most energetic, daring, and resolute spirits that ever adorned the pages of human history. Every possible opportunity was afforded women for self-culture, both mental and physical; and to their constant training of body and mind was due the supreme and important position which Sparta held in the annals of Greece. Women were fitted especially for maternity, but maternity was conceived in the highest and broadest sense of the word. Prof. James Donaldson says: "Many of the wives were better educated than their husbands, and the fact was noticed by others. 'You of Lacedemon,' said a strange lady to Gorgo, wife of Leonidas, 'are the only women in the world that rule the men.' 'We' she replied, are the only women in the world that bring forth men.' There is a great deal of point in what Gorgo said. If women bring forth and rear men, they are certain to receive from them respect and tenderness, for there is no surer test of a man's real manhood than his love for all that is noblest, highest, and truest in woman, and his desire to aid her in attaining to the full perfection of her nature."

Strange it is that, in this day of scientific thought and philosophic inquiry, there are many who regard the question of woman's education and enfranchisement as a sex question, and not as one affecting the whole human race. Only a careless student of history, and a superficial observer of human affairs, could leap to such a rash conclusion, for in whatever question women is involved, man is involved also, and whenever she resists oppression, and is led by the hand of progress into newer and broader lines of thought and action, there is that gradual uplifting of human character which is everywhere the natural accompaniment of an increased liberty and higher education. But there can be no true education, no solid understanding, no genuine footing for human progress, until we all begin to recoginze our power, and to know that the slightest neglect of any faculty or organ of the brain and soul with which nature has endowed us will be so much missing from that current of thought that is to sparkle and glow through all eternity.

So tight a grip has ancient law and theology upon our minds, that we are prone to think of women as things, rather than creatures; as so much material out of which we can construct things after our own fashion, forgetting that this material consists of a variety of individauls, each having, in some degree, the faculty of construction herself. To do this is to ignore the laws of heredity, of human psychology, of that spiritual force with which women are peculiarly endowed, and which, if surrounded by happy conditions, they will transmit to their offspring. It has been well said that the crime against maternity is the greatest of all crimes, and one which nature, in her stern degrees of equity, will neither forget nor gorgive. For women have a vast and far-reaching influence in moulding the human race, not alone in the ordinary transmission of traits from parent to offspring, but in prenatal influence; and no nation can reach the topmost round of the ladder of statesmanship and good government until its women breathe the pure air and walk in the bright sunlight of liberty. A true republic would suffer oppression to no one, however humble, dwelling beneath its flag; and the nation that substitutes chivalry for justice, and thus lowers and humiliates its women, as such shallow government must necessarily do, will go down with them into the miasma and slums of superstition, thus reaping the fruits of its own miserable polity and driving thorns into its own heart. Too much cannot be said of the favorable conditions which should surround matenity; of the mysterious laws that form the character of an embryo for good or ill; of the splendid possibilities that should open to her who is to give birth and training to the children yet to be; of the right of choice so necessary to her highest development. But the influence of women, however great, is, after all, only subsidiary, and in all humanity are imbedded those psychic forces which, if kept pure, untainted, and free from corruption, kill, reappear with still greater splendor in a remote posterity. As long as we hold to the opinion that one sex, because of its weakness and incapacity to recover itself after once having fallen, should observe the laws of chastity (or rather what society chooses to call chastity) in a greater degree than the other we fail to recognize the fact that it is not woman alone, but man and woman together, which make up the complete human unit, and bequeath to the child those germs of character that for good or ill, for weal or woe, for strength or weakness, form the occult impulses which are to guide it through the cosmic realm of being. Likewise those who hold that the action of women should be limited to the narrow domain of home forget that a woman can be moral without being stupid, domestic without being subservient, and even sentimental without being silly. "I do not," says John Stuart Mill, "know of a more signal instance of the blindness with which the world, including its herd of studious men, ignore and pass over all the influences of social circumstances than their silly depreciation of the intellectual, and silly panegyrics on the moral, nature of women."

We are told that women do not want liberty, but how far is this based on fact? And, again, is the measure of the desires of a people always the measure of their needs? Many of the slaves during our late civil war did not want liberty, and did ask for it; the same with many of the Roman slaves; yet who will deny that liberty was necessary to their better development? Scarcely a question in oppression of any sort but what presents two sides—the one a garden where flowers spring up and fill the air with fragrance, the other a "sepulcher" strewn with rags and "dead men's bones." Perhaps around the heart of the negro now living there cluster no tenderer memories during his departing years than those of the dear old antebellum days, when, after the close of a hard day's work in the cotton field and a hearty meal, he would stretch himself at his master's feet, sing and play the banjo for him whom he loved—gone, forever gone!—but whose kindness and loving solicitude for his welare, it would be heartless to forget. Considered from a sentimental standpoint, in this case life was worth living; oppression had its sunny side, slavery was softened and concealed by the cunning drapery of romance. It is the contrast which exites our admiration—the white picture against a black back-ground! But this is not all. Verily "the trail of the serpent is over the best and purest of God's works." A scene takes place too sickening, too bloody, too revolting to describe, at which we instinctively shrink back in terror. The white picture has disappeared, and a dark shadow mingles itself with the canvas. Harmony turns into discord, and, even in our imagination, we involuntarily shudder at the depth and anguish of human woe. 'Tis the slave-mother parting with her child; and the piercing cry of human agony that rends the air reaches our ear and sends a shock to the innermost core of our being.

Parallel to the illustration just offered, there are instances in domestic life when tenderness conquers subjection, when personal feeling is laid aside, and the husband loses his authority in the intensity of his love. But this is only another white picture against a black-back-ground. On the other hand, numerous are the evils resulting from the system of inequality between the sexes. Enforced motherhood, unwelcome children, divorce suits, scandals, wife-murders, and other tales of domestic warfare too horrible to contemplate, make society throughout one seething mass of discord and contumely. Manifold are the hidden wrongs sapping the life-blood of the oppressed, and sending untold millions down to their graves in the flush of youth. Waiving the cruelty of custom which fain would close the mouths of those who complain it is the nature of some people to suffer secretly, and bear secretly, and go down to their death in silence.

In regard as to whether the desires of a person are always the measure of their needs, permit me to add by way of parenthesis the following passage by John Stuart Mill:

"Concessions of the privileged," says Mr. Mill, "to the unprivileged are so seldom brought about by any better motive than the power of the unprivileged to extort them, that any arguments against the prerogative of sex are likely to be little attended to by the generality, as long as they are able to say to themselves that women do not complain of it. That fact certainly enables men to retain the unjust privilege some time longer; but does not render it less unjust. Exactly the same thing may be said of the women in the harem of an Oriental; they do not complain of not being allowed the freedom of European women, and think our women insufferably bold and unfeminine." And commenting on the same, Mrs. Mill observes. "Women, it is said, do not desire, do not seek what is termed their emancipation, but, on the contrary, generally disown such claims when made in their behalf, and fall with 'acharnement' upon any one of their sex who identifies herself with their common cause. Supposing this fact to be true in the fullest extent ever asserted, if it proves that European women ought to remain as they are, it proves exactly the same with regard to Asiatic women; for they, too, instead of murmuring at their seclusion, and at the restraint imposed on them, pride themselves on it, and are astonished at the affrontery of women who receive visits from male acquaintances, and are singing in the streets unveiled. Habits of submission make men as well as women, servile-minded. The vast population of Asia do not desire or value, probably would not accept, political liberty, nor the savages of the forest, civilization; which does not prove that either of them are right."

These facts noted by Mr. and Mrs Mill cannot be urged too often. The Chinese empire excludes the better quality of machinery, but that does not detract from the value of invention.

To affirm that women do not want liberty is to affirm what we cannot prove. To be justified in withholding liberty from a certain class, or a certain sex, we should first be able to prove that none of that class or none of that sex is entitled to or desires it. I think I can say, without fear of contradiction, that thousands of women are waiting, eager to enter the realm of politics and make a name for themselves; not to speak of the rapidly increasing number who are finding their way into the learned professions. The truth is, a large majority of women have become so accustomed to a stunted growth that they do not realize their own pitiable and mentally-starved condition. Deeply lamenting that they cannot appreciate the great doctrine of human equality, which is an essential part of all genuine philosophy and ethical science, at the same time it is scarcely fair that they should serve as models of conduct and deportment for the rest of mankind, who, with a consciousness peculiar to themselves, feel a voice from within that bids them follow its guidance and persevere in whatever seemeth the best, laying aside prejudice and what some women may not want, let us look this matter squarely in the face, never forgetting that, as rational creatures, we should deal out justice to all. It is a most serious question which confronts us, and no effort should be made to blink the truth or escape just conclusions. Let us not forget that the coarsest and most depraved rum-seller of foreign extraction in the city of Cincinnati to-night—however diseased in mind and body he may be, and whatever reason he may conjure up to despise the American flag which protects him—is, under the present legal status, a full-fledged individual, invested not alone with the ballot and other rights of citizenship, but with marital rights, which church and state give him the privilege of enforcing to the utmost, and which often furnish an excuse for the most flagitious of crimes. But the poor wife can claim no legal redress, unless he openly deserts, outrages, or murders her. Only callousness, or utter indifference, or, what is more, ignorance could blind our eyes to the crime and humiliation, the degradation and woe, that not alone in our own fair country, but in all parts of the world where there is human habitation, form the sequel and corollary of the subjection of woman. And these wrongs will never be righted until women enter the arena of thought and industry, and are permitted equal footing and just competition with men. Life is a sharp contest, a bitter struggle at best, and we cannot urge too often the necessity of each individual being taught the duty of moral responsibility, self-control, and financial independence. In this way, and this way alone, can they learn to overcome the defects transmitted by their ancestry, and grapple successfully with the hardships and inconveniences to which their environment may subject them.

Out of the very nature of things rise reasons innumerable why women should be accorded complete and full emancipation. Just as observation teaches that one-half of a peach cannot grow ripe and mellow beneath the warm breath of the sun, while the other half remains green and tasteless, so every step of progress in the study of heredity and the laws that govern material and spiritual existence goes farther toward illustrating the universal truth that one-half of humanity cannot attain an enviable rank in the realm of science, philosophy, and invention until the other half is prepared to go with them and partake of the bounty and manifold blessings that science holds in store for the future. If we could only shake off these wild vagaries of a diseased imagination, forgetting that woman was ever in slavery, and lift her up, as by magic, to be seat of destiny for which she is strangely endowed, we would be astounded at the wonderous change that would be wrought as in a day, and the splendid educational opportunities which would open to the human race an infinite realm of thought and action. I do not say that sin and sorrow would be no more, but I do say that if women were elevated to their proper sphere, it would usher in a new day—the dawning of supreme good to the human family.

The emancipation of mankind, however, from the selfishness and brutality of primitive barbaric customs is not the result of miracle or of special providence, but of a tedious evolution—of natural law working in and through society. A single day may bring about the conversion of individuals, but the growth of a nation is slow, and depends upon the many different stages of development through which the many different intellects pass in slow succession. We cannot judge of a nation by the achievements of its best minds alone, but by the amount of brain that results in the aggregate. To speak with greater precision, we cannot estimate a nation's ability by the extent of learning and invention among the ambitious few, but by the extent to which knowledge and industry prevail among all classes, considered separately and as a whole. The advocates of human freedom, on the one hand, have science and history for their allies, but on the other side are ages of ignorance to contend with—ignorance which has its root in the human feeling and extending over every ground of passion and prejudice. Here is where the stream of human progress meets with the greatest resistance. Some one has said that man's only sin is ignorance: whether this be true or not, it is certainly the source from which the strongest opposition to any innovation for the better usually comes. If it is true that "broad ideas hate partial ideas," it is still more true that partial ideas hate broad ideas. Ignorance is the natural enemy of liberty. The growth of the human mind marks the progress of freedom.

The fact that the extent to which war is waged in a country is also apportioned to the amount of ignorance which characterizes the masses, presents another standpoint from which we can view the progress of human rights. That the decline of the warlike spirit, together with the consequent increase of industrialism, have been potent factors in the emancipation of the human mind no careful sudent, in the face of past and present experience, would venture to deny. No one who views the wandering tribes of Africa, the blacks of Australia, and the wretched condition of the Turks and the inhabitants of most parts of Asia, will contend that fights and feuds are anything but demoralizing in the effects they produce on the human mind. To strike another is in its very nature, calculated to blunt the finer sensibilities of the soul. Buckle has shown that the desire of knowledge and the desire of shedding blood, are rarely, if ever, combined. However, in the ancient world, when weapons of defense were more necessary, this rule did not hold good; the historian cites such exceptions as Demosthenes, Socrates, Alcibiades, and others, who were eminent as statesmen and thinkers, as well as worthy soldiers. But in late years military ardor and great learning have been united in very few; probably with the exception of Descartes, who not only excelled in literature, philosophy, and mathematics, but was admirable as a soldier. (See Buckle's "History of Civilization in England," Vol. I., chapter IV. pages 137—147). That military and industrial activity should operate in exactly opposite directions in their influence on the standing and opportunities of women, seems quite natural and inevitable. In times of war it is quite natural that women should be placed at a great disadvantage; and the softening influence often exerted by them in mitigating the atrocities of the sword is not justly attributable to their superior tenderness, but their lack of physical prowess. Concerning primitive women it has been said that "it is not lack of will, but lack of power, which prevents them from displaying natures equally brutal with those of primitive men." The same rule, I think, might well apply to the women of modern times. The physically weak dread violence, and had rather submit than rebel. There are, however, some notable variations from the physical inferiority of women, both in the ancient and modern world, and were it not for the chronic ill-usage to which the generality of them are subjected during nomadic and semi-civilized stages, the exceptions might be more remarkable. That the tendency of war, even in its mildest form, is to increase this ill-usage, and thus lower the status of women, while the tendency of peace and industry is the direct opposite, has been very admirably illustrated by Herbert Spencer in "Principles of Sociology," under the head of "Domestic Institutions," wherein it is held that the despotism which militancy necessarily gives rise to is collaterally connected with an absolute head in the family. Another idea advanced in the chapter on the "Status of Women" is this, and it appears quite conclusive—namely, that the more inducements there are for men to enter the army, the more binding on women will it be to remain closely at home, thus being forced to bear the responsibility, not only of rearing the family, but of providing for it, often under the most stringent necessity. This drawback suffers diminution in proportion as peace and industry prevail, and "the supply of males available for carrying on social sustentation increases. * * * There may be added the fact of kindred meaning, that in the United States, where, till the late war, the degree of militancy had been so small and the industrial type of social structure and action so predominant, women have reached a higher status than in any other country."

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Thus we have seen the opposite effects of war and industry on the social and political status of women. A striking illustration is drawn from the ancient Aryan and Egyptian societies; the former racked by war and tyrannized over by the reigning power, was, in its very nature, patriarchal, thus placing women at a fearful disadvantage; the latter, though "the militant type of social structure was evolved during their consolidation," show proof, nevertheless, of having, during a very long period, made great progress in arts and industry, which could not but be very conducive to the influence of women, in some instances "giving them precedence over men." Of the China and Japan of modern times, Mr. Spencer makes the following criticism: "China, with its long history of wars causing consolidations, dissolutions, re-consolidations, etc., going back more than 2,000 years B.C., and continuing during Tartar and Mongul conquests, to be militant in its activities, has, notwithstanding industrial growth, retained the militant type of structure, and absolutism in the state has been accompanied by absolutism in the family, qualified in the one, as in the other, only by the customs and sentiments which industrialism has fostered; wives are bought, concubinage is common among the rich, widows are sometimes sold as concubines by fathers-in-law, and women join in hard work, sometimes to the extent of being harnessed to the plough; while nevertheless this low status is practically raised by a public opinion which checks harsh treatment legally allowable. Japan, too, after passing through long periods of internal conflict, acquired an organization completely militant, under which political freedom was unknown, and then showed a simultaneous absence of freedom in the household—buying of wives, concubinage, divorce at the mere will of the husband, crucifixion or decapitation for the wife's adultery, while along with the growth of industrialism characterizing the later days of Japan, the went such an improvement in the legal status of women that the husband was no longer allowed to take the law into his own hands."

Peace, prosperity, and industry are the three wheels on which a nation turns, and together form the lever uplifting womanhood from grovelling slavery to the grandeur of independence.

Nations in their rude contrivance at greater freedom and abhorrence of self-subjugation, may, in primitive and medieval stages of development, find war beneficial in its rough destruction of physical cowardice and the awakening of those forces which create stability, defying invasion and keeping the enemy at bay; but there are artificial conditions arising principally from contingency, and with an advancing civilization the need of war becomes less urgent, and sympathy, love, benevolence, and purity of motive take the place of contention, riot, envy, and strife; new zeal is given to intellectual progress; life is inspired by more unselfish desires and fraught with more earnest purpose; science lends recreation to the tired hands of labor; poetry, art, emotion and sentiment soften the hardships of life and give passion and fire a calmer motive; the weak have more consideration shown them, more rights vouchsafed them; newer and better theories take the place of old ones and in time become crystallized into law. Necessity is modified with conditions, and what constitutes a blessing and an advantage to one age may prove a burden and a drawback to the next. The saviors of nineteen centuries ago cannot meet the exigencies of to-day. Social evolution involves change, and the regulation of moral conduct should be fitted to the needs of the times.

"New occasions teach new duties, time makes ancient good uncouth;
We must upward still and onward,
who would keep abreast of truth."

Centuries of gradual yet constant persistence has brought about the evolution of the New Woman—once deemed an abortion, whose early efforts were nipped in the bud by the blighting frost of the Christian religion; but, at present, claiming recognition as never before, and differing from the conventional church-going woman of to-day, in that she is abreast of her time. In the formation of political schemes and the framing of state constitutions, she claims an equal right with man, but far be it from her intention to dispute with him his dominion; nor will she wrest from him one iota of the precedence he may win by natural means, or the distinction he may attain by actual superiority. Neither does the New Woman wish to part with the nature distinctively feminine; she only requests that the masculine and feminine elements be united in organic law, as they are in organic nature. The New Woman objects to having her rights plundered, her personal liberty invaded, by the most abject, debased, and vicious of men.

Every one who recognizes the value of independence, the honor of self-government, the glory of distinction won by personal merit, and, above all, the expediency of industrial, mental and spiritual co-operation in the uplifting of mankind, can regard it as nothing less than impious—a crime against God and humanity—to cast aside the sacred birthright of liberty—the mouth piece and expression of universal law. We may infringe the laws of society and incur no injury to ourselves thereby, for the laws of society are rarely grounded on analysis and philosophy, and there is every likelihood that they may be wanting in correct judgment; but to disregard a law of nature is a rebellion against ourselves, for nature's laws do not, like those of society, grow out of a confused and disorganized state of affairs, but rest on the foundation stone of eternal justice, not slow to reward right doing, yet pitiless in pursuit of wrong, swift and inevitable in revenge. Nature is a merciless scourger, and let us beware how we tamper with the laws of heredity, lest the sins of the father be visited upon the children "unto the third and fourth generation," yea, even to the tenth.

In throwing off the "yokes and suffrance" of antiquitly, which dwarf our better instincts and hinder us from rising to our natural level, let us substitute for the unjust legislation of the past a system of equity, free from oppression or restraint of any sort, which will satisfy the needs of an advancing civilization, and, above all, erase from the escutcheon of our nation the tyranny of sex distinction. However politics may differ and creeds war with each other, there is one fact in the history of human progress standing out clear, strong, significant above all others, defying contradiction and unswerving in its simple truth, namely, that along with an educated conscience, a more extended search after fresh knowledge, comes a promotion of public and private good, including, above all other things, a corresponding increasing force toward the direction of the rights and privileges of women and the extension of their duties beyond the home circle. India and China, Turkey and Russia, show the abject debasement and misery to which a country must inevitably descend that fails to comprehend those principles of law without which due administration of justice is impossible. These countries, inert and sluggish in development, are lagging near the rear of civilization; disturbed as they are by oppression from within, conflict from without; the legitimate prey of a priestcraft which, like a serpent, thrusts its poisonous fangs into the very heart of the body politic; encumbered and borne down for uninterrupted ages by a system of caste and religious creeds, barren of all good, devoid of sympathy, destitute of sense, burdensome and irksome in their very nature; smarting and cringing under penal codes which exercise no pity toward the offender; their women dragged down into the very pitfalls of weakness and degradation by marriage laws revolting to every instinct of decency and true humanity, their faces barred from the gaze of the outside world as if they were loathsome creatures upon whose brow heaven has set the seal of eternal vengeance. "Day and night," say the Institutes of Manu, "must women be kept in a state of subjection to their protectors."

China, to which we are indebted for many important hints on industry and mechanics, held a most imposing position in the annals of antiquity, abounding, as she did, in immense treatises on science, ethics, law, medicine, literature, music, agriculture, history, and having the honor of inventing the art of painting, which, according to Professor Draper, was brought from China into Europe by the Venetians. The China of the past, bold, daring, yet spiritual, in her philosophy has deteriorated into a mental torpor, which brands the average Chinaman with almost imbecile weakness, his knowledge consisting of a mere jargon of unwholesome dogmas, creeds, customs, and formularies, raked from the shambles of antiquity. And perhaps there are few specimens under heaven so degraded as the Chinese woman, presenting, as she does, a deformity in mind and body; and knowing no alternative but to minister to the vanity and brutal appetites of the human wreck who goes by the name of master and husband.

One of the distinguishing features of the orient, especially of India, noticed by F. G. Carpenter and others, in their travels, is the vulgar display of jewels and cosmetics among the women, which assume a less important aspect in proportion as the tide of evolution rolls onward, and a growing sense of decency forbids excess and dissipation. Describing the splendid costume of a Turkish bride, Mr. Albert Lorentz, in his delightful work on "Pleasure and Progress," proceeds as follows: "She was dressed in white silk brocaded with silver and pearls. Innumerable silver coins sparkled and dangled from her ears. A belt of precious stones encircled her waist. After her face had been whitened by brilliant cosmetics, crimson hearts were painted on cheek and chin. The eyebrows were dyed intensely black, and the fingers were stained in deep red." The Turkish woman, vain and flattered if she be rich, tabooed and maltreated if belonging to the poorer and humble classes, is regarded as the legitimate prey of the lust and vindictiveness of a husband, who can send her as an outlaw, from his harem of degraded women, without either waywardness or fickleness on her part. This scarcely excels in cruelty and intensity the Mosaic code, which ordained that when a man became displeased with his spouse, he was to "give her a writing of divorcement and send her out of his house." Under the savage misrule of Jehovah, the Jewish maiden was regarded as so much chattel or merchandise, who could be sold by her father "to be a maid servant," and afterwards redeemed, if her master was displeased with the bargain. In compliance with the dictates of the Koran, the Mohammedan maiden of immature years is at the absolute disposal of father or male guardian, who can pass her over to the most wretched and deplorable of men, without consulting her wishes in the least; once his, she is his forever, or rather, nothing but the most extreme brutal treatment and conjugal infelicity will justify a seperation; and even when the rights of women are sufficiently respected to grant the wife a divorce (which cases are painfully rare), the woman is then purposely placed at a disadvantage, her liege lord depriving her of the whole, or a part, of her dowry.

Polygamy was authorized and practiced on an immense scale by the ancient Jewish nation, but is inadmissible under the Moslem rule, which limits the number of wives to four, although concubines are to be had for the asking. Among the statutes recorded in the nineteenth chapter of Leviticus, the woman found guilty of the crime of adultery was to be scourged, while her partner in guilt was to bring to the tabernacle of the Lord a ram for a trespass offering. Not similar in kind but parallel in unfairness is the Islamite law which, under certain circumstances, gives the man permission to seek a wife from among Jews or Christians, but under no condition concedes the Mohammedan woman the same immunity, taking it for granted that she is the exclusive property of the Turk.

St. Paul expressly ordained that all ministerial and sacerdotal functions were to devolve on man, who, he said, was the natural head of woman, because, he was created first, in the image and glory of his maker; that women were to cover their heads in shame, learn in silence, and live in subjection. Somewhat milder is this than the tenets of the Koran, which imprison a woman in a harem, ordain that she envelope her face in an ungainly masque, and forbid her to pray to Almighty God in the presence of men. In the progress of civilization and modern enlightenment, the teachings of Paul, unable to bear up under the pressure of religious skepticism, are gradually melting from before our eyes, and the Christian woman is beginning to burst through her prison bars and to treat Paul's ordinance regarding her sex as "the baseless fabric of a vision,"—"only such stuff as dreams are made of." But the Mohammedan woman, stolid, austere, stiff, so long accustomed to mental stagnation, is like a vessel stranded on a rock, which neither wind nor tide, nor incessant pulling, can stir from its fixed and motionless position. Having no control over her own destiny, meek, supinely submissive, downtrodden, ignorant, yet priding herself on her modesty and womanly bearing, secure in the belief that she is the most blessed of creatures, the Mohammedan woman thinks subjection her natural state and bears her yoke with becoming submission.

A faint glimpse at the present history of Russia discloses a people rich in mental resources, to which women contribute no mean share, despite the efforts made to withold from them the fruit of the tree of knowledge. Russia's activities are divided between militancy and industrialism, her brilliant genius obscured by adherence to fashion, religion, and antique customs. The orthodox Christian church, supported by law and public opinion, inveighs against literary and scientific instruction for women, and so fierce has been its antagonism at times that a woman's medical college (devoted especially to the diseases of women and children), after turning out one hundred graduates, was suppressed by law. Politically, women stand for a cipher; and of their position in the church, Johann George Kohl, during his Russian travels, noted the fact that "female voices are never heard in the Russian church; their place is supplied by boy-sopranos; women do not yet stand high enough in the estimation of the churches * * * to be permitted to sing the praises of God in the presence of men."
